The Hampstead Murder.—On Thursday evening a letter arrived at Newgate addressed to Hocker, stating that the culprit should not suffer the penalty of the law on Monday as the writer intended to surrender himself as the real murderer of Mr. Delarue. The police obtained a clue to the writer, and apprehended him. He gave his name Allen Kiallmark, admitted the authorship of the letter, and, on being examined by the Sheriffs, said he had written it on the impulse of the moment, and knew nothing about Hocker. The man was remanded for further inquiry, and was brought yesterday before the Lord Mayor, when after hearing several witnesses as to the diseased state of the prisoner's mind, the Lord Mayor sent him to Marylebone, the court from which Hocker had been committed. The magistrate at this office, after consulting Sir James Graham, decided that he had no power to detain him and considered his conduct as the result of mental delusion. The prisoner was therefore discharged.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending April 19:—West Districts, 146; Northern, 185; Central 174; Eastern, 189; Southern, 226; Total, 920; males, 479; females, 449. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1319; males, 654; females, 665.

Provincial.

Aylesbury.—It is stated that a copy of Tawell's confession has been forwarded by Mr. Cox to Sir J. Graham, and another copy to Mr. Baron Parke; and that in answer to their application, Sir J. Graham had previously intimated to the Buckinghamshire magistrates that he did not see sufficient grounds to call for his interference.

Ashton-under-Line.—On Saturday a fatal accident occurred on the line of railway which is now in the course of construction from the line of the Sheffield and Manchester Railway to this town. This line, which is only a branch, is constructed chiefly on arches, and in some parts on embankments. The arches are of brown stone. No less than nine of these arches gave way at the same instant, and buried in the ruins all the men who were employed about them. A hundred men were put to work at once to clear the ruins, and after great exertions three men were taken out alive, and 12 dead. The damage done to the arches is estimated at 3000*l*. At present no fault is found with the manner in which the arches were constructed, but the accident is attributed to the fact, that near the abutment of the principal arch was the eye or mouth of a long-disused coalpit, which gave way. For several miles round, the whole country is undermined by collieries, many of which are said to come within a short distance of the surface. There are numerous places in the vicinity which have sunk many feet, and done much damage to property of every description.

Cambridge.—The election of Public Librarian has ended in the return of Mr. Power. The numbers were as follow:—Mr. Power, 312; Mr. Smith, 240; majority, 72.—The stone altar, and credence table, in the Round Church, which have so long occasioned dissension in the Church have at length been removed by the churchwardens, who received a mandate to that effect from the Archdeacon of Ely. The church will very shortly be re-opened for Divine service, and handsomely restored.

Cowes.—The estate purchased by her Majesty in the Isle of Wight, consists of about 817 acres, of which Osborne Park, Osborne Great Wood, and New Barton Farm contain 376 acres, and Barton Farm 441 acres. Barton Farm, now the freehold of her Majesty, was formerly college property (Winchester). The immediate alteration at Osborne will not be very extensive, as it is in contemplation to enlarge and restore Barton, which is a very fine old example of the Elizabethan style. It is understood that the consideration money for the purchase of Osborne House and estate was 26,000*l*. It is said to be 2000*l*. less than was at first asked for that property when it was contemplated to be taken as a marine residence for Her Majesty and the youthful royal family.

Derby.—The inquest on the sufferers in the late fatal accident at this place, after several adjournments, was resumed on Monday in the town-hall. The evidence adduced contained no new facts regarding the accident. Some of the witnesses complained of the manner in which the arches had been constructed, the piers, it was alleged, being very defective. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," coupled with a rider expressing regret that the co-operation of the committee had not been directed to an inspection and knowledge of the work going on, and that after the previous accident the committee had not appointed competent and proper persons to superintend the works, persons in whom confidence could be placed, and whose plans could be relied on.

Leicester.—On Wednesday week the house of the Rev. J. Babington, of Cossington, about a mile and a half from the Sileby station of the Midland Counties Railway, was broken open, and property exceeding the value of 1200*l*. stolen. The robbers were five in number; their faces were disguised, and their shoes covered with cloth, to prevent the footmarks from being compared. The robbery was planned, as the thieves on breaking into the house said "they had come for the rent," proving that they were aware that Mr. Babington had received his rents on the previous day. No clue has yet been obtained to their apprehension.

Norwich.—On Monday week an accident happened to St. Julian's Church, King-street, by the falling in of the centre of the eastern wall, burying in the ruins the communion table and one or two pews. The church bears many traces of extreme antiquity, the round tower and heavy arch being of early Saxon architecture.

Taunton.—Sarah Freeman, who was convicted at the last assizes of the Shapwick murders, was executed on Wednesday, in this town. She remained perfectly callous to the last, and died protesting her innocence.

Warwick.—On Friday week, James Crowley, who was found guilty at the last assizes of the murder of Mr. Tilsley, at Spernal, was executed in front of the county gaol. He confessed his guilt, but said he did not intend to shoot the man when he went to his father's house.

Wycombe.—On Monday information was received at the metropolitan police stations that, some time between Sunday-week and Thursday, some person or persons feloniously entered, and endeavoured to set on fire the parish church of West Wycombe, Bucks. A reward of 50*l*. has been offered by the parish authorities, and a similar sum by Government, for the apprehension and conviction of the offenders.

Railways.

At the special Meeting of the Midland Railway Company, sanction was given to the agreement with the Birmingham and Bristol Railway for the lease and ultimate purchase of that company. The terms are briefly six per cent. for the united stock, all debts and liabilities to be assumed by the Midland, with power to purchase the line within six years at 150*l*. for every foot.—The Standing Orders Committee have decided that the Clarence Valley Company have not complied with the standing orders, and as the Bill cannot proceed in the present session, the directors announce that they entertain no doubt of ultimate success, in connection with the agreement which they have entered into with the Trent Valley Company, and the promoters of the line through the Potteries; and that the important objects secured by that arrangement will be duly carried out.—The division which took place on the Maynooth Grant, in the House of Commons, at 3 o'clock on Saturday morning, was known, and in print within half an hour at Southampton, by means of the electric telegraph.—Experiments have been made on the London and Birmingham line, with a view to the acceleration of the trains, the distance between London and Birmingham, 112 miles, being accomplished with ease in the space of 2 hours and 40 minutes. This equals the Great Western, which performs the distance between London and Bristol, 118 miles, in the space of three hours. Spirited experiments like these excite surprise, particularly when it is remembered that a few years ago, under the old school of travelling, it took the best equipped coaches 12 hours to run between London, Birmingham, and Bristol.—On Whit-Monday, cheap trains to the Metropolis are to be started from all the principal towns of the midland and manufacturing districts. Measures are already taken for securing cheap trains from Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Nottingham. This great movement is set on foot by the Anti-Corn-law League, in order to increase the number of spectators and customers at their bazaar, for the exhibition of national manufactures, to be held in Covent Garden Theatre, in May.—A new line, called the New Welch, under the engineering superintendence of Mr. Vignoles, is projected "to give a direct line of communication between Carmarthen, Swansea, Brecon, Hereford, Birmingham, and Worcester;" at Hereford it will join the proposed Monmouth and Worcester and Shrewsbury lines; at Worcester the proposed Oxford, Tring, and South Staffordshire, and Birmingham and Gloucester Railway: giving thereby a direct route from South Wales to Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester, the North of England, and Scotland." The length is 123 miles. The capital is fixed at 2,740,000*l*. A line from Shrewsbury and Hereford is projected in connection of the Oxford line. It will pass through Ludlow and Leominster to Hereford, where it will unite with the Hereford and Monmouth.—A new line is projected to run along the coast from Ipswich to Yarmouth; and another new line is in embryo, to be called the Trent Valley, Wrexham, and Holyhead Junction, with branches to Denbigh and Ruthin.—The Caledonian Company are about to bring before the public a project connected with their line, which will embrace the greater portion of the breadth of Scotland from Berwick to Ayr, and will intersect the Caledonian line at the point, near Lanark, where the Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Northern branches diverge. This is in compliance with the suggestions of the Board of Trade. Another new line is proposed to continue the chain of communication to be opened up by the Caledonian and Scottish Central Railways, and will form the most direct route to the south for Caithness, Sutherland, Ross, Cromarty, Nairn, Moray, Inverness, the northern parts of Argyleshire, a large portion of Perth, and the upper districts of Banffshire. This line will also furnish the means of conveying coals, lime, manures, and merchandise to the populous valleys of the Tay, Braar Athol, the Spey, the Findhorn, and the districts of Badenoch and Ratenoch, to which the only conveyance at present is by carriage from Perth, and the sea-ports of the Moray Firth. In this manner it will furnish the means of transport to the eastern markets for the produce of the extensive forests of Abernethy, Dalnacardoch, Drumochter, Braar Athol, Pitcastle, and Dunkeld, containing many millions of trees of the finest quality, which at present can only be conveyed to market by floating and carting to the sea.—The Glasgow and Ayr Company have also taken steps for extending their line by branches in various directions, and especially with the view of enclosing in the direct communication and connecting link between Glasgow and Belfast, in connection with the great line from Belfast, Dublin, &c. By first-rate steamers the short sea-passage can be performed in little more than an hour; and the landjourney on both sides of the water put together being little more than 120 miles, at the speed of the Great Western trains, the whole distance by sea and land between Glasgow and Belfast, would be travelled within five hours, and business of Exchange and market done in both towns on the same day.

alleviation of the misery of the people of Ireland, that the legislature should impose a heavy absentee tax—that such tax should be no less than 10 per cent. on all incomes exceeding £500 per annum—that every person should be considered as an absentee who shall not reside in Ireland during at least six months in each year, and that the proceeds of such tax should be applied in augmentation of the funds raised by local taxation for useful objects connected with the districts from which the income of such absentees is derived," and proceeded to comment on the many evils which absenteeism had inflicted on Ireland, and pointed out the means by which it might be counteracted. He continued to observe that he had read, with the greatest satisfaction, and in a spirit of the greatest kindliness, the speeches which had been delivered by the Ministry during the late debate. As for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he did not much regard him; and if the granting of the boon rested with him alone, he was sure the people of Ireland would not receive it. He never before in his life had occasion to praise Sir J. Graham, but he should say that the manly spirit and straightforwardness with which he delivered his speech was worthy of the highest commendation. He would hold out both his hands to him to assist in extricating him from the dilemma into which he had fallen, and he would place him on a pedestal the basis of which should be justice to Ireland. Sir J. Graham had said that concession had reached its limits—the meaning of which was, that justice should not be extended to Ireland. He had expressed his sorrow for that expression, and had declared that the Maynooth Bill was to be the precursor of more beneficial measures. Sir J. Graham told the Recorder of Dublin that Protestant ascendancy had departed for ever. An ascendancy of any kind must be prejudicial to the interests of the country where it exists; and for his part he would not hesitate to declare that he would rather ascend the scaffold than tolerate for one moment a Catholic ascendancy. They would have no ascendancy, and three cheers for Sir J. Graham (immense applause). Shaw was angry, he understood—he cared little. The best friend to the Repeal of the Union was the member for the University, for it was in consequence of his opposition that the Corporate Reform Bill and other measures were rendered unacceptable. He was glad that Sir J. Graham had told him that Protestant ascendency was numbered amongst the things that were. The speech of the right hon. baronet was a manly, candid, and repentant speech, and gave abundant promise of amendment. He considered they ought to send him absolution from Conciliation-hall. For his part he freely forgave him for calling him a "convicted conspirator." With the speech of Sir Robert he had not much fault to find. Sir R. Peel had alluded to the state trials, and boasted of the vindication of the law, but he forgot to mention the result which had occurred; he supposed he had forgotten it, but they would pardon the small mistake. Sir Robert said that the agitation could not be put down by force. They knew that well; they knew that force could not be used against men who, instead of fighting, were talking and striving by peaceable and constitutional means, to carry into effect the will of the people of Ireland. He told Sir R. Peel that he might now take every soldier in Ireland out of it, and if he wanted a volunteer corps, the Repealers would form one for him. On the whole, he considered the debate as most creditable, and he was certainly astonished at seeing so much temper used in a debate in England and so little abuse of him. The opposition to the Maynooth Bill was headed by the Dissenters, and drew from his friend Mr. Sheil a well-merited castigation. The Dissenters were guilty of base ingratitude they were emancipated in 1828, and for that event they were chiefly indebted to the Irish Catholics. It was he who drew up a petition in their favour, which was signed by 28,000 persons, and within a fortnight after the presentation of that petition they were emancipated. They were not surprised at the opposition of the Methodists. The Catholics had supported the cause of the free church party in Scotland, but they had also evinced ingratitude. He had done with these parties, he wanted nothing from them but abuse. It gave him sincere satisfaction to have it in his power to declare that the Church of England clergy, both in England and Ireland, had not made any demonstration against the Maynooth Bill. Since he became acquainted with the result of the division he was in the best possible humour: in fact, he awoke this morning laughing. Never at any former period of his life did he consider himself as standing in a prouder position than he did at that moment. The man who could now commit a crime would indeed be an enemy to Ireland. In the name of their common country he would implore of the people of Ireland to preserve tranquillity—to avoid Ribbonism and all secret societies whatever, and to prove themselves worthy of the moment they had arrived at. The hon. gentleman then said he had to bring under the notice of the Association the valuable assistance which had been rendered by the Catholic clergy of the counties of Tipperary and Leitrim to Mr. Steele, during his late tour of pacification in these counties, and to move a marked vote of thanks to these gentlemen for their co-operation on that occasion. The meeting was subsequently addressed on the same topics by Messrs. Browne, M.P., S. O'Brien, M.P., Gray Porter, Grattan, M.P., &c. Mr. O'Connell announced the amount of rent to be 355*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, and expressed a hope that Sir R. Peel would double it before next meeting.

Glasgow.—On Wednesday week the Corporation, the Tradeshouse, Chamber of Commerce, and the East India Association of Glasgow, gave a public dinner to Sir Henry Pottinger. The company was very numerous. The Lord Provost acted as chairman, and Lord Dean, of Guild Leadbetter, Deacon Brownlie, W. Sterling, Esq., of Kenmure, and H. Dunlop, Esq., chairman of the East India Association, officiated as croupiers. Sir G. Larpent was also present as a guest.

Law.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—The Queen v. C. Cowes Wilson. Tuesday had been specially appointed for hearing the defendant's application for his discharge from imprisonment under the committal made by the Royal Court at Jersey. Defendant's counsel, Mr. Kelly and Mr. Peacock, tendered an affidavit from a person acquainted with the law of Jersey, showing that the defendant was not lawfully committed by the Inferior order of the Court, and that a warrant was necessary. This point was decided against defendant by Lord Denman and Mr. Justice Patteson, both of whom considered the affidavit inadmissible, and the committal good. The return was then objected to, on the ground that there was not on the face, or by any sufficient statement of such an act of contempt as would justify a committal. Lord Denman: The question now before us must be determined upon this return itself. We must give full credit to the statements made on the face of that document. That being so, we find by the return that this person was sent to prison in consequence of a supposed contravention by him of the law of Jersey, in not showing proper respect to the bailiff and the other judicial officers of the island. If it had appeared on the face of the sentence that there was something manifestly absurd or unjust in the sentence itself, we should not be at liberty to enter on the question whether such sentence was binding, as we do in these cases in which judgments are given in the colonies against parties who are absent from the colony, in which cases we say that the first principle of justice has been neglected, and that a judgment pronounced in a case in which the party has never been in court cannot be sustained; but here the question is, whether, by this defendant, who has been in court, a contempt has been committed, and that is one on which the court has the unfortunate duty imposed upon it of determining the question, in which it is, as it were, a party to the discussion. We cannot decide this question for another court. A court may be insulted by the use of words apparently the most innocent. The words, in themselves respectful, may be most offensively expressed: they may be rendered so by tone and manner. Of that we cannot possibly be competent judges upon the representations of other parties. But if the words may or may not be offensive, according to the circumstances attending their utterance and the court says that they are so, that is an adjudication with which another court cannot interfere. The practice of committal for contempt is one in which, as I have before observed, the judges are in the unfortunate situation of being obliged to decide on a matter affecting themselves, and it has been established on this account for above a century in all cases in which matters merely personal to the judges are concerned, and there is no judge who would not be extremely grieved to see the practice revived. As to the order in the committal requiring the applicant to ask pardon, I agree with the argument that the thing for which he is to ask pardon is sufficiently expressed to be the want of respect towards the court of which he has been guilty. The court having adjudged that he has been guilty of a want of respect, has a right to require that he shall make reparation for that offence, and the prisoner has therefore been called on to make it. This he has refused to do, and has therefore been committed. This court has no choice, as the law is set forth on the return, but to say that the law must take its course. In my opinion, therefore, the prisoner must be remanded. The other judges concurred, and the order was made accordingly. When the officer approached Mr. Wilson, and required him to go away, the latter exclaimed, "Where is your warrant?" and this question was repeated once or twice in a tone so loud, and apparently so marked with an intention to resist, as to attract the attention of Lord Denman, who said: Let us have no conversation here. The prisoner is remanded to the custody from which he came. Mr. Wilson and the officer then left the court.

OXFORD CIRCUIT—HEREFORD.—At these assizes the grand jury ignored the bill preferred against Samuel Garness, a guardian of the poor for the parish of Llangarren; Thomas Lewis, a shopkeeper; Edward Tommey, constable of Llangarren; and Thomas Garness, for the manslaughter of Mary Jones, aged 82, an out-door pauper chargeable to the parish of Llangarren. It was alleged that the deceased's death was occasioned by exposure to cold and other circumstances attending the removal from her cottage to the union workhouse at Ross, by the above parties, without proper authority, and against the inclination of the old woman, who locked her door and made the most violent resistance to this proceeding. The parties were now arraigned on the coroner's inquisition. The prisoners having been given in charge to the jury, Mr. Greaves said, "This prosecution has been instituted by the board of guardians of the Ross Union in consequence of the death of a pauper under circumstances that appeared to demand inquiry. The guardians thought it their duty to cause the matter to be investigated, and accordingly an inquiry has taken place before the coroner and before the grand jury, and the latter tribunal having decided, by ignoring the bill of indictment, that the evidence for the prosecution was not sufficient to place the prisoners on their trial, I feel constrained to bow to their decision, and shall offer no evidence in support of the inquisition." A verdict of Acquittal was then taken, and the prisoners discharged.—MONMOUTH—(Civil Side)—Prickett, a Pauper, v. Gratrex, Esq.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who sued in formâ pauperis, to recover damages from the defendant for an alleged false imprisonment. The plaintiff in this case is a gardener, who, in the year 1842, let a portion of his house to Mr. John Powell, a wine-merchant in this city, who with his daughter resided there for some time. It appeared that the plaintiff flattered himself that he had made some favourable impression upon the young lady's heart; but no foundation whatever was shown by the evidence for these presumptuous hopes. However, the plaintiff evidently fancied himself a successful lover, and to such an extent did he proceed in his attentions or rather annoyances, that Mr. Powell found it necessary to apply to the present defendant, then mayor of Monmouth, who required the love sick horticulturist to enter into recognizances to keep the peace towards that gentleman and his daughter: and in default committed him to the county gaol, where he remained for five months. It was to recover damages for this incarceration that the present action was brought. On the defendant's part, it was shown that he had been in positive bodily fear of the plaintiff's violence, one of whose expressions had been, "that he would have his rights, or else the heart's-blood of John Powell or some of his family." The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, the learned Baron remarking that it was to be regretted the good old law had been abolished, by which the authors of such vexatious suits as the present were condemned to be whipped at the cart's tail.

Miscellaneous.

Rapid Communication.—The Dumfries, a merchantman, sailed from Hong Kong on the 7th December, and arrived at Liverpool on the 5th April, making the voyage in something less than four months. This is, we believe, unparalleled in the history of communication with China.

Military Life on the Banks of the Indus.—The following extract from a private letter, dated Ferozepore, Feb. 11, 1845, may interest our readers, in reference to the expected campaign in the Punjaub:—"Here I am at the other end of India, near the Punjaub, or Runjeet Singh's dominions, and I dare say before long shall cross the Indus to fight in the Punjaub, which is in a very disturbed state. You may imagine how comfortable we are here on a large flat of ground, not a blade of grass or a tree to be seen for miles; and dust! oh dust! I can assure you it is knee-deep, and when the wind blows we cannot see in the day-time without a candle. We have strict orders to be on the alert to answer at any hour, to any call either by drum or bugle, as the Sikhs are assembled in a very large body about 60,000 strong on the other side of the river, and may take it into their heads to come across quietly some night or other. There is another delight here; we are all obliged to buy houses at an enormous rate; I have had to give 3,000 rupees (300*l.*) for mine, which is no small sum for a captain in a native regiment. At present we have three complete regiments of native infantry, one of regular cavalry, one of irregular cavalry, and one of native artillery. Barracks are building for a corps of Europeans, and two more native regiments, and more artillery are expected soon. In marching here we had to pass through some of the Sikh villages, and the people were anything but friendly or obliging, besides which they are great thieves, and much given to lying. In appearance the Sikhs are a fine race of men, and wear long beards like Jews; they pride themselves upon never applying iron to the hair in the shape of a razor, or anything else, and are consequently most horrible frights."

Lord Rosse's Telescope.—At the last monthly meeting of the Royal Irish Academy, which was honoured by the presence of the Lord Lieutenant, the Earl of Roden, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Chief Baron, Judge Crampton, and other distinguished personages, the main object of attraction was an address by Professor Robinson, in reference to the telescope of Lord Rosse, and the highly interesting and important discoveries recently made by him through its agency. The Dublin Evening Post says—"Professor Robinson spoke, in truth, like a book, but with all the animation which should accompany a viva voce harangue. He has established this—Lord Rosse's telescope has established it for him—that those clusters of stars called Nebulæ, and which used to be supposed as constituting the materials of which stars are made, are distinct, completely formed stars, some of them as seen through the telescope, of the first magnitude. Dr. Robinson examined 43 of these Nebulæ—of those elements of future bodies, as they have been hitherto called—and found them to be all countless clusters of fully formed stars."

Lighting by Electricity.—Mr. Weekes's plan for lighting towns by electricity is about to be carried into effect in America. The editor of the Cincinnati Mechanic states that an experiment he lately witnessed was perfectly successful; that the apparatus is by no means costly, and that for lighting Cincinnati, two towers, it is considered, will be sufficient to illuminate the whole city. Mr. Weekes's plan was first published in this country as far back as 1831.—The Builder.

Petrified Forest on the Nile.—"There is," says a writer in the Bombay Times, "scarcely, perhaps, a spectacle on the surface of the globe more remarkable, either in a geological or picturesque point of view, than that presented by the petrified forest near Cairo. The traveller having past the tombs of the Caliphs, just beyond the gates of the city, proceeds to the southward nearly at right angles to the road, across the Desert to Suez; and after having travelled some 10 miles up a low barren valley covered with sand, gravel, and seashells, fresh as if the tide had retired but yesterday, crosses a low range of sand-hills, which has for some distance run parallel to his path. The scene now presented to him is beyond conception singular and desolate. A mass of fragments of trees, all converted into stone, and when struck by his horse's hoof, ringing like cast-iron, is seen to extend itself for miles and miles around him in the form of a decayed and prostrate forest. The wood is of a dark-brown hue, but retains its form in perfection, the pieces being from 1 to 15 feet in length, and from ½ foot to 3 feet in thickness, strewed so thickly together, as far as the eye can reach, that an Egyptian donkey can scarcely thread its way through amongst them, and so natural, that, were it in Scotland or Ireland, it might pass without remark for some enormous drained bog, on which the exhumed trees lay rotting in the sun. The roots and rudiments of the branches are, in many cases, nearly perfect, and in some the wormholes eaten under the bark are readily recognisable. The most delicate of the sap-vessels, and all the finer portions of the centre of the wood, are perfectly entire, and bear to be examined with the strongest magnifiers. The whole are so thoroughly silicified, as to scratch glass, and to be capable of receiving the highest polish."

BIRTHS.—On the 15th inst., at Pitchley the Duchess of Calabritto, of a son—15th inst., at Frittenden Rectory, the Lady HARRIET MOORE, of a daughter—19th inst., the lady of the Hon. JOHN JOCELYN, of a son—19th inst., at Southtown-house, Devon, the Right Hon. GREAT NOVELTY IN PERIODICAL LITERATURE.
On the 1st of May next,

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE

WILL BE ISSUED AS A BOUND VOLUME,
Without extra charge.

The issuing of a Magazine in bound volumes monthly, will remove the great objection to periodical publications when sent out in paper covers. They are always unsightly, are frequently lost by being scattered about, and give an appearance of carelessness and neglect to the drawing-room or library table, where neatness and elegance of arrangements are so desirable.

The plan on which the New Series of the ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE will be issued will obviate these objections; it will furnish every month, to the book-case or library,

A HANDSOME BOUND VOLUME
(PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE),

in small 8vo, which will be enriched with the best ARTISTIC and LITERARY talent of the day.

VOLUME IV., of the OLD SERIES, containing the last Six Months' Parts, is now ready, handsomely bound in cloth, gilt, Price 11*s*. Sets may be perfected, and covers to bind vols. had at the Office. Office, No. 1, Crane-court, Fleet-street, London.

He will also fulfil the office of REGISTER-GENERAL OF THE ANECDOTES OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY; STRONG, although he comes out WEEKLY; and, notwithstanding that he is as CHEAP as THREE-HALFPENCE, hoping to prove himself "the dearest friend the Public ever had."—Office, 1, Crane-court, Fleet-street.—To be had of all Booksellers.

CORNS AND BUNIONS.
Patronised by the Royal Family, Nobility, Clergy, &c.

PAUL'S EVERY MAN'S FRIEND is a sure and speedy cure for those severe annoyances without causing the least pain or inconvenience.

Unlike all other remedies for corns, its operation is such as to render the cutting of the corns altogether unnecessary (indeed, we may say, the practice of cutting corns is at all times highly dangerous, and has been frequently attended with lamentable consequences, besides its liability to increase their growth): it adheres with the most gentle pressure, producing an instant and delightful relief from torture, and, with perseverance in its application, entirely eradicates the most inveterate corns and bunions.

Testimonials have been received from upwards of one hundred Physicians and Surgeons of the greatest eminence.

Prepared by JOHN FOX, in boxes, at 1*s*. 1½*d*., or three in one for 2*s*. 9*d*., and to be had of C. KING, Napier-street, near the Albert Saloon, Hoxton, London; and all wholesale and retail medicine venders in town and country. The genuine has the name of JOHN FOX on the stamp.

A 2*s*. 9*d*. box cures the most obdurate corns.
Ask for "PAUL'S Every Man's Friend."

The Patent Electro processes being extensively adopted under their licence, the Patentees beg to state that they confine their own Manufacture to goods of a superior and warranted quality only, which invariably bear their mark, "E. & Co.," under a crown. Old articles replated and gilt.

MEEN FUN, the celebrated Chinese Cosmetic, Patronised by the Queen and the Royal Family.—The great value of this Cosmetic is, that the ingredients being solely herbaceous the most delicate complexion can apply it without injury, while rough, red, and moist skins speedily experience beneficial results. Another most important feature is that of repressing, without detriment to the sanatory condition of the user, the truly unpleasant sensation accompanying too copious perspiration. Travellers and residents in warm climates, subject to the enervating influence of tropical heat, will, when the skin becomes moist and heated, experience inconceivable comfort by resorting to this Cosmetic, as it will both allay and avert discoloration and coarseness. Sold retail by all respectable perfumers, chemists, &c., in boxes price 3*s*. 6*d*. and 7*s*. 6*d*. each, and wholesale by the proprietors, FABIAN and Co. (late Watson, Fabian, and Co.), 24, Mark-lane, London. Country agents required.

The above Labels have been manufactured by LINGHAM, BROTHERS, for the last five years with increasing demand, and acknowledged by those parties who have used them as superior to any thing of the kind before offered to the Public, and for neatness, durability, and cheapness, have superseded all other kind of Labels for Hortulan purposes.

Sole Agents in London:—GEORGE and J. DEANE, Horticultural Implement Warehouse, 46, King William-street, London-bridge.

HATCHER'S BENNENDEN TILE MACHINE, Manufactured and Sold only by COTTAM and HALLEN, Engineers, Agricultural Implement Makers, &c., 2, Winsley-street, Oxford-street, London.

This is the most efficient Machine that has been invented for the purpose of making Drain Tiles. Any shaped Tile can be made by merely changing the die, which can be done in a few minutes. It requires but few hands, viz., one man and three boys. With this amount of labour, the product of a day of 10 hours is as follows, viz.:—

1 inch diameter of Tile,	11,000	1¼ inches diam. of Tile,	5,800
1½ " "	8,000	2½ " "	3,200

 See Letter of Thomas Law Hodges, Esq., in the "Transactions of the Royal Agricultural Society of England," page 551, Part 2, vol. 5.

The Machine is moveable down the drying-sheds, so that it requires no extra boys to carry the Tiles, nor are shelves required in drying. It has been in full operation for upwards of four months at Hempstead Park, near Cranbrook, Kent. No charge made for Patent dues or licence. The purchase of the Machine includes free use of it.

THE HAIR.—Of the numerous compounds constantly announced for promoting the growth or reproduction of the Hair, few survive, even in name, beyond a limited period, whilst with a reputation unparalleled, is still on the increase in public estimation. The singular virtues of this successful invention for Restoring, Preserving, and Beautifying the Human Hair, are too well known and appreciated to need comment. The very facts of the high and distinguished patronage it enjoys, its general use in all countries, together with numerous testimonials constantly received in its favour, are authorities which stamp its superior excellence and title over all attempts of a similar nature. Being universally preferred, its consequent great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who vend the most spurious trash as the "genuine" Macassar Oil; whereas the genuine article is wholly the invention and property of A. ROWLAND and SON, and the amalgamation of its costly exotic materials renders abortive any attempt to discover its component parts—thus proving the imposition of all other articles bearing the title of "Macassar Oil." The genuine article has the words—

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL,

engraved in two lines on the Wrapper; and on the back of the Wrapper, nearly 1500 times, containing 29,028 letters.—Price 3*s*. 6*d*.—7*s*.—Family Bottles (equal to four small,) 10*s*. 6*d*., and double that size 21*s*. per Bottle. Sold by the Proprietors at 20, Hatton Garden, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

 All other articles sold under the same name are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS.

PARR'S LIFE PILLS.—The extraordinary success of this Medicine is the wonder of the age; it has been tried by hundreds of thousands as an aperient, and has in every instance done good; it has never in the slightest degree impaired the most delicate constitution. Tens of thousands have testified that perseverance in the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS will completely cure any disease, and are living witnesses of the benefit received from this invaluable medicine. Sheets of testimonials and the "Life and Times of Old Parr," may be had gratis of every respectable Medicine Vendor throughout the Kingdom.

Beware of spurious imitations of the above medicine. None are genuine unless the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in WHITE LETTERS ON A RED GROUND, engraved on the Government Stamp, pasted round each box; also the fac-simile of the signature of the Proprietors, "T. ROBERTS and Co.," London, on the directions.

Sold in boxes at 1*s*. 1½*d*., 2*s*. 9*d*., and family packets at 11*s*., by Edwards, 67, St. Paul's; Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Church-yard, London; Mottershead and Co., Manchester; and J. and R. Raimes and Co., Edinburgh; and by all respectable Druggists and Patent Medicine Retailers throughout the Kingdom.—Directions are given with each box.

Advantages of the Argus Life Assurance Company.

Low Rates of Premiums.

In addition to the subscribed Capital of 300,000*l.*, the assured have the security of the Company's Income of nearly 60,000*l.* per annum, yearly increasing, and an accumulating Assurance Fund invested in Government and other available Securities, of considerably larger amount than the estimated liabilities of the Company.

The Rates of Premium are reduced to the lowest scale compatible with the safety of the Assured and the stability of the Company, thereby, in effect, giving to every policy-holder an immediate and certain bonus without risk, in lieu of the deferred and frequently delusive prospect of a periodical division of profits.

News of the Week.

THE expected debate on the Maynooth Bill, arising out of Mr. Law's amendment for disallowing the grant out of the Consolidated Fund, did not take place on Friday. At the request of Sir R. Peel, Mr. Law consented to withdraw his amendment, and reserve his opposition to the bringing up of the report. The vote, therefore, for granting 30,000*l.* out of the consolidated fund to defray the expenses of the College was agreed to as a matter of course, and on Monday when the motion was made for bringing up the report, Mr. Law met it by a negative, contending that the permanent endowment of Maynooth was a violation of the principles elicited by the Reformation and confirmed by the Revolution of 1688. Sir R. Peel warmly defended the measure and vindicated himself from the charge of inconsistency, declaring his firm conviction that the Bill was necessary to convince Roman Catholics that nothing would induce public men to abandon what they considered just and necessary. The House then divided, and negatived Mr. Law's amendment by 232 to 119. Another amendment was moved by Mr. Tancred, but negatived by 128 to 52, and the report was then received. On Wednesday an arrangement was entered into by which the third reading of the Bill was postponed to Monday, the 26th inst.—Sir R. Peel's measure for remodelling the banking system in Scotland and Ireland will be found described in our Parliamentary report of Friday. The chief feature of this measure is the cautious and almost imperceptible manner in which it interferes with the Scotch system. The banks in Scotland and Ireland are to publish a weekly average of issues, like those of England; but are to retain the power of issuing notes under the value of 5*l.* In Ireland the exclusive privilege of issue within 64 miles of Dublin, now enjoyed by the Bank of Ireland, is to be withdrawn, and the other seven banks of issue are to circulate their notes and have places of business in Dublin,—the Bank of Ireland, however, continuing to be the Bank of Government, and receiving for 10 years certain 3½ per cent. on the debt due to it. In all cases, whatever amount of paper circulation may exceed the average issue must be based on gold and silver coin actually held, or on Bank of England notes. In addition to this regulation of the issues, the Bill provides that no new Bank of Issue shall be created, and the time when the law is to come into effect is fixed for the 1st January next, in order to give time for preparation.—On Thursday Lord Lincoln obtained leave to bring in the Government Bill to facilitate the inclosure of commons and waste lands in England and Wales. The details of this measure are fully given in our report, and our readers will observe that the Bill provides for setting apart places of recreation for the labouring classes, and for making allotments in proportion to the number of the inhabitants and the space to be inclosed. Lord Lincoln also obtained leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the draining of land in England and Wales.

From France we learn that M. Guizot has been compelled by his recent indisposition to seek the restoration of his health by a temporary retirement from the anxieties of office, and M. Duchatel, his colleague, is appointed to supply his place as Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace on Monday for Claremont, and remained there until Thursday, when they returned to town. On Friday Her Majesty gave a State Ball at Buckingham Palace, which was very numerously attended, and on Saturday Her Majesty held a Court and Privy Council. On the same day Prince Albert inspected the Hungerford Suspension Bridge, preparatory to its being opened to the public. On Sunday the Queen and his Royal Highness attended Divine Service in the Chapel Royal of the Palace. On Thursday, on their return from Claremont, Prince Albert went to Merchant Tailors' Hall, to be presented with the honorary freedom of that body, and afterwards accompanied Her Majesty to the Exhibition of the Royal Academy in Trafalgar-square. Her Majesty held her second drawing-room yesterday at St. James's Palace. The Queen Dowager will give an evening party to the juvenile members of the aristocracy, on Monday next. Prince George of Cambridge has arrived this week in town from the Ionian Islands. Lord Charles Wellesley has succeeded Colonel Arbuthnot as Equerry in Waiting to her Majesty; and Colonel Wylde has succeeded Colonel Bouverie as Equerry in Waiting to Prince Albert.

Ministerial Changes.—It is rumoured that the Earl of Lonsdale, the Earl of Liverpool, and the Marquis of Exeter have determined to resign their situations, and vote against the Maynooth Bill in the House of Lords. The Earl of Lonsdale is Postmaster-General; the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward of the Household; and the Marquis of Exeter holds the chief office in Prince Albert's household.

Death of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington.—The death of this venerable Peer took place on Saturday last, after an illness of some months, at Enville-hall, the ancient family seat, near Stourbridge. His lordship was in his 80th year, and is succeeded by his grandson.

Parliamentry Movements.—Colonel Austen, of Kiffington, has been elected member for West Kent. Mr. Henry Barkly, of Eaton Place, has been elected for Leominster; and Lord Loftus, eldest son of the Marquis of Ely, has been elected for Woodstock without opposition. Mr. Forbes Mackenzie is to be opposed by Mr. Carmichael, son of Sir Thomas Carmichael, in his canvass for the representation of Peebleshire. It will be remembered that Mr. Carmichael on a former occasion stood on the liberal interest, and was defeated by Mr. Mackenzie by a majority of six.

The Church.—The Province of New Brunswick has been constituted a new see, to be called the Bishopric of Fredericton, and the Rev. John Medley, D.D., been appointed its first bishop. Ceylon, in like manner, has been constituted into the Bishopric of Colombo, and the Rev. James Chapman, D.D., appointed its bishop. The Rev. W. Dealtry, D.D., Chancellor of the diocese, canon of the Cathedral Church of Winchester, prebendary of Southwell, and rector of the parish of Clapham, Surrey, has been appointed by the Bishop of Winchester to the Archdeaconry of Surrey, void by the elevation of the Ven. Samuel Wilberforce to the Deanery of Westminster.

The Law.—At the levee last week, Her Majesty knighted the two new judges, Mr. Justice Erle, and Mr. Baron Platt. It is understood that the office of Chief Justice of New South Wales, vacant by the recent death of Sir J. Dowling, is to be filled up by a gentleman already in the colony, and not by any member of the English bar.—The commission recently appointed to inquire into the expediency and usefulness of remodelling and redistributing the circuits of the judges in England and Wales, have already, it is said, come to the determination of recommending to Government the division of the present Northern Circuit into two. Manchester and Liverpool, with their satellite towns, are, it is proposed, to form the new circuit. The commissions have, moreover, agreed to advise the Crown to create a new court of common law at Westminster, and for that purpose to withdraw two judges from the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, and to appoint two additional judges.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The Moniteur of Monday confirms the late rumours which had been current in the French capital as to M. Guizot, in consequence of his recent indisposition, having deemed it necessary to withdraw for a time from public affairs. The official journal publishes the subjoined royal ordinance, dated the 27th ult., and countersigned by Marshal Soult, as President of the Council:—"Considering that M. Guizot, our Minister Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs requires, for his health, some repose, we have ordered and do order the following:—Count Duchatel, Minister Secretary of State for the Interior, is entrusted, ad interim, with the department of Foreign Affairs." M. Guizot was to leave Paris on Tuesday for Beausejour, a villa in the neighbourhood of Passy, and only half a league from Paris, where he will remain for a month. He is considerably shaken by his late illness, and is recommended by his physicians to avoid business and all mental fatigue as much as possible. He has chosen his residence so near Paris, however, to enable his colleagues to consult with him in case of need. The announcement of M. Guizot's temporary retirement has furnished some of the Opposition journals with an opportunity for indulging in speculations as to the effect it may have upon the Cabinet, and of expressing an opinion that his temporary withdrawal from affairs is only preparatory to his leaving office altogether. At the same time M. Duchatel, who holds the portfolio of Foreign Affairs ad interim, and who is designated by these journals as the intended successor of M. Guizot, comes in for much abuse. The National, especially, has an article against M. Duchatel, which is remarkable for its violence. The doubt whether M. Guizot was to retire altogether, or his absence would be merely temporary, is thus disposed of by the Débats:—

"We attach no importance to contradicting beforehand the commentaries to which the leave of absence granted by the King to the Minister of Foreign Affairs will no doubt give birth. We merely warn the public that we shall allow the Opposition journals to say what they like. M. Guizot's health has never inspired any serious inquietude. He wants repose, and this repose will be short. The statesman and orator has solicited and obtained from the King a leave of absence, but for the purpose of reappearing in the tribune with all his strength, and of continuing the struggle which he has sustained so brilliantly for the last five years. In the interim the administration of Foreign Affairs is confided to M. Duchatel. It is the only reply that it was suitable to make to the calumnies of certain journals, which, not having succeeded in overturning the Cabinet, endeavoured awkwardly to divide it. M. Duchatel is the political and personal friend of M. Guizot. The King, in selecting that gentleman to temporarily supply M. Guizot's place, has given an equal mark of confidence to both. We have not a word more to add."

The majority of 116 in favour of the reduction of 5 per cent. stock to 4½, had excited great interest in France; but notwithstanding this majority, its conversion into a law seems very doubtful. It is well known that Louis-Philippe is most averse to the measure, and in Wednesday's sittings the Minister of Finance evaded every attempt at making him engage to support it in the Chamber of Peers. The leading organ of Government expresses its firm belief that the Bill will be rejected in that quarter, where the reduction of the stock has always encountered a formidable resistance.—The Chamber of Deputies rejected on Saturday by a considerable majority, the proposition of Messrs. Dozon and Taillandier for the repression of duelling. M. Martin du Nord, the Minister of Justice, contended that the legislature was not silent on the subject, and that in the eyes of the law duelling was an offence and a crime, liable to prosecution and punishment.—On the same day M. Allard presented the report of the committee, appointed to examine the Bill for the arming of the fortifications of Paris. The committee has reduced the estimated expenditure from nearly 18 millions of francs to 13 millions and a fraction. The reduction, which amounts to 3,620,000f., is upon perishable articles and articles which can be provided in case of need, at any time and without delay. The number of cannon to be provided is 2208, including some batteries of field artillery. There are besides, 50 Paixhans mortars, 5750 wall pieces, 200,000 muskets, &c. The whole of the arms are to be placed in depôt at Bourges. This plan was proposed by the Cabinet itself, in order to meet the opposition of those who complain that the fortifications are to be armed in the midst of profound peace. The debate upon this subject, which will come on in a few days, will be a very warm one. Among the petitions which the Chamber afterwards disposed of, two excited much attention, as they demanded the repeal of the law of 1832, whereby all the members of the Buonaparte family, and of the elder branch of the Bourbons, are banished from France. The committee expressed the opinion that the Duchess de Berry, the Duke de Bordeaux and his issue, and Prince Louis Buonaparte ought alone to be kept in exile, and the Chamber almost unanimously ordered the petitions to be referred to the President of the Council and Minister of the Interior.—Much attention is bestowed by the Opposition prints upon a decree issued at Rome on the 7th inst., by the "Sacred Congregation of the Index." Among the "bad books" condemned by it are M. Dupin's "Manual of Ecclesiastical Law," M. Michelet's "Du Prêtre de la Femme et de la Famille;" and M. Cousins's "Course of Lectures on the History of Philosophy." These three anathematised works have powerfully promoted the angry demonstrations which a large number of the French prelates have lately made against the University of France—demonstrations which the liberal party impute to the growing influence of the Jesuits. The decree now sanctioned by the Pope, and promulgated by the order of his holiness, was only known in Paris on Tuesday, when it appeared in the Univers, and created great astonishment. The position in which it places the French Government is a very embarrassing one, for after the decision of the Council of State, declaring the condemnation of M. Dupin's work by the Cardinal Archbishop of Lyons an abuse, and after the royal decree published in the Moniteur, giving effect to that decision, and inflicting the severest censure in the power of the Council on the conduct of the Archbishop, it is not easy to see how a serious difference between the Holy See and the French Government is to be avoided.—The Courrier du Havre mentions that the French Government intended to seize on the Sooloo Islands, situate between Borneo and Mindanao, and to form in them an establishment similar to that of the Marquesas and Tahiti.—The Courrier Français says that the Prince de Joinville, in compliance with the earnest desire of his Princess, has decided on purchasing a fine domain on the coast, not far from Toulon, as a winter residence.—The Committee of the Chamber of Deputies on the supplementary credits, have reported that the King of Prussia, to whom the long disputed Portendic claims were referred to as arbitrator, has admitted the claims of Great Britain to the amount of 41,770 francs, exclusive of interest, which has accrued between the date of the sentence and the time of payment. The claims of the British Government first amounted to 2,224,744f., but it was afterwards reduced by our Government themselves to 1,903,608f. 80c.—The Committee of the Chamber of Deputies on the Paris and Lyons Railway have decided unanimously that there shall be a separate terminus for the Lyons line placed somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Place de la Bastille, as proposed by Government.—We learn from the Constitutionnel that the Duke of Devonshire, who has visited Paris, it is said, expressly to view the exhibition of the Horticultural Society at the Luxembourg, has, on the nomination of the Duke Decazes, been made an honorary member, and his grace was on Sunday presented with his diploma. The Duke congratulated the society on the excellence of its produce, and made considerable purchases for his conservatories. His grace also promised to visit the exhibition yearly, and attend the distribution of the prizes.

SPAIN.—We have accounts from Madrid to the 2nd ult., but they are not of very general interest. In the sittings of the Chamber of Deputies, the discussion on the budget had been resumed, but it presented no feature of any moment. Ministers had introduced two Bills for sanctioning the royal decrees conferring a pension of 45,000 reals on the widow of General Diego Leon, and one of 30,000 on the widow of General Borso. The new Spanish Envoy had arrived in Rome, and it was currently reported that in the beginning of May the Pope would hold a public consistory, at which he would announce the conclusion of the concordat, and the recognition of Queen Isabella by the Holy See. General Prim was expected at Madrid.—Since the middle of last February 1500 Carlist refugees have applied for passports at the Spanish Legation in Paris.

PORTUGAL.—Our accounts from Lisbon are of the 20th ult. The Cortes were dissolved on that day. Her Majesty attended in person, and in her speech from the Throne congratulated the Chambers on the result of the exercise of their legislative functions. The Minister Cabral was labouring under severe illness, apparently broken down by the embarrassments of his position, and the anxieties it occasions him.

SWITZERLAND.—Accounts from Zurich of the 22d ult. state, that the Diet was closed on that day. Most of the foreign Ministers had left for Berne, but the French Ambassador and the Sardinian Minister had repaired to Lucerne, with the intention of spending a few days in that town. The Diet on the 21st had given full power to the Vorort to disband partly, or entirely, the troops now in the federal service; or, if necessary, to replace them by others; and in case public peace should be seriously menaced by illegal acts, to devise such measures as it might deem expedient for the maintenance of order and tranquillity, either by disposing of the federal forces now under arms or calling out others. The President closed the proceedings by a speech, in which he stated his belief, that the most dangerous crisis is passed. Notwithstanding this declaration, the Berne correspondent of the Presse writes, on the 23d, that the situation of affairs in that canton was becoming daily more menacing. A popular assembly, hostile to the Government, was to have been held in that city on the 28th, and it was considered highly probable that it would be followed by a revolution similar to that of Vaud. The inhabitants had resolved to form themselves into a national guard, for the protection of their persons and property. There was no longer any discipline among the troops. The Radical cantons made no mystery of their intention to separate from the Catholic and Conservative cantons, and establish a new confederation. A Berne journal recommended that plan, and another, published in Basle country, discussed and approved it.

GERMANY.—Letters from Bonn state that the distinguished author Augustus William de Schlegel has been for a fortnight past suffering from an aneurism of the heart, which gives his friends and many admirers the more anxiety, as he is 78 years old. Every day a deputation from the University of Bonn, and another from the students, call at his residence to inquire about his health. King Frederick William, before his departure for Dresden, sent hither his first physician, M. de Schœnlein, to attend M. de Schlegel, and the inhabitants of Bonn have spontaneously prohibited any vehicles passing through the street where he resides. Prince Charles, the king's brother, and Prince Schomburg-Waldenberg have published the report of the commission sent by them to purchase territories for a Prussian colony on the Mosquito shore. They succeeded in purchasing two spots—one the Lagune of Caratasca, occupying 16 geographical miles of coast, the other a territory of 10 miles extent on either side of the Patosk, from its mouth to the territories of Honduras.—The Wurzburgh Gazette has the following from Dresden, April 20:—"We have received information here that, in the course of the summer, the Queen of England will arrive at Coburg, where preparations are already making for her reception. It is hoped that Queen Victoria will also visit our Court, and that of Berlin."

ITALY.—Letters from Florence mention that Julie, Countess de Survilliers, widow of Joseph Bonaparte, and formerly Queen of Spain, died in that city on the 7th ult. of a fit of apoplexy. She had long been in a state of ill-health. She was much beloved in that city, and her death will be felt by the poor, to whom she was very charitable, and by whom she was termed la buona Signora.—Advices from Romagna state that the military commission sitting at Ravenna had condemned to death three political prisoners, and a number of others to the galleys. The Sacra Consulta at Rome had pronounced in the case of M. Galetti, a lawyer of Bologna, and sentenced him to the galleys for life. M. Serpieri of Rimini was to be imprisoned during 20 years, by order of the same tribunal.—Letters from Rome state that the Government have again prohibited horse-racing, to the great disappointment of the numerous English and other foreigners visiting Rome. A race, which was recently to have taken place under the stewardship of a noble lord, was interdicted at the express command of the Pope, although Princes Doria and Borghese personally applied to his Holiness to revoke the decree. It is also stated that the Pope had called together a congregation or meeting for secular purposes in Rome, at which it was determined not to allow railways within the Papal states, whether having their origin there, or being connecting links with adjoining countries.

GREECE.—Letters from Athens of the 10th ult. mention that the anniversary of the declaration of Greek independence was celebrated on the 6th by a mere religious ceremony, in the church of St. Ireneus, and a general illumination at night. The most sinister rumours had been circulated for some days. The Opposition was to have seized that opportunity to attempt a coup de main, and the military precautions the authorities were obliged to adopt in consequence of those reports likewise tended to maintain the uneasiness prevailing in the public mind; everything, however, passed off quietly; but the country generally is in a state of the utmost confusion.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.—The latest accounts from Constantinople announce the arrival in that capital of numbers of the deputies who had been summoned from the provinces to make known to the Government the situation and wants of their respective localities. Those deputies having been appointed by the Turkish authorities, no beneficial consequences were anticipated from their meeting.—Intelligence from Alexandria of the 8th ult. announces the death of an unfortunate Copt, who had been cruelly ill-treated at Damietta on account of some imprudent expressions he had used in speaking of the Mahometan religion. No sooner was Mehemet Ali informed of the fact, and of the insults offered by the populace of the town to the European Consuls, who interfered on behalf of the Copt, than he ordered the Governor to be degraded, and confined during six years in the fort of Aboukir. The chief of the ulemas had been exiled to Tantah, for not having interfered to prevent those disorders.

UNITED STATES.—We have accounts from New York to the 8th ult. General Almonte had left New York and embarked for Mexico. In cutting off all further diplomatic intercourse with the Government of the United States he has created the impression that a war between the two countries is inevitable. The papers contain nothing relative to the policy which the Mexican Government may adopt in the present emergency. The prospect of the annexation of Texas had greatly enraged the Mexicans, and the journals of that country are loud and indignant in their denunciations. The trial of Santa Anna had not taken place, but was approaching. He had been required to prepare his defence, which it was said he intended to make in writing to Congress. The news of the passing of the resolutions by the United States Congress for the annexation of Texas had been received at Galveston, and had, according to the New Orleans papers, excited great enthusiasm. If the public feeling is correctly described, the previous accounts which represented the Texans as being indifferent to the annexation, must have been incorrect, or an extraordinary change must have been produced in the minds of the people in the interim. President Jones, it is stated, was about calling Congress together to confirm or repudiate the alliance; his views on the subject are said to have undergone a change, and the circumstance of his having appointed a warm advocate of annexation as the Texan Chargé d'Affaires to the United States is pointed out as a proof of the fact. It is stated as a rumour in the New Orleans Times, that the British and French Ministers had taken passage at Galveston for New Orleans, and that a British vessel of war had arrived at Galveston, bringing despatches to the British minister. It was currently rumoured that those despatches contained an acknowledgment of Texan independence on the part of Mexico, and further, that they inclosed a proposition from the British Government, offering to Texas, in case of her refusal to accept the proposition for annexation, the admission of her cotton into British and Mexican ports free of duty for 20 years, with other commercial advantages, and a loan of 100,000*l*. for the same period! The Montreal Herald of the 29th ult. contains the particulars of the close on that day of the first session of the second Canadian Parliament. After giving his assent to about a hundred acts, the Governor-General delivered an address, in which is the following paragraph:—"I have received authentic information of the passing of an act of the Legislature of the United States, which may seriously affect the commercial interests of this province. I will not fail to submit the subject for the attention of Her Majesty's Government; and I am sure that it will receive the most earnest consideration."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—After the conversation on the propriety of revising the Debtors and Creditors Act, the Duke of NORFOLK, in presenting petitions from English Roman Catholics in favour of the grant to Maynooth, thanked the Government for the gallant fight they had made against the uncharitable sentiments of past ages.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE bore testimony to the irreproachable conduct of the Roman Catholics of England during the 16 years that had elapsed since they were admitted to the exercise of civic rights, and declared his approval both of the principle of the measure and of its details. He thought the money for the endowment might fairly be taken from the funds of the United Kingdom, because he did not consider this a local measure, but one which would benefit the whole mass of society. The great body of the clergy were now opposed to the grant, but the time would come when they would lament that the Government and Parliament had outstripped them in liberality.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY also approved of the Bill, and the Earl of SHREWSBURY expressed his sense of the good feeling of Government.

Monday. The Earl of RIPON laid on the table a Bill for altering the law relating to bringing appeals from India before the Privy Council, which was read a first time.—On the motion of the Lord CHANCELLOR, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Debtors and Creditors Act of last year. The Marquis of CLANRICARDE drew attention to the facts of a disgraceful scene which had taken place in Newgate, on the delivery of the condemned sermon preached on last Sunday, prior to the execution of Hooker. The chapel was turned into a theatre, admission was by tickets from the sheriffs, and the criminal was so placed as to be submitted to the scrutiny of all who felt pleasure in watching the movements of the prisoner's feelings, as evidenced by the countenance. In the strongest manner the Marquis deprecated the prostitution of our solemn church service and liturgy to purposes so theatrical as these: and pointed out the absurdity, if not the injustice, of causing an unconvicted prisoner (Connor) to receive the Sacrament on the same apparent terms as that of the convicted criminal, whose dying hours were thus rendered a scene for the pleasurable excitement of spectators. For these reasons he thought their lordships would not object to his making a motion without notice for a copy of the regulations relating to the attendance at Divine service in the chapel of Newgate by criminals convicted of murder, and by persons committed for trial.—Lord BROUGHAM severely blamed the City authorities for pandering to the prurient curiosity of the foolish and idle portion of the community. From the condemned sermon in the chapel of Newgate he held that the public and reporters ought to be excluded. Every publicity ought to be given to the punishment which was to be inflicted, and every publicity ought to be given to the trial and to the sentence: but it was no part of the sentence that the unfortunate individual should be subjected to the torment of meeting the public eye, and should be disturbed in the solemn act of devotion, of endeavouring to make his peace with offended heaven, on the very eve of that day on which the execution of his sentence was to be carried into effect. Lord STANLEY said there could be but one feeling with respect to the extreme propriety and indelicacy of the proceeding. The Government could have no objection to produce the returns desired; and he believed that the account read by the noble Marquis was, in the main, correct. Still the motion was not founded on information on which the House was usually disposed to act. If Lord Clanricarde would consent to withdraw his motion, he would undertake that the Home Secretary would make every inquiry, as on a former occasion, into the matter, and demand an explanation from the City authorities. The House might rest assured that Government would use every means in their power to put an end to such scandalous scenes. The motion of the Marquis also omitted one important point—information must be obtained, not only as to the regulation of the prison regarding the attendance of prisoners at the condemned sermon, but respecting the admission of the public and reporters on such occasions by which the display was caused.—The Duke of RICHMOND suggested that as the promise of the City authorities had been found to be worth nothing, a Bill should be passed directing that no persons, excepting the prisoners and the officers, should be present during the condemned service.—Lord CAMPBELL, Lord DENMAN, and Lord REDESDALE severally denounced the public parade made of the unfortunate convict Hooker in the strongest terms of indignation.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE then withdrew his motion. The Noble Marquis moved for a return of all the railway projects submitted to the consideration of the Board of Trade, showing the date at which each such project was received, and specifying those upon which the Board of Trade had reported to Parliament, which was ordered.

Tuesday.—On the motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, a Bill to repeal so much of the Turnpike Act of Scotland as permits tollgate-keepers to sell spirits and beer, was read a first time.—The Duke of BUCKINGHAM gave notice, that on Friday he should put a question to the Government with respect to the power of a chaplain of a gaol to retain the confession of a criminal, and to refuse to give it up to the justices.—On the motion of the Bishop of LONDON, the Church Buildings Act was read a second time.—The Customs Duties Bill was read a second time.—the Duke of RICHMOND having consented to take the discussion on the principles of the Bill upon going into committee.—Lord MONTEAGLE gave notice that the resolution which he intended to propose on the subject of the Bangor and St. Asaph Bill would be, that the two bishoprics should be united: but that the surplus revenues should be applied towards the increase of the stipends of some clergymen in Wales.—Lord DENMAN moved the second reading of a Bill, the object of which was to permit persons who had, from scruples of conscience, an objection to be sworn as to the truth of their schedules, to substitute in place a solemn declaration: but on the recommendation of the LORD CHANCELLOR, he withdrew it for the present.—On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the Bail in Error Bill passed through committee.—On the motion for the second reading of the Auction Duties Bill, Lord BROUGHAM made a speech against it, in the course of which he instanced a case in which a return made to a certain income-tax commissioner had found its way into a chandler's shop, at the east end of London, where it was used for wrapping paper. The noble and learned lord exhibited the return to the Lord Chancellor, and called on Government to investigate the gross misconduct of the commissioners, in thus exposing the statements meant only for their secret information. Lord Brougham likewise complained that income-tax commissioners were in the habit of talking about returns made to them, and instanced the case of a person having said that a villa in the neighbourhood of Clapham "might soon be had" by an individual whose annual [illegible] had made a return that his profits, as a city merchant, during a certain period amounted to "nil." The Bill was read a second time.—On the motion of Lord STANLEY, the Colonial Passengers Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—After the preliminary business noticed in our last, the House resolved itself into committee, and Sir R. PEEL stated the general principles of his proposed measure with respect to banking in Scotland and Ireland. Referring to the Bank Act of last session, and admitting that the period had been very brief for testing its results, he yet thought that whatever experience had been acquired was satisfactory. An unregulated and unlimited competition in the issue of paper currency, afforded no guarantee or security for convertibility, or against violent contractions, affecting the whole of our public credit. But by that act, limiting the issues both of the Bank of England and of the country and joint-stock banks, to a given amount on the securities, and leaving them at liberty to issue in excess as much as they pleased, provided that excess was based on gold and silver actually held, we had established a principle in England which it was expedient and just should be applied to Scotland and Ireland. In England the measure worked beneficially: in a time of commercial revival and of speculative movements in railroads, there had been no cripping of the operations of commerce; and even those who originally opposed it were now admitting that it had increased confidence in the general stability of the monetary concerns of the country. The English country bankers have also honourably adapted themselves to the new conditions imposed on them, and all the projected schemes for devising new forms of paper currency, in order to evade the provisions of the act, had met with general and decided discouragement, and nothing had occurred to warrant the interference of Parliament in order to give full effect to its measure. In England, in addition to regulating issues, we prohibited the creation of any new bank of issue; and this principle, it was expedient as well as just, should be extended to the whole of the United Kingdom. He would not purchase any theoretical or even practical benefit, by injury to existing interests, or at the hazard of disturbing existing habits and feelings; and, therefore, in applying the general principle, it should be done with reference to local customs. In Ireland there was a National Bank, having peculiar privileges; and in addition, there were seven other joint-stock banks, which were banks of issue. The law in Ireland relative to banking was complicated and unsatisfactory, and at some future period of greater leisure they would revise and simplify it. But at present he confined himself to the banks of issue and their power of creating currency. The Bank of Ireland, to which there is a debt due from the Government, bearing interest at three and a half per cent., has the exclusive privilege of issue within 65 miles round Dublin; and no other bank of issue can have even a place of business, or a branch agency in the Irish metropolis. This was received with [illegible] by the customers of the other banks of issue, the number of whom number 4000*l*. The metropolis, as the centre of business and attraction, was naturally the field of much banking business, which rendered the restriction in favour of the Bank of Ireland to be felt as an awkward and injurious impediment. He would therefore propose to take away the exclusive privileges of the Bank of Ireland, and enable the other seven banks of issue to circulate their notes and have places of business in Dublin. The Bank of Ireland, on this subject, had met the Government liberally. It freely consented to the removal of their privileges, merely asking that the same restrictions should be placed on other banks as on them. The directors had also voluntarily proposed that in future there should be no distinctions in the oaths taken by Protestant and Roman Catholic directors and proprietors. The bank would still remain the bank of Government; and is to receive for 10 years certain three and a half per cent. on the debt due to it; but this is to be [illegible] charges for management. A weekly return is to be made to Government as that required from the Bank of England, which has given such a feeling of satisfaction and security to the commercial world. In Scotland there was no national bank. There were 19 banks of issue in all, three being chartered banks, with a limited liability. These eight banks in Ireland and 19 in Scotland now issue notes under the value of 5*l*. With this power he will not interfere. It may be a question whether or not an extreme value was attached to these small notes: but he will not shock prejudices, or encounter the unanimous opposition of Scotland, aided by that of Ireland, by any attempt to change the system. He did not guarantee that no change would ever be made, for he would not fetter the power of Parliament hereafter. Nor, while leaving the small notes untouched, will he propose any vexatious interference with their issue. The privilege of issuing below 5*l*. is to continue, without any restriction in the proportion which 1*l*. and 2*l*. notes may bear to notes of higher value. A principle exactly analagous to that which is applied to joint-stock and country banks in England is to be taken in order to regulate the issues of the banks of Ireland and Scotland. An average of their issues during a given period is to be the maximum of issue on securities; whatever amount of paper circulation exceeds this average must be issued on gold and silver coin actually held, or on Bank of England notes, which are equal to gold, inasmuch as they must have been obtained in exchange for it. But as Bank of England paper does not enter into ordinary circulation in Scotland, the excess of issue there may be based exclusively on specie, and not necessarily on Bank of England paper. The period selected for ascertaining the average issue of the banks is the 13 lunar months, from April 27 of last year to the same date of the present. In Scotland, owing to certain peculiarities in the circulation, by which it is greatly in excess at one period of the year as compared with another, a weekly return of the issues of the banks would operate inconveniently. They will therefore be allowed to divide the amount of their notes in circulation by four, that is, the average of four weeks will be the rule, instead of confining them week by week to the limit allowed. In whatever amount their circulation shall be in excess, Government intend to trust to the honour of the banks that they hold in their hands an amount of specie, corresponding to that excess, simply reserving to the executive Government an extraordinary power of inquiry, if any suspicion should arise as to returns being falsified or incorrect. The returns are to specify the different kinds of notes above or below the value of 5*l*.: the names of the partners in all banks are to be periodically published; and there is also to be a weekly private return of the amount of specie held by each bank, not for publication, but for the information of the Government, and to serve as a basis for statistical purposes. The period when the law is to come into effect is the 1st January next, thus giving ample time for preparation. After showing, by the existing practice of the Provincial Bank of Ireland, that no inconvenience could be felt from a retention of a large amount of specie, in order to cover its paper circulation, he concluded by enforcing the necessity for his measure, in order to bring about uniformity in the banking system of the United Kingdom, give the Bank of England the power of guarding against political and commercial panics, and place our monetary condition on a stable foundation. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in two Bills, one for Scotland and one for Ireland, in order to amend the laws relating to banking in these countries.—Mr. FOX MAULE, while refraining from expressing any opinion on the proposed measure, felt bound to say that it was not nearly so bad as he had expected.—M. P. M. STEWART regretted the Scotch banking system had not been left alone; however, the almost imperceptible manner in which the right hon. Baronet touched it, showed that he himself was imbued with the Scotch feeling and spirit, that their system had attained as high a state of perfection as they could almost hope to reach.—Mr. COLQUHOUN suggested that the proposed average of 13 months would operate with severity in the agricultural districts.—Mr. HUME thought that, if the measure would be of no benefit to Scotland, it would be of immense advantage to Ireland.—Mr. SHEIL, on the part of Ireland returned Sir R. Peel thanks for his proposition.—The committee agreed to resolutions that two Bills, one for Ireland and one for Scotland, be brought in, in accordance with the Premier's plan. The House then went into committee on the grant to Maynooth, and the vote for 30,000*l.* out of the consolidated fund, to defray the expenses of purchasing land and erecting buildings for the college of Maynooth, and to provide salaries for its professors and students, was agreed to—Mr. LAW having, at the request of Sir R. Peel, foregone his intended amendment, and given notice that, on the bringing up of the report, he should move "That the report be brought up that day six months."—The House resumed, and in committee of ways and means, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER obtained a vote of Exchequer-bills to the amount of 9,379,000*l.*—On the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, the Physic and Surgery Bill and the College of Physicians and Surgeons Bill were read a second time.—The Justices' Clerks and Clerks of the Peace Bill passed through committee.—The Sheriffs (Wales) Bill was read a second time. The Calico Print-works Bill passed through committee.—The Heritable Securities (Scotland) Bill and the Colonial Passengers Bill were read a third time and passed.

Monday.—Colonel AUSTEN took his seat for West Kent.—On the Report of the Winwick Rectory Bill, Sir R. INGLIS passed an eulogium on the rector, Mr. Hornby, who had, for the good of the Church, himself urged the introduction of this Bill, which divides the rectory into seven livings, all to be endowed out of that which had been heretofore exclusively his own. In reply to Mr. COLLETT, Mr. HOPE stated that neither of the new Bishopries of New Brunswick or Columbo would cost the public fund of this country a shilling.—Mr. GRIMSDITCH originated an interesting conversation on the precarious position of the property of British subjects in Brazil.—Sir R. PEEL stated that the matter was under the consideration of the Government, and that everything should be done to secure to British property in the Brazils proper protection.—Mr. SHEIL, unsatisfied with the result of this conversation, said that a resolution should be moved expressive of the opinion of the House with regard to the impolitic course pursued by the Government in its negotiations with Brazil; and, if no other hon. member would propose such, he should take an early opportunity of doing so.—On the motion for bringing up the report of the resolution voting the Maynooth grant out of the consolidated fund, Mr. LAW met it by a direct negative, moving that the report be received that day six months. He supported his amendment by contending that the permanent endowment of Maynooth was a violation of those principles which the Reformation elicited, the Revolution confirmed, and the union with England and Ireland had rendered indisputable. The Roman Catholics had testified their competency to support, by voluntary endowment, their own institutions, without the necessity of resorting to the Consolidated Fund. He argued, at some length, against the impolicy, the inconsistency, and the danger of taxing a Protestant community permanently, in order to support a Roman Catholic institution.—Mr. V. SMITH reviewed the entire question, pointed out the equivocal position in which all parties had been placed by this measure, but professed his willingness to encounter any individual risk or any party discredit to carry what he believed to be, however small, a satisfactory movement towards the recognition and endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland.—Lord NORREYS, Lord DALMENY, and Sir CHARLES DOUGLAS, all supported the Bill.—Mr. HAWES also supported it, on the ground that it would lead ultimately to a great reform of the Protestant Establishment, and thereby bring about a legitimate pacification of Ireland. He preferred that the funds should come out of the superfluous revenues of the Establishment, but, failing that, supported the measure as wise and liberal.—Mr. HINDLEY, while professing his warmest attachment to the civil rights of the Roman Catholics, and his anxiety to extend them to the utmost, indignantly denied that the Dissenters were chargeable with bigotry, because they repudiated any farther endowment of religious opinions. He reminded the House that it was as an accompaniment of an emphatic declaration of the truth of the voluntary system that Mr. O'Connell uttered his witty parody, "Three colonels in three distant counties born," &c., and urged that the voluntary principle was the only vital one on which the diffusion of religion could be effectively based.—Mr. ROUND and Mr. BORTHWICK supported the Bill. Mr. BROTHERTON, while in favour of the civil rights of his Roman Catholic fellow subjects, reluctantly opposed it.—Mr. F. MAULE opposed it, and read a memorandum made by Dr. Buchanan, of Glasgow, of certain remarkable words spoken by Sir R. Peel in 1838, in answer to a deputation on the subject of an extension of spiritual accommodation in the Church of Scotland. On this occasion, according to Dr. Buchanan, Sir R. Peel said that, for the security of the Protestant faith, Protestants of all castes ought to join in resisting the encroachments of Popery. That, looking at the movements of Popery in Prussia and Belgium, at the re-establishment of the order of Jesuits in most of the countries of Europe, and at the erection and extension of Popish chapels all over the country, it was impossible to look at the extension of Popery without anxiety and alarm, and that the struggle was clearly coming whether or not Protestantism was to retain its supremacy in the empire.—Mr. PRINGLE, who had been one of the deputation on the occasion referred to, corroborated the substance of the words attributed to Sir R. Peel, but expressed his conviction that the Premier did not think he was elevating the Roman Catholic Church at the expense of the Established Church by his present measure, although he (Mr. Pringle) thought such would be the result.—Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL accepted the grant as the first of a series of measures conciliatory to Ireland. But he warned them that the country would never be pacified without a reduction of the Established Church to its legitimate uses. He deprecated the anti-social spirit which denounced "Popery," yet expressed his opinion that even on a religious question the good sense of the English people would triumph, when the temporary clamour had passed away.—Sir R. PEEL, treating the opposition now raised as similar to that which had been decided on the second reading of the Bill, went into personal explanations justificatory of his conduct. In 1829, up till a month of the proposition of Catholic emancipation, he had contemplated retirement from office, intending in his private capacity to support what he conceived to be a great national necessity. It was only when it was distinctly shown to him that his retirement would peril the measure, both with the highest authorities in State and Church, as well as with the public, that he consented to share the obloquy of proposing it. Referring to the Rev. Dr. Buchanan's statement, he thought that learned divine took an unfair advantage in now, for the first time, producing a note of a private conversation which had taken place seven years ago. He did not recollect what he had then said, though he admitted that he might possibly have referred to the religious agitation in Prussia, and have given his opinion that the aspect of affairs was ominous for Protestant establishments. But whatever might have been his sentiments, he distinctly denied having ever been a party to any "No Popery" cry; he proposed the grant for Maynooth when he was Secretary for Ireland, and he supported it in 1841, in opposition to a general feeling amongst his own party. Defending his conduct as a public man, he stated that what had now taken place only proved to him the necessity of removing from the legislature this prolific source of angry polemics. He feared that he would not satisfy the expectations of the Roman Catholics, as elicited during the discussion; but the opposition to the measure, so far from relaxing his exertions to pass it, only imposed on him an additional obligation to do so. It was his firm conviction that the carrying of the bill was necessary to convince Roman Catholics that nothing would induce public men to abandon what they considered at once just and necessary. For his part, what he had undertaken he would not abandon, but would, in or out of office, endeavour to fulfil.—After remarks from Lord WORSLEY and Mr. COLLETT, who supported the grant, and Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, who opposed it, the House divided. For bringing up the report, 232; against it, 119; Majority for Ministers, 113.—On the reception of the report, Mr. TANCRED moved, as an amendment, the addition of the following words:—"Until provision shall be made for the same by any Act to be passed in this or any subsequent session of Parliament either out of any surplus in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland, or by an assessment of the lands of Ireland to an amount equivalent to the remission of tithes made to the landlords of Ireland by the Tithe Commutation Act, as Parliament may deem most advisable."—The House again divided:—For receiving the report, 128; For Mr. Tancred's amendment, 52; Majority, 76. The report was then received.—The Museums of Art Bill was read a third time and passed.

Tuesday.—The House did not sit, 40 members not having been present when the Speaker took the chair. This is the first time that such an event has occurred during the session.

Wednesday.—Mr. T. S. DUNCOMBE gave notice that, in the event of the Maynooth College Bill being read a third time, he should move that its provisions be limited to three years.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD gave notice of an amendment on Lord J. Russell's resolutions touching the condition of the working classes, having reference to the extension of the Parliamentary franchise.—An arrangement was entered into between Lord J. RUSSELL, Sir R. PEEL, and Sir R. INGLIS, under which the committal of the Maynooth Bill stands fixed for Friday next, and its third reading for Monday, the 19th inst., and Lord J. Russell's resolutions were postponed to Monday, the 26th inst. The Calico Print-works Bill was read a third time and passed. At the request of Sir J. GRAHAM, Mr. WATSON postponed the second reading of the Roman Catholics Relief Bill to the 28th inst.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE withdrew the Arrestment of Wages (Scotland) Bill. The Canal Companies Toll Bill, and the Canal Companies Carriers Bill, were read a second time, and the Common Law Process Bill was read a first time.

Thursday.—The Lords' amendments to the Companies Clauses, Railway Clauses, and Land Clauses Consolidation Bills were severally agreed to.—Mr. LABOUCHERE complained of the way in which a clause had been introduced into the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill, by an individual member, at a late hour of the night, without being printed, and without discussion. The purport of this clause was to compel railway companies to give compensation where turnpike trusts happened to be injured; or, in other words, to transfer the responsibility of these trusts from those who are at present responsible, to the railway companies whose lines may happen to interfere with them.—The LORD ADVOCATE admitted that he had assented to the introduction of the clause without properly understanding its bearing; and, amidst considerable cheering, asked leave to withdraw the Bill, in order that it may be re-introduced, and go through all its stages once more, and thus the clause, if it should happen to be retained in the new Bill, will receive ample discussion.—Sir G. CLERK, on the part of Lord G. SOMERSET, proposed to the House the new standing order relative to Railway Bills, of which notice had been given, but upon its being opposed he withdrew it.—Mr. C. BULLER, who had a notice of motion for next Tuesday, for a committee of the whole House, to consider the affairs of New Zealand, stated that he understood that a proposition for settling the affairs of the colony was under the consideration of the Government, and under these circumstances he thought it best to withdraw his motion.—Mr. RUTHERFORD moved for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate admission to lay or secular chairs of the Universities of Scotland. What he proposed was to introduce a Bill for the purpose of declaring that on the admission of professors to lay or secular chairs in these Universities, they should not hereafter be required to make the declaration enjoined by the Scotch Acts of 1609 and 1707. The separation of a large class of the people of Scotland from the Church, reducing them to the class of Dissenters, rendered the grievance of those statutes greater than it had hitherto been, and even within the last three weeks there had been a meeting of the Senatus Academicus of Edinburgh, at which that body had come to a resolution in favour of his proposal; besides which, all the professors, with a single exception, were of opinion that those restrictions ought to be abolished, and that opinion was confirmed by the other Universities.—Mr. H. DRUMMOND supported the motion, and Mr. ACLAND thought that at least leave should be given to bring in the Bill.—Sir J. GRAHAM expressed strong doubts as to the policy of withdrawing these tests, and much hesitation as to the course he ought to pursue. On the whole, however, he, in concurrence with his colleagues in the Government, believed, with some hesitation certainly, and yet with an honest conviction, that the decision they had come to was the best which, under the circumstances, they could adopt—that the wisest coure would be that they should give the right hon. and learned gentleman leave to bring in the Bill, but, at the same time, that ample time should be allowed to Parliament to gather the opinions of the people of Scotland upon the subject, reserving to themselves a free and unfetterred right and judgment to decide upon the course to be pursued in reference to the question when those opinions should have been fully ascertained.—Mr. FOX MAULE thanked the Government for the concession, and leave was given to bring in the Bill.—The Earl of LINCOLN moved for leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the inclosure of commons and waste lands in England and Wales; and, in so doing, paid a high compliment to Lord Worsley for his disinterested exertions in maturing a Bill on this subject during the last two sessions of Parliament. In the course of last session, his Bill had been referred to a select committee, and the result of its labours, after examining a number of witnesses from all parts of the country, was a strong recommendation for the introduction of such a measure as he was then about to propose. The principle of that Bill had been already recognised by the House; and having been recognised, it was important that the Bill itself should be passed this session, as the want of it suspended all legislation at present on the subject. He then proceeded to inform the House of the details in which this Bill differed from that of Lord Worsley. The first alteration was in the constitution of the Commissioners. Lord Worsley proposed to impose the duties created by this Bill on the Tithe Commissioners. To that proposal he objected, because the Tithe Commissioners were only appointed for a temporary purpose, and because he considered it desirable that the Commissioners under this Bill should be more responsible to Parliament. He therefore proposed that the Secretary of State should have the power of appointing three Commissioners, one to be paid, and the other two to be unpaid. He proposed that the lands to be inclosed should be divided into three classes, of which one class, being mixed commonable lands, the property of individuals, should be divided by the Commissioners without the intervention of Parliament. As to the other classes of land, he proposed that the Commissioners should have no power of authorising their inclosure without the intervention of Parliament. They would be empowered to make due inquiries into the propriety of inclosing the waste and commonable lands intended for inclosure; they would embody their opinions in a report, which would be laid in the first instance before the Secretary of State, and would afterwards be laid by him before Parliament. Whatever inclosures they might recommend to be made during the year, antecedent to the meeting of Parliament, would be embodied by them in that report, and an annual Bill would then be [illegible] all those inclosures, which would thus attract [illegible] tice of Parliament, and would save great [illegible] interested in them. The Commissioners [illegible] to make a special report as to the places [illegible] apart for the labouring classes. His Bill would [illegible] greens from its operation, but would enable [illegible] to make provisions for their better fencing, [illegible] servation. It would also authorise the Commissioners [illegible] allotments for the use of the inhabitants, in proportion [illegible] numbers and to the space of ground to be inclosed. After describing the provisions by which the Commissioners would be enabled to recover the rent of those allotments, and [illegible] some of the minor details of his measure, he proceeded to show that the tendency of these alterations was all in favour of the poor, and to contend that if his bill were passed in the spirit in which it had been conceived, it would be advantageous not only to the landlords, whose property it would improve, but also to the labouring classes, to whom it would afford employment and increased means of profitable labour and [illegible] creation.—After a few words from Mr. WILLIAMS Mr. PARKER and Mr. AGLIONBY, leave was given to bring in the Bill.—The Earl of LINCOLN then obtained leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the draining of land in England and Wales. It was founded on the same principles, but was not so expensive in its operation as that proposed last year by Mr. Pusey.—This Bill, as well as the former, was then brought in and read a first time.—Sir G. CLERK next obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Seamen's Fund Act.

The Bokhara Mission.—On Tuesday a meeting was held in Exeter-hall to receive from the Rev. Dr. Wolff a narrative of his mission to Bokhara to ascertain the fate of Colonel Stoddart and Capt. Conolly. Admiral Sir E. Codrington was in the chair, supported by Lord de Mauley, Lord Gage, Sir T. D. Acland, M.P., Assayd Kayat, Chevalier Dillon, Capt. Grover, Dr. Yates, Dr. Major, the Rev. Dr. Goodchild, Captain Randall, Mr. H. Pownall, and a great many military officers, clergymen, and civilians. Mr. L. Tonna read the report of the Committee by whom the Rev. Dr. Wolff had been sent to Bokhara to ascertain the fate of those officers. They were found to have been executed in 1843, by order of the Ameer of Bokhara, and Dr. Wolff had much difficulty in obtaining permission to return home. Capt. Grover had, out of his own pocket, advanced 400*l.* towards the expense of the mission, no part of which had been repaid, and there was only a balance of 67*l.* in the hands of the committee. Capt. Grover said, that in all he had done he was influenced by a desire to ascertain the fate of those officers; and, although the committee talked of reimbursing him in the sum he had advanced to Dr. Wolff, he was resolved not to accept it from any public subscription. He had offers from Birmingham and Dublin to defray the whole sum, but he had rejected those offers, conceiving that the mission being one in which the honour of England was concerned, it should be taken up by the nation at large. The Rev. Dr. Wolff then gave a narrative of his mission, which occupied two hours and a half in delivery. The main facts have already appeared in the public papers. The rev. doctor said he had ascertained that not only Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly, but six other British officers and an Italian nobleman had been put to death by the King of Bokhara's orders. Every facility had been afforded to him by her Majesty's representatives in the various countries through which he travelled, but he attributed his release chiefly to a remonstrance of the King of Persia, who threatened Bokhara with hostilities unless Dr. Wolff, an innocent traveller, were immediately liberated. At the conclusion of Dr. Wolff's address, the Rev. G. Stoddart came forward and said, that as the only surviving brother of Colonel Stoddart, he begged to express his admiration of the generous conduct of Dr. Wolff; but he could not conceal his disapprobation at the insinuations thrown out against the relatives of Colonel Stoddart, as well as against Colonel Stoddart himself. The insinuations were put forth in a book, the authorship of which could not be mistaken. It was there said, that Colonel Stoddart had embraced Mahommedanism, but though, by the advice of friends he affected to do so, Dr. Wolff had ascertained that he died in the Christian faith. The charge of indifference to the fate of two British officers brought against Lord Aberdeen and the present Government was equally unfounded. It was not from Lord Aberdeen, but from Lord Palmerston, that they received their appointment. However, what he chiefly complained of was, the cruel misrepresentations that had gone forth respecting what was called the apathy manifested by Colonel Stoddart's relatives. In the presence of that public meeting he charged Capt. Grover with having made those cruel and false assertions. The rev. gentleman was here interrupted by loud cries of "Shame, shame," "Chair, chair," "Order, order."—Captain Grover.—I confess I have never been more astonished in my life than I am to hear such language from a clergyman. The only insinuation to which the rev. gentlemen can possibly allude is, that the relatives of my poor friend mourned for him before his fate was ascertained. A very long altercation ensued, Capt. Randall, the uncle of Mr. Stoddart, and other persons, endeavouring to persuade him to recall his offensive expressions, while he justified them, and refused to retract. The Chairman said the rev. gentleman, in refusing to give an apology, had done himself great discredit. His conduct was unworthy the character of a Christian, a gentleman, or a clergyman. After some further discussion, the thanks of the meeting were voted to Dr. Wolff, and it was agreed that a national subscription should be opened to present the rev. gentleman with some suitable testimonial. On the motion of Lord De Mauley, seconded by Sir T. Acland, the thanks of the meeting were voted to Sir Edward Codrington for his conduct in the chair.

Anti-Maynooth Conference.—A numerous body of clergymen and gentlemen, appointed as deputations by different religious bodies in various towns in the kingdom, have been holding meetings during the week at the Crown and Anchor, for the purpose of making known the state of public feeling in opposition to the Maynooth Bill. Sir C. E. Smith presided; and the meeting on Wednesday was addressed by delegates from Edinburgh, Leith, Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Aberdeen, Leamington, Newcastle, Swansea, Birmingham, Bristol, Plymouth, Lincoln, Bedford, Devonport, Taunton, Truro, Norwich, High Wycombe, and other places. On Thursday the meeting was addressed by delegates from Stroud, Derby, Wolverhampton, Cheltenham, Exeter, Halifax, Pontefract, Huddersfield, &c., and by the Hon. and Rev. M. Villiers, rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury; Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel; and Mr. Baines, of Leeds. Petitions to both Houses of Parliament against the measure were also adopted. In the evening of the same day a meeting of the deputations and their friends was held at Exeter Hall, Sir C. E. Smith, in the chair. The meeting was addressed by the Hon. and Rev. B. Noel, Rev. J. T. Robinson, rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn; Capt. Gordon, Mr. Plumptre, M.P.; Rev. T. Guthrie, of the Free Church, Edinburgh; Rev. G. Osborne, Wesleyan minister, of Manchester; Rev. T. R. Stephens, Baptist minister, of Newport; Mr. Heald, of Stockport; Rev. T. Greg, of Dublin; Rev. Dr. Halley, of Manchester; Rev. F. Scales, of Leeds; Rev. Mr. M'Donald, of the Free Church, Blairgowrie, and other gentlemen, all in opposition to the measure.

The Archdeacon of London's Visitation.—On Tuesday Archdeacon Hale held his annual visitation at St. Sepulchre's Church, Snow-hill. There were upwards of 100 of the clergy of the archdeaconry present. Prayers having been read by the Rev. George Taylor, an appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. Sir John Page Wood, Bart., and the archdeacon proceeded to deliver his charge. It was customary (he remarked) on occasions such as that, for the Archdeacon, in the charge which he delivered to the clergy, to express his opinion on those passing events of the day which had more immediate reference to the condition of the Church, with a view to deduce from them good and important lessons. He had been almost tempted, to revive that privilege this year, but circumstances had recently occurred which had thrown into the shade all the controversy about surplices and rubrics, and had directed men's minds into another channel, viz., the endowment of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth. Such a proposition as that which had recently been made to the Legislature would have been met, three or four years since, both on the part of the clergy and laity, by an universal feeling of indignation. Now, however, apathy seemed to prevail; the Church was mute, and religious principle appeared to have given way to the expediency of the politician. He thought he should not properly discharge the duties of his office if he failed to express his opinion on this matter, and to point out the nature of the contest with the Church of Rome, which the most superficial observer would perceive was rapidly approaching. With respect to the proposed enlargement of the grant to Maynooth, it must be admitted that the course of policy pursued by the present Government was not essentially different from that which had been pursued in former years, for a desire had for a long time been apparent to give grants of money to the professors of a religion which the Established Church of this country declared to be superstitious, and to afford to the see of Rome the means of propagating error and resisting the progress of truth. This evil propensity had long been perceptible, but it was certainly no reason for the continuance of evil doing, that a wrong system had been allowed for many years to prevail. One might have imagined that the pernicious influence which the Roman Catholic college had been known to exercise, would have induced the Government to withhold the grant altogether rather than have recommended an increase. With this additional income, students would be trained to propagate error throughout Ireland, to brand English Churchmen as schismatics and heretics, and to aim at the subversion of Protestant truth. All attempts, he feared, to do away with this endowment to Maynooth were hopeless. Even were they successful, they would only arrest the progress of one great national sin, as they could scarcely expect to alter that mischievous course of policy which had been so long adopted, and to which he had alluded. This desire to aggrandise the Romish Church was accompanied by a wish to cripple, as much as possible, the Established Church of this country. Last session of Parliament, the law of mortmain was relaxed in favour of the Roman Catholic Church, while a Bill brought in by the Bishop of London having for its object the endowment of curacies in populous places was rejected. The endowment of the Roman Catholic Church was evidently intended, and the increased grant to Maynooth was only one of a series of steps in that direction. The Archdeacon proceeded to contend that the grant to Maynooth was a violation of the Protestant constitution of this country, and that it was that constitution which enabled England to thwart the ambitious designs of infidel France, and had raised our native land to her present pinnacle of greatness. In the remarks he had made, he was desirous of being understood not to refer to any particular statesman, but to speak generally of the pernicious policy pursued, and to call attention to the state in which the Church of England was thereby placed—a position of imminent peril, as there was in this increased grant a recognition of the Roman Catholic religion as fostered and encouraged by the State. The Archdeacon, after some further remarks on the rapid strides of Popery, cautioned the clergy against disunion amongst themselves.

The Fine Arts.—On Saturday the auction-rooms of Messrs. Christie and Manson were crowded by the nobility, and lovers of the fine arts, to witness the disposal of the collection of paintings by the best modern artists, formed by the late Geo. Knott, Esq., of Bohun Lodge. There were 71 pictures in the catalogue, among which were some of the finest pictures by the late Sir A. Calcott, Stanfield, W. Collins, Etty, Mulready, Leslie, Roberts. The price each picture fetched was extraordinary, and the following brief notice of some of the pictures sold will be read with interest, and show that in this country the fine arts are not retrogading, but that a premium is held out to sterling talent. "An English Landscape," by the late Sir A. Callcott, R.A., fetched the extraordinary price of 950 guineas. It was exhibited two years since at the Royal Academy Exhibition, when the late possessor became its purchaser for 400 guineas. The celebrated picture by Stanfield, of the "Castello D'Ischia from the Mole," from which the engraving given to the subscribers to the Art-Union is taken, sold for 680 guineas. A fine picture by C. R. Leslie, R.A., of "A Scene from the Vicar of Wakefield," sold for 650 guineas. A pretty little picture by Mulready, of "The Widow," painted with great effect, sold for 400 guineas. "The Ruins of Baalbec, with Mount Lebanon in the distance," illustrating a quotation from "Lalla Rookh," painted by D. Roberts, R.A., sold for 360 guineas; and other works realised similarly high prices.

University College.—The annual meeting for the distribution of prizes in the medical department of this College took place on Wednesday, Dr. Paris, President of the Royal College of Physicians, in the chair. There were also present—Lord Auckland, Sir I. L. Goldsmid, Bart., Mr. Christie, M.P., and other gentlemen. The report stated that 306 pupils were now attending the medical classes, 94 of whom commenced their studies this session at the college. Several had distinguished themselves at the examinations for honours in the University of London. After the prizes had been distributed, Dr. Paris congratulated the successful candidates on their proficiency, and complimented the Professors on the subjects taught, and the manner in which information was communicated.

King's College.—The annual distribution of prizes to the medical students of this College took place on Saturday, the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair, supported by the Bishops of London and Lichfield, Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, Sir R. Inglis, &c. The medical scholarship of 40*l.* a-year, for three years, was awarded to Mr. W. F. Noott, and numerous prizes were awarded to other pupils.—The annual meeting of the proprietors of the College was held on Monday, the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The report stated that the number of students was 849, being more than had attended for the last two years. It also congratulated the proprietors on the distinction which some of the students had obtained during the year at Oxford and Cambridge—one having been elected a fellow of Brasennose, and three having become wranglers. The hospital had received 1000 patients more this year than during the year preceding. The total receipts, including fees of pupils, was 22,276*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.*; expenditure 21,434*l.* 13*s.*; leaving a balance of 1441*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* There was now funded, in Exchequer bills, 4442*l.*, whilst the estimated liabilities of the college was 4275*l.*

The Fountains in Trafalgar Square.—The fountains are now in operation from 9 in the morning until dusk. Although the jet only rises to a height of about five or six feet, and produces a most paltry effect, the supply of water exceeds 500 gallons per minute, and so profuse is its flow in the wells, that after working all day the water does not diminish more than five feet. The Chelsea Water Company, which have hitherto supplied the Government offices, have received orders to discontinue their supply at Midsummer, the mains having been laid down to furnish water from the cisterns at the engine-house in Orange-street, by which it is estimated that an annual saving of 500*l.* will be effected. Arrangements are making to light Trafalgar-square with the Bude light.

Mastership of the Temple.—The Rev. Dr. Robinson, morning preacher at the Foundling, and formerly Archdeacon of Madras, has been appointed Master of the Temple, in the room of the Rev. Mr. Benson, resigned.

Panorama of Nanking.—Mr. Burford has opened a large panorama of the city of Nanking and of the surrounding country, which is generally regarded as one of the best he has yet painted. It contains a good view of the whole town, with its public buildings, fortifications, and canals. The most striking object of all is the celebrated tower of porcelain. There are also portraits of—Nieu Kien, governor of Nanking; Whang, first lord of the treasury; Ke-ying, principal Chinese commissioner; Elepoo, second Chinese commissioner; Sir Henry Pottinger, Sir Hugh Gough, Captain Loch, Captain Fitzjames Chin, the Tartar general; Mr. Gutzlaff, the late Mr. Morrison, Vice-Admiral Sir W. Parker, Major-General Lord Saltoun, and Major Anstruther. The tints and hues of the trees and flowers contained in the picture are exceedingly varied and natural, and Mr. Burford has altogether produced a picture which will probably make the appearance of Nanking better known to the sight-seers of London, than to half the inhabitants of Nanking itself.

New Church for Seamen.—On Wednesday afternoon a meeting was held in Crosby hall, for the purpose of taking steps to procure the erection of a church on a piece of ground which has been purchased in the neighbourhood of the London-docks, for the accommodation of seamen of the port of London. The Earl of Haddington, First Lord of the Admiralty, was in the chair, supported by the Marquis of Cholmondeley, the Bishop of London, Admiral Earl Cadogan, Admiral Lord Radstock, Admiral Bowles, Lord H. Cholmondeley, Sir E. Parry, R.N., Sir W. Baker, R.N., Sir A. Clifford, Bart., Mr. G. R. Robinson (Chairman of Lloyd's), Mr. Labouchere, Captain Hope, R.N., and Mr. W. Cotton. The Chairman stated that it was proposed to erect a church capable of seating 800 persons, and if that proposition met with the support which, from its patriotic and Christian character it was entitled to, the work would soon be completed. The Bishop of London moved the first resolution expressive of the importance and desirability of the proposed erection, and in doing so, expressed his gratitude that men so high in official station were present on that platform, and his opinion that it was the duty of Government to take steps to afford religious instruction to those in the public service. The resolution having been seconded by Mr. G. R. Robinson, was carried unanimously. Various other resolutions having been carried, subscriptions to a considerable amount were handed in, headed by the Queen Dowager with 50*l.*

Opening of the Hungerford and Lambeth Suspension Bridge.—This bridge was opened to the public on Thursday, attracting throughout the day, no less than 20,000 visitors, the majority influenced, doubtless, by mere curiosity. The "opening" was not marked by any parade, the directors contenting themselves by throwing the bridge open for public traffic upon payment of a toll of one halfpenny each person. In the evening the directors, committee, and shareholders, dined at the London Tavern to celebrate the occasion, W. Hawes, Esq., in the chair.

Execution of Hocker.—The last sentence of the law was carried into effect on Monday morning upon the culprit Thomas Henry Hocker, for the murder of Mr. Delarue, at Hampstead. On his return to his cell, after hearing the condemned sermon on Sunday, he shed tears, for the first time, and it was generally expected from his altered manner that he would make a confession. On Sunday evening he was engaged some hours in writing what was supposed to be his confession, but a short time previous to his execution he showed that this expectation was not correct, by handing a written statement to the ordinary, in which he declared his entire innocence of the crime, and repeated that a man whom he had treated as his friend was the murderer of Mr. Delarue. The statement, however, though written with considerable talent, contained so many contradictions, that no reliance could be placed on its truth in any particular. He also wrote two letters to different young women, which left no doubt that he has been acting with systematic hypocrisy and falsehood throughout the whole transaction. At last, however, the physical strength, which had hitherto enabled the culprit to maintain his composure and indifference gave way, and when he heard the clock strike the hour fixed for the execution, he fainted, and was obliged to be supported to the scaffold. Death was instantaneous, and the immense crowd that had assembled, witnessed the execution in silence, presenting in this respect a singular contrast to the yells and hisses usually heard on such occasions. In reference to the prison arrangements, it will be seen by our Parliamentary report, that the delivery of the condemned sermon on Sunday, in the chapel of Newgate, was made the scene of a display but little in accordance with the solemnity of the occasion. The reporters of the newspapers, and other persons, were admitted, by tickets, to seats reserved for them, just as they are admitted to public meetings of ordinary character; and the man Connor, who has been committed for trial, on the charge of having murdered a woman in St. Giles's, was placed opposite the pulpit in a separate chair, and although not yet tried, was pointedly alluded to as a murderer by the chaplain. The effect of the service on his countenance was also described by the reporters; and the whole proceeding was so glaring a violation of propriety, that Government, if not Parliament, will immediately interfere to prevent the city authorities from making any such displays in future.

The Murder of Eliza Davis Eight Years Ago.—In 1837, a barbarous murder was committed on the person of Eliza Davis, barmaid to Mr. Wadley, landlord of the King's Arms, Frederick-street, Regent's-park. The affair caused a considerable degree of excitement, but no clue could be gained with regard to the perpetrator of the murder. On Saturday a well-dressed young man, who gave his name Walter Chambers, and who stated at the station-house that he resided at 40, Whittlebury-street, Euston-square, was brought up in custody and placed at the bar of Marylebone-office, charged, on his own confession, with having committed the murder. The prisoner, in explanation, stated that he was drunk when he made the confession, and he was remanded until Friday for further inquiry.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending April 26:—West Districts, 157; Northern, 180; Central, 154; Eastern, 168; Southern, 245; Total, 904; males, 448; females, 456. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1299; males, 689; females, 610.

Provincial.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The adjourned inquest on the persons killed by the late accident on the Sheffield and Manchester railway terminated on Thursday, when the two juries for Lancashire and Cheshire collectively returned a verdict of "Accidental death," accompanied by a strongly expressed opinion that the accident was attributable to the bad or insufficient quality of the materials used, the inferior workmanship, and the negligence of the company's servants: and that the coroner be requested to forward the minutes of evidence taken before them to the Lords of the Treasury or Board of Trade, with a view to having the works inspected by a competent engineer, prior the opening of the line to the public.

Brighton.—It is stated by the Sussex Advertiser that, in consequence of recent events, so much dissatisfaction has been created among the agricultural interest in this county, that it has been determined to bring forward two tenant-farmers as candidates for the representation of East Sussex, at the next election. The names of two gentlemen have been mentioned, who have consented to stand in the event of no other candidates among the tenant-farmers being found more eligible.

Cambridge.—A meeting of the Cambridge Camden Society was held last week, the Archdeacon of Bristol, president, in the chair. The Secretary read a report of the committee, giving the opinions of Sir W. Follett and Mr. Starkie as to the power of the Society to dissolve itself. The opinion given was in effect that, "no provision being made by the laws of the society for a dissolution, we are of opinion that a dissolution cannot be duly and completely effected in the manner proposed, that is, by the resolution of a majority of members present at a meeting, such majority not being a majority of the whole members of the society; and that in strictness, no consent, even of a majority of the whole society, can have the effect of wholly dissolving the society so long as members remain who are desirous of its continuance, although it is competent to such majority, or such of them as think fit, to withdraw themselves from the society. In order to a complete dissolution of the society, we think the consent of the individual members constituting the society ought to be obtained." These two eminent lawyers, however, think that proxies might be allowed, and recommend that a general meeting should be called, and thus the individual opinions be obtained. The meeting then adjourned till the 8th May. —The churchwardens of the Round Church have abandoned their appeal to the Privy Council, and the matter so long at issue is now set at rest. A table of handsome form, carved in a costly manner, and made of oak, to correspond with the other furniture of the church, and communion-rails of the same material, are ordered to be got ready as soon as possible, that the church may be opened for divine service in a few Sundays.

Guernsey and Jersey.—The Post-offices authorities have given notice, that on and after the 26th inst. the mails for the Channel Islands will be conveyed from Southampton, instead of from Weymouth as at present. The mails, it is stated, will be made up and despatched from Southampton on the evenings of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.—Mr. Carus Wilson, whose case has recently excited so much attention, landed at Jersey on Saturday, in custody of the jailor, and was again consigned to prison by the final judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. Mr. Wilson was not taken into custody in London without some violence on his part towards the officers, who were obliged to obtain the interference of the Lord Mayor before he would surrender.

Isle of Wight.—Prince Albert has purchased the Woodhouse estate, which includes the Isle of Wight race-course, and the whole of the land from Osborne and Barton to King's Quay Creek, about 1400 acres. Her Majesty and the Prince are expected down about the 8th of May. The Woodhouse estate was the property of the Hon. W. H. A. A'Court Holmes, M.P., who has for some time discharged his gamekeepers, and declared the game on his estates to be the property of the tenants on whose crops they feed.

Liverpool.—The local papers state that last week, Prince Rupert's Cottage, the last relic of antiquity in the immediate neighbourhood of the town, was demolished, to the great regret of many who feel an interest in the early history of Liverpool. The cottage, however, had become greatly dilapidated; and the modern improvements in the locality, including the new park opposite Shaw-street, rendered its removal a matter of necessity.

Northleach.—Another inquest has been held on a person who is supposed to have died a victim to the treatment which prisoners receive at this place. The person's name was W. Smart, who was confined for poaching. The jury after a protracted examination, found a verdict as follows:—"The undersigned find that the deceased, William Smart, died from disease of the brain, and effects therefrom; that such death was accelerated by the improper treatment the deceased experienced at the hands of the medical officer of Northleach House of Correction, Mr. J. R. Bedwell, and the course pursued by Mr. J. Riste, surgeon, when called in by the visiting magistrates to examine deceased as to his state of mind; but that such medical treatment and course pursued arose from error in judgment, and was not wanton, wilful, or malicious." Four jurymen dissented from the qualification in the last sentence of the verdict.

Oxford.—It is stated that the Hebdomadal Board determined on Monday last, after duly weighing the requisition, to proceed no farther in the matter of Tract 90.—A convocation was held in this University last week at which Mr. Ward appeared in full costume of a Master of Arts. On the Vice-Chancellor proposing the assent of the house to a letter to his Grace the Chancellor, Mr. Ward gave a non placet, which was taken no notice of, and the rev. gentleman called for a division of the house, which was equally disregarded. It was generally understood that Mr. Ward was acting under the advice of his counsel, with reference to the form of the legal proceedings about to be adopted in his case.

Portsmouth.—H.M.S. Skylark, Lieut. Morris, with volunteers for the navy, from Liverpool, was totally lost near St. Alban's Head, on Friday morning. It is reported that the Experimental Squadron of Line-of-Battle Ships, will rendezvous at Portsmouth preparatory to their proceeding on their trial cruise, and that Her Majesty will personally inspect the fleet at Spithead. Since Her Majesty's accession to the throne there has not been such an assemblage of ships of the line at any of the English ports.—The proceedings of the court-martial held on board the Fisgard at Valparaiso, on the 9th December, on Lieut. Bridge, senior-lieutenant of the Cormorant,—for an alleged breach of the 23d article of war, in having refused to shake hands with Mr. Crompton, the British Vice-Consul at Islay, when the Court declared the charge, after three days' sitting, to be partly proven, and adjudged Lieutenant Bridge to be dismissed his ship—have been annulled by the Admiralty.

Salisbury.—The Bishop of Salisbury has just concluded the triennial visitation of his diocese.

His Lordship commenced his charge by observing that they were assembled at a time when the minds of a large portion of the Members of the Church were excited in a very unusual manner, when discussions on various subjects were carried on in a spririt and with a bittterness which no earnestness for the truth could justify; and when, as the fruits of such dissensions, people were alienated from their pastors, and suspicions and jealousies rankled in the hearts of many who did not openly express them. It was not to be expected that all, even of themselves, should exactly agree as to those differences, but it was hardly possible that they should not estimate alike the amount of evil which was indicated by such exhibitions of them as they had recently seen. It would be almost needless for him to say that the immediate objects in which the existing differences in the Church had of late most conspicuously manifested themselves, were certain isolated diversities in the celebration of divine service. Into a detailed examination of these points he did not intend to enter, because such a discussion, unless full and accurate, would be worse than useless. It did not appear to him that any effort should be made to do away with the possibility of these diversities, by the only legislative power which could rightly interfere, and to call on the conjoint authority of the Church in its synodical assemblies, and of the state, through the Crown and Parliament, in order to clear up everything less doubtful, and to enforce the observance of whatever might be approved. He did not mean to say that it would not be well, under other circumstances, and in a different spirit, that the attention of the Church should be directed in the most authoritative manner to the points which gave occasion to the differences, as he believed that much good might be done, and much evil prevented, by any measure by which its system could be adapted to the changes which time makes in the fabric of society, and its energies be directed, not by the mere voluntary efforts of individuals, but by lawful and full recognition of the privileges and the more earnest discharge of the duties which rightfully devolve upon it both at home and abroad. Rather than look to legislative enactments for a remedy to their present distractions, he would trust to a return to that moderation and sobriety of feeling in the community at large which would surely result from a patient, quiet, and conciliatory course on the part of the clergy—a course which would make it manifest that the spiritual guides of the people had really at heart before all other things, the spiritual good of those committed to them, and that they recognise the gospel of salvation in its purity and in its fulness as the one only means by which this was to be compassed and secured. Of course by what he said he implied the opinion that the obligation on the conscience of the clergy of the letter of the rubric in every minute particular was not so stringent as it had been sometimes said to be, but that some modified influence might be allowed to long-established custom, to inconvenience, amounting in some cases to necessity, and to the feelings of those for whose edification all pastoral ministrations were designed. Two different classes of persons were united in preserving to the utmost extent the stringency of this obligation—the one aiming at a complete uniformity in the exact observance of existing laws; the other seeking to work out a new and further reformation by proving the necessity of change. The subject should be well considered before adhesion was given to either of these parties, lest changes should be introduced which were not desired, or the church destroyed while seeking to uphold it. His Lordship, after some further remarks on this subject, proceeded to speak of the articles of the Church. In alluding to this subject at his last triennial visitation, he laid down the rule that subscription to the articles was to be made in the plain sense, quoting the words of Waterman, who says that the Church requires subscription to her own interpretation of Scripture, and that subscriber is bound, in virtue of that subscription, to that, and no other; and he, on that occasion, concluded by saying that we are not at liberty to evade it by nice and subtle distinctions, but are bound to receive and subscribe it in the sense which we believe to have been intended by the Church. He did not, on reconsideration, see any occasion to retract what he had already said; nor would it have been necessary to add anything to it, but for the extraordinary views which had of late been propounded in some quarters with so much confidence as seemed to make it not unsuitable to notice; while he did not question the belief of parties who maintained such opinions, or that they were justified in conscience in doing so, the adoption of such a theory was a moral phenomenon which he was unable to comprehend, and that the subscribers themselves deserved the most distinct and unqualified condemnation. A large portion of the charge was then occupied with remarks on the present state of the Salisbury diocese, and his lordship concluded by adverting to the efforts which ought to be made for the establishment of the Church in our colonial dependencies. His lordship said, that if he were to speak his own mind as to how far it was right to look at what must be ultimately aimed at, and towards which some progress was already made, namely, a supply of clergymen educated in the colonies themselves—how far there was need of an Established Church in this country for that purpose, he should be entering upon a new and large subject, from which he must further forbear. He had long entertained the conviction, that the existing sources from which the ministry of the Church at home was drawn were hardly adequate to meet the demands which the increasing wants of the population and the extension of the Church required, and that it would be well to consider whether the important changes in progress in the Church, viewed as an establishment, might not make it expedient to modify the rule respecting admission to the ministry. He must not, however, enter on those topics, nor on that anomalous and embarrassing difficulty in which the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was now found. Instead of dwelling on these subjects he had thought it best to speak mainly on points of a humble and ordinary character, and he would conclude with the expression of his earnest hope and prayer that the clergy might be so guided in the exercise of their ministry that it might be rendered effectual to them for whom it was ordained, that they might be enabled to fulfil it in the spirit of faithfulness towards God, whose word and whose sacraments they were commissioned to dispense, in a spirit of submission to the church, the doctrines of which they professed, and the authority of which they had pledged themselves to follow: that thus taking heed to themselves and to the doctrine, they might continue in them, for in doing this they would both save themselves and those that heard them.

Ware.—The Church service, agreeably to its old forms, has been resumed in the parish church of Ware, and the Town-hall was closed as a place of Divine Service on Sunday last. A point or two of minor importance remain to be arranged, but it is believed that as the parishioners have resolved to receive their new vicar with every possible mark of respect, and to lay aside all appearance of a desire to secede from the Church, he will endeavour to settle these points to their satisfaction. The parishioners have publicly expressed their thanks to the Rev. Dr. Alder, the Wesleyan Minister, and to those who have assisted him, not only for their having performed Divine Service agreeably to the forms of the Church, but for the discourses they have delivered, also avoiding topics of a controversial nature, and all reference to the particular position in which they were placed.

Railways.

The Committee on Standing Orders assembled on Tuesday, and decided that in the cases of the Direct Northern, the Wells and Dereham, the Tottenham and Farringdon-street Extension, and the Dublin and Galway, the standing orders ought not to be dispensed with. In the cases of the Londonderry and Enniskillen, and the Londonderry and Coleraine, the committee decided that the standing orders ought to be dispensed with. Considerable sensation was caused by the announcement of these decisions. In the case of the Dublin and Galway, it is worthy of remark that the Board of Trade reported in favour of the line, condemning the rival route by Mullingar and Athlone, which was extensively patronized by the corporation, traders, and merchants of Dublin, being almost exclusively in the hands of Irish shareholders, who have presented numerous petitions in its favour and against the direct line to Galway. In regard to the Direct Northern, the news of an unfavourable decision is said to have caused the utmost dismay among the many anxious shareholders who thronged the door of the committee-room. The announcement had the most extraordinary effect in clearing the passages of a highly-excited multitude, the character of whose excitement, however, it seemed to affect most materially, as there were confident anticipations of success for the scheme, in consequence of the favourable report of the Board of Trade.—A meeting of the provisional directors of the York and Carlisle, and Durham, Westmoreland, and Lancashire Junction Railway, was held last week in Kendal. An executive committee was appointed to have the management of the affairs of the company, and to allot the shares. It was stated that the applications for shares were immense, and a limit was placed upon the number of shares that any one party could receive, in order to prevent speculation, and to ensure their extensive distribution. The Durham and Lancashire Junction is now amalgamated with the York and Carlisle Company, and all the companies affected by the new line cordially co-operate with it, namely, Lancaster and Carlisle, Stockton and Darlington and Great North of England Railway Companies. The proposed line is intended to commence at a point on the Great North of England, near Northallerton, taking part of the branch-line to Richmond, now before Parliament, and diverging from it a short distance east of its terminus, thence following the south side of the Tees Valley up the Greta, over the line of the ancient Roman way to Brough, forward within a short distance of Kirby Stephen, through the rich valley of the Eden, past Appleby, Temple Sowerby, and to join the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway near to Clifton, south of Penrith. Diverging from this line southward of Stainmore, a branch will proceed through Ravenstondale to join the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway between Orton and Borrow Bridge.—A public meeting of the leading merchants, manufacturers, and others of the town of Sheffield, was held in the Cutlers' Hall, last week. The Mayor presided. A resolution was unanimously adopted, declaring that it would be inexpedient, and might be injurious to the interests of Sheffield, to lease the Sheffield, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Manchester Railway to the Midland and Manchester, and the Manchester and Birmingham companies.—The report of the Preston and Wire company at their meeting, exhibited a gradual improvement in the revenue. In February, 1843, the receipts were 5,299*l.*; August, 8,000*l.*; February, 1844, 8,281*l.*; August, 11,632*l.*; February, 1845, 11,116*l.* Many of the impediments that had affected the passenger, and more especially the goods traffic, between Fleetwood, Manchester, and Yorkshire, had since been removed; and there was every reason to hope for a still greater increase of traffic from the establishment of the Scotch and Irish boats, and the opening of the proposed line to Lytham and Blackpool. The establishment of cheap pleasure-trains had been successful, 4,000 persons having been frequently conveyed by the morning trains to Fleetwood. The works on the Blackpool branch would now be shortly commenced, impediments having arisen in obtaining possession of the land. The directors had accepted an interest of 50,000*l.* in the proposed line to join the Blackburn, Darwen, and Bolton. A dividend of 10*s.* per share was declared.—From a return ordered by the House of Commons' Select Committee on the Atmospheric Railway system, it appears that during 1844 there were 84 persons killed and 102 injured by railway accidents in the kingdom. It is curious, however, to observe that very few, comparatively, of that number were passengers. During the first three months of this year there were, also, 22 persons killed and 17 persons injured by railway accidents. Such, at least, are the cases reported to the Railway Department of the Board of Trade.—On Friday last the new church at the Swindon station of the Great Western Railway was consecrated by the Bishop of Gloucester. His Lordship arrived by a special train at 11 o'clock, and was received by a large body of the clergy of the district. A sermon was preached on the occasion by the Rev. Dr. Daubeny, after which a large collection was made in aid of the building fund. On Saturday the bishop held a confirmation in the church, which was numerously attended.

Ireland.

Dublin.—It appears that some difference of opinion exists in Dublin respecting Her Majesty's visit. The Mercantile Advertiser, which assumes to be particularly well informed on the subject, says—"We have ascertained that Her Majesty intends to travel by way of Liverpool, and that arrangements for the reception of the royal party are actually in progress at Knowsley, where a new entrance to the park has been commenced. One letter, with a sight of which we have been favoured, states that the Queen has inspected plans of the Viceregal Lodge, and of the apartments in Dublin Castle, and that Her Majesty has directed some attention to a map of the city of Dublin." The Evening Mail, notwithstanding every rumour and indication to the contrary, persists in its assertion that there is not the most remote chance of Her Majesty honouring her Irish subjects with a visit. "We repeat," says the Mail, "in terms the most emphatic—and we would not venture upon the assertion in such a tone of confidence if we had not more than ordinary grounds for making the statement—that there is no intention on the part of Her Majesty to visit Ireland this summer. It is probable that ere many days elapse an official announcement will be made of a determination, on the part of the Queen and Prince Albert, to go up the Rhine, with a view of paying a visit to the family of the illustrious Prince Consort. The month of July is the period likely to be named for this excursion into Germany, so as to enable Prince Albert to return in time for the grouse-shooting in Scotland." The Maynooth Bill and Sir R. Peel's Banking measure are leading topics in the Irish papers. The Bank reform gives general satisfaction: but in regard to Maynooth, the Repeal organ, the Nation, describes it as "a signal victory over the people, the parties, and the ministers of England," adding, that notwithstanding its importance, it is "a petty fragment of their just claims." Lord Castlereagh is to be Lord Lieutenant of the county Down, in the place of the late Marquis of Downshire. The differences between Archdeacon Mant and the parishioners of Hillsborough have been satisfactorily arranged by the restoration of the old mode of performing Divine Service. It was reported in Dublin last week that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry had cut his throat in a fit of insanity, but the statement was afterwards contradicted.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association was held on Monday; Mr. MAHER, M.P., was in the chair, and said that as a Roman Catholic, and the representative of Roman Catholics, he thanked Sir R. Peel for the handsome manner in which he had proposed the grant to Maynooth. The Irish people, he said, would receive with gratitude any, even the smallest, reparation for their past wrongs; but nothing would fully content them but a Repeal of the Union. The Irish mind was fixed on that object, and nothing short of it would satisfy. They would accept the sympathy of France, of Spain, or of America, but they wanted not their assistance. They had hands, and hearts, and arms, with which they were able to accomplish what they wanted for themselves.—Mr. O'CONNELL announced a contribution of 74*l.* from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ardagh and his clergy. After which Mr. S. O'BRIEN read an address from the Association to the electors of the county of Down, which had been drawn up by himself with the sanction of a committee. Its purport was to call upon them to return a Repealer in the room of their late member. Mr. O'Brien then proceeded to ridicule such concessions as the grant to Maynooth, if supposed to be given as an equivalent for Repeal, or even as a placebo for the desire of the Irish people for that consummation. He commented on the speeches of Mr. Macaulay and Sir J. Graham, particularly on those passages in which they spoke of the determination of the people of England to refuse the Repeal. But, said he, let England be determined as she may, Ireland is equally determined. The language used by those men in Parliament tempted him to utter the language of defiance. The Union, he averred, could not be sustained by the physical power of England. If the Irish people were united, Repeal would very soon be carried. But a contingency might be anticipated, which would render all resistance on the part of Britain perfectly hopeless. Suppose a war with France, and a French fleet stealing over some fine day to the English shore: suppose an American fleet in the Irish Channel filled with Irish emigrants. Irish soldiers composed one-third of the British army. Suppose these men to refuse, as they would, to shed the blood of their fellow-countrymen. Again, there were a million of Irish in Great Britain who would not be indifferent to a struggle for the independence of their native country. Only conceive this combination of events to take place, and what would become of the Legislative Union? It would be at an end. The British empire would be dismembered, and Ireland would become at once a separate and independent nation.—Mr. J. A. O'NEIL, of Bunowen Castle, seconded the adoption of the address to the electors of Down, and also made very little of the grant to Maynooth, except as a test of Sir Robert Peel's disposition to do justice to the country. He recommended the Irish members to go over to Parliament, and there support and cheer him on in his course.—Mr. GREY PORTER said he did not find fault with the Association that there were so many Catholics in it, but because there were so few Protestants. The men of the north of Ireland wished to know whether the Repeal of the Union were a sine qua non, and whether, if the just grievances of the country were redressed, they would still seek in looking for that object. If, for example, the number of representatives were increased in a fair proportion, if the franchise were extended, and if a good Landlord and Tenant Bill were conferred, and the Municipal Act amended, and if the Church temporalities were modified in Munster and Connaught, and if a diplomatic intercourse were opened with the court of Rome, the question then was, whether, if these concessions were granted, would they forego the Repeal of the Union. He approved of the course Sir R. Peel was pursuing. What he was doing he was doing well, and when he considered the opposition that was offered to him, he thought it was the duty of the Irish representatives to go to Parliament and support him in carrying out these beneficial measures.—Mr. O'CONNELL said he quite agreed in the speeches which had just been delivered by his two friends. It was true they had the entire of the Protestant population of the north against them, but they had the Catholic population of Ulster with them. He was sorry to be obliged to make these distinctions, but he looked forward to the day when all parties would be known only as Irishmen. Mr. Porter had expressed his regret that they did not inquire first whether the people of England would do them justice before they had resolved on the alternative of Repeal. But they had already tried the experiment—it was for that purpose the Precursor Society was formed. Did any of them of the north join them then? They did not; but since they had made their manly declaration of insisting on the Repeal of the Union, many of them had done so. The schoolmaster, when he found that tufts of grass would not answer, tried stones: it was so with them—they had in vain appealed for justice. What hopes of justice could he expect from the people of England, when he beheld Exeter-hall, and indeed, every part of England, ring with calumnies on the Irish people and their religion? Was not an Irishman nearly torn in pieces the other day merely for asking who was the publisher of a certain forgery? What was the harm of giving the name of the publisher, if it were not a forgery? But it was a forgery, and was sent from Achill. Sir R. Peel had promised him success: he had declared that this agitation could not be put down by force. He might deny that assertion, but he could not blind the English mind, or the mind of Europe. They would have that declaration placed on the walls of that hall. The declarations of Mr. Macaulay and Lord Howick, with regard to the Established Church and its temporalities, were most significant, and would, no doubt, tell on the Protestant mind. Sir R. Peel's measure, with regard to banking, he looked upon as excellent: and, as far as he had considered the matter, the Bill was admirable. He then adverted to Mr. Macaulay's declaration against Repeal. He begged to remind Mr. Macaulay that England was not in half the peril described by him when she conceded independence to Ireland in '82. When he told them vauntingly that they were not to have Repeal, they knew a trifle back in his teeth, and if his namesake, by authority as he was, dared to invade the rights of any single Repealer, he would get enough of it. Macaulay said that the great people of England would not consent to Repeal, and he (Mr. O'Connell) in reply said that the great people of Ireland would not consent to the Union. Last week he was anxious for the coming of the Queen to this country, but he confessed that these last speakers had changed his mind exceedingly. They should now take care not to make any move which could be construed into any mitigation of the agitation for Repeal. The cant and cry of their enemies in this country was, that the agitation was going down, and if they shrank in the smallest degree, the cry would be echoed in England. No one had more respect for the Queen than he, or was more devoted in his allegiance, which he was ready to seal with his life, and he looked for the Repeal because he thought it was the only mode of maintaining the connexion with England. Sir J. Graham, too, had said that the majority of the people of Ireland were against Repeal. He wished that Sir J. Graham would count heads. These speeches had convinced him that he must be cautious. Humble as he was, he was looked on as the representative of the feelings of the people of Ireland, and if he shrank the people would share the disgrace, and be looked upon as having abandoned their principles; but he could not have the feelings of a man, a Christian, or a patriot, if he relaxed in the minutest degree in his efforts for national independence. He concluded by moving that the committee of the Association be instructed to consider the most appropriate manner of receiving the Queen on the occasion of her visit to this country, taking care, that while the greatest respect should be shown to the Sovereign, she might not be allowed to remain in ignorance of the intention of the people of Ireland under all circumstances to persevere in their demand for legislative independence. Mr. S. O'BRIEN seconded the motion, which was adopted. Several other speakers addressed the chair, recommending the people to give the Queen a sincere and hearty reception, but not to consent to any abatement in the efforts making to obtain a Repeal of the Union. The rent for the week was 417*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*

Theatres.

HAYMARKET.—On Saturday last a comedy in five acts, from the pen of Mr. Douglas Jerrold, entitled "Time Works Wonders," was produced at this theatre, for the first time, with complete success. It is essentially a comedy of character, and is remarkable for the cleverness of its dialogue. At the end of the play, the entire company were called before the curtain, and the author was summoned forth to receive the gratulations of the audience.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER, TRIAL AT BAR.—The Great Distillery Case.—The Attorney General, v. Smith.—The trial of this important case, which charged Mr. Smith, the well-known distiller in Whitechapel, with having a secret communication between his distillery and the rectifying house, has been pending for some days. The charge of the Chief Baron bore strongly against the defendant, and the jury, after deliberating upwards of two hours, found for the Crown on the second count; and expressed their opinion that there had been no proof of a fraudulent use having been made of the communication. After some consultation the verdict was entered by agreement for 75,000*l.* Mr. Kelly then applied to enter a verdict of Not Guilty on the remaining five counts, which was agreed to.

Miscellaneous.

New Use of Glass.—At the extensive glass works at Bishopwearmouth, belonging to Messrs. James Hartley and Co., experiments have been made by James Hartley, Esq., to determine the practicability of making glass pipes for the purpose of conveying gas, water, &c., and it has been proved that pipes, stronger than ordinary metal pipes, and at a much lower cost, may be made of glass.

NEW ENVELOPE.—In consequence of the great variety of counterfeit Envelopes of ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, and other disreputable means resorted to by unprincipled individuals for imposing on the public their highly pernicious compounds under the title of "KALYDOR," the Proprietors and sole Preparers of the Original and Genuine Preparation acting under a sense of duty, and regardless of expense in the attainment of their object—THE PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC FROM FRAUD AND IMPOSITION, have employed those celebrated artists, Messrs. Perkins, Bacon, and Co., who have succeeded, at a great cost, in producing from a steel plate a NEW ENVELOPE of exquisite beauty.

It comprises a highly-finished engraving of the GRECIAN GRACES standing on a classic pedestal, on each side of which is a rich profusion of flowers springing from an elegant cornucopia; these tastefully blending with Arabesque scrolls and wreaths, encircle the royal arms of Great Britain, surmounting the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," &c. &c. &c., whilst a plinth at the foot displays the Signature of the Proprietors, in red, thus—

20, Hatton Garden, London, Jan. 1, 1845. A. ROWLAND & SON.

ROWLAND'S KALYDOR,

An Oriental Botanical Preparation, perfectly free from all mineral admixture. It exerts the most soothing, cooling, and purifying action on the Skin; and effectually dissipates all REDNESS, TAN, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, SPOTS, FRECKLES, and other Cutaneous Visitations. The radiant bloom it imparts to the cheek, the softness and delicacy which it induces on the HANDS, ARMS, and NECK, and its capability of allaying irritation and removing sallowness and all unsightly appearances, render it indispensable to every Toilet.

Sold in bottles, at 4*s*. 6*d*. and at 8*s*. 6*d*. each, duty included.

CAUTION.—BEWARE OF DELETERIOUS COMPOUNDS, under the title of "Genuine" KALYDOR, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the Complexion, and by their repellant action endangering health. The ONLY GENUINE article is inclosed in the Envelope, as detailed above.

 All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

The Genuine Preparation is sold by the Proprietors, and by respectable Chemists and Perfumers.

JELLY AND BLANC MANGE.

SCHOLEFIELD'S Original CONCENTRATED PREPARATIONS for the instantaneous production of these delicacies, combining every essential ingredient, and merely requiring dilution, are becoming daily more and more patronised throughout all classes of society, entirely superseding those made upon the old complex principle, by which half the kitchen utensils were called into requisition. The purity and intrinsic merits of these articles are fully assured to the public by the unquestionable certificates of those distinguished chemists Dr. Ure and Professor Herapath, combined with a galaxy of flattering testimonials from other professional men, gourmets, and the public press throughout the country.

Sold in pots, sufficient to fill twelve glasses. 1*s*. 3*d*. each; wholesale, at the manufactory, 7, Trafalgar-place, Kentish-town: by Parclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Crosse and Blackwell, Soho-square; T. Snelling, Fenchurch-street. Retail by most respectable chemists, grocers, Italian warehousemen, confectioners, and bakers.

Note.—As there are several fraudulent imitations, be careful to procure SCHOLEFIELD'S.

CORNS AND BUNIONS.

Patronised by the Royal Family, Nobility, Clergy, &c.

PAUL'S EVERY MAN'S FRIEND is a sure and speedy cure for those severe annoyances without causing the least pain or inconvenience.

Unlike all other remedies for corns, its operation is such as to render the cutting of the corns altogether unnecessary (indeed, we may say, the practice of cutting corns is at all times highly dangerous, and has been frequently attended with lamentable consequences, besides its liability to increase their growth); it adheres with the most gentle pressure, producing an instant and delightful relief from torture, and, with perseverance in its application, entirely eradicates the most inveterate corns and bunions.

Testimonials have been received from upwards of one hundred Physicians and Surgeons of the greatest eminence.

Prepared by JOHN FOX, in boxes, at 1*s*. 1½*d*., or three in one for 2*s*. 9*d*., and to be had of C. KING, Napier-street, near the Albert Saloon, Hoxton, London; and all wholesale and retail medicine venders in town and country. The genuine has the name of JOHN FOX on the stamp.

A 2*s*. 9*d*. box cures the most obdurate corns.

I should strongly recommend authors and studiously disposed persons generally to use your valuable pills. Signed—G. R. W. Baxter." Sold by all respectable vendors of medicines; and at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment, 244, Strand, where advice may be had gratis.

By PRIDEAUX JOHN SELBY, of Twizell, Esq.

"Scott makes the shrewd old Laird of Dumbiedikes give counsel to his son to look keenly after the profits to be derived from timber. 'Plant trees,' said the old man, on his deathbed; 'they are aye growing while you are sleeping.' Mr. Selby adds 'they are aye growing while you are sleeping.' Mr. Selby adds some very necessary codicils to this advice. Collecting the experience of some hundreds of years, he gives the most judicious rules for the formation of Plantations, for Cutting, Training, and all other operations necessary for rearing a noble forest with the greatest economy of time and space. The profit derived from the growth of timber is sometimes enormous."—Britannia. JOHN VAN VOORST, 1, Paternoster-row.

London: SAMUEL GILBERT.

News of the Week.

THE Earl of Powis on Friday night moved the second reading of his Bill for the continuation of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor, and for providing an endowment for the new bishopric of Manchester without the necessity of suppressing either of those ancient sees. This motion was opposed by the Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley, on the part of Government, and an interesting discussion ensued, during which the Bishops of Salisbury and London, and the Earl of Winchilsea, expressed a strong opinion in favour of augmenting the number of bishops in proportion to our increasing population. This suggestion was opposed by Lord Stanley, on the ground that any increase in the power of the Church would excite the utmost jealousy, and on a division the Bill was negatived by a majority of 32. On Monday the Duke of Richmond brought forward his promised amendment to the repeal of the auction duties. His Grace condemned the agricultural policy of Government, and declared his readiness to support a vote of want of confidence in them so far as their agricultural measures were concerned. He complained that the repeal of the auction duties would deprive farmers of the small advantages which they enjoyed under the old act, and contended that the amount of the existing duties might be justly applied to their relief. His amendment was resisted by Ministers, and negatived on a division by 33 to 15. The discussion introduced last week by Lord Clanricarde, respecting the vicious scene which took place in the chapel of Newgate at the recent execution has been renewed this week in both Houses, by an incidental conversation respecting the publication of confessions made by condemned criminals. Sir J. Graham stated that in consequence of the previous discussion in the House of Lords, he had sent a Prison Inspector to Newgate to investigate the case, and if his report should appear to render such a step necessary, he was prepared to submit a legislative measure on the subject. The Maynooth Bill has been again the prominent topic in the House of Commons. On Friday Mr. Hindley brought on his amendment that the House would not resolve itself into committee on the Bill till that day six months; but on a division it was negatived by 160 to 52. Mr O'Brien's amendment, enabling the trustees of the College to hold landed property to the amount of 30,000*l.*, instead of 3,000*l.* was also negatived by 100 to 32, and Mr. Law's amendment, for rejecting the clause charging the Consolidated Fund with the payment of 30,000*l.* for the building expenses of the College, was negatived by 210 to 88. On Monday Mr. S. Crawford brought forward his amendment, condemning on the voluntary principle all grants of public money to the support of religious sects; but on a division, the amendment had only two supporters, and was negatived by 141 to 2. Mr. Cowper's Field Gardens Bill passed through committee on Wednesday, pro formâ, with a view to alterations which will bring it into conformity with the Commons Inclosure Bill, introduced by Government. On the same day, Sir J. Graham stated at great length the alterations he proposes to make in his new Medical Reform Bill. One of the most important of these changes is the separate incorporation of the general practitioners, transferring to them the powers and privileges of the Apothecaries' Company, continuing the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons as the superior classes of the profession, and compelling all candidates to pass an examination before a joint board of Physicians and Surgeons, before they are admitted to the College of General Practitioners. On Thursday Mr. Hutt brought forward his motion for the admission of Australasian corn on the same terms as that of Canada, but after a long debate it was negatived by 147 to 93.

The great debate on the revival of the Jesuits in France is the leading feature of our foreign news. No subject for a long time has excited so much interest among all classes in France, and the debate has elicited strong demonstrations of hostility against the Jesuits from the leading statesmen of most parties. The result renders the revival of the Jesuits impossible, the Chamber having almost unanimously affirmed the existence of the penal laws still in force against them; and expressed confidence that the Government will put those laws in execution.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the royal family, continue at Buckingham Palace. The Prince on Friday attended a meeting of the Fine Arts Commission. On Saturday, Her Majesty and his Royal Highness visited the Coliseum, and was present at the Italian Opera in the evening. On Sunday, the Queen and Prince attended Divine service in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace, and, on Monday, were present at the juvenile fête given by the Queen Dowager at Marlborough House. On Monday evening the Queen gave a Concert at Buckingham Palace, and on Wednesday held a levée at St. James's. On Thursday Prince Albert accompanied the Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden to the Botanical Gardens, and afterwards attended the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy in St. Paul's, and dined in the evening at Merchant Tailors' Hall. On the same evening the Queen was present at the Italian Opera.—It is announced that the Fancy Ball to be given by Her Majesty is fixed for Friday, the 6th of June, and that the period selected for illustration by the costume is the reign of George II. The Prince of Leiningen has arrived at Buckingham Palace from Brussels, on a visit to the Queen; and the Princess Donna Anna of Portugal, aunt of Queen Donna Maria, has arrived at Mivart's Hotel, on his way to Bourges, on a visit to her sister, the consort of Don Carlos of Spain. The Marchioness of Douro has succeeded Viscountess Jocelyn as Lady in Waiting, and Capt. the Hon. A. Duncombe has succeeded Sir F. Stovin as Groom in Waiting to Her Majesty.

Parliamentary Movements.—The election for Peebleshire took place on Monday, when Mr. Mackenzie was elected. The show of hands was in favour of Mr. Carmichael, but his proposer, in Mr. Carmichael's absence, withdrew him, stating that he was satisfied with the show of hands, and would not go to the poll. Sir W. W. Wynn was re-elected for Denbigh on Wednesday without opposition.

The Church.—On Saturday Dr. Turton was consecrated Bishop of Ely, at Lambeth Palace, and on Wednesday did homage to the Queen on his appointment to that see. Dr. Chapman and Dr. Medley, the new colonial bishops, were also consecrated on Saturday. The deanery of Wells has become vacant by the sudden death of Dr. Goodenough. The appointment of Archdeacon Wilberforce to the deanery of Westminster was gazetted on Tuesday.

Official Appointments.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint William Fergusson, Esq., to be Governor-in-Chief of Sierra Leone and its dependencies; Abraham Carlton Cumberbatch, Esq., now Vice-Consul at Constantinople, to be Consul-General at Constantinople, in the room of John Cartwright, Esq., resigned; and Charles Duncan Wake, Esq., now Vice-Consul at Copenhagen, to be Consul at Charleston.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The leading and almost exclusive theme of the Paris papers is the discussion which took place last week in the Chamber of Deputies relative to the revival of the Jesuits in France. On no occasion in the last four years has a larger audience been seen in the hall of the Palais Bourbon. Such was the eagerness to witness the discussion, that although the sittings began but at half past one, the ladies, who were in great numbers, arrived before eleven, and at eight in the morning the doors were besieged by a multitude anxious to obtain admission. The hall was crowded to excess. All the Deputies in Paris were present, as well as the whole Chamber of Peers and corps diplomatique; and to the end of the sittings the lobbies and adjoining rooms were thronged with persons, many of whom came from considerable distances, in hopes of procuring seats, or desirous to know the result as soon as possible. The company also included a great many members of the University and Courts of Law, several foreigners of distinction, and not a few ecclesiastics. In short, on beholding such curiosity and the immense crowd it had gathered, people were almost tempted to listen to the widely-spread rumour that the impending demonstration against the Jesuits had been concerted between the leader of the Opposition and the Court, in order to avert attention from the exciting Bill for the arming of the Paris fortifications, against which, when the sittings opened, a petition signed by 12,000 inhabitants of the capital was presented. M. Thiers led the attack. His speech lasted two hours, and commanded profound attention, and the Opposition prints of the liberal party lavish on it every epithet of admiration. After premising that, in questioning the Ministry as to the execution of the laws against the Jesuits, his object was not to assail the Cabinet, but to provoke such a manifestation on the part of the representatives of France as should give the Government the strength it required for the execution of those laws, he adduced various facts tending to prove that, although proscribed by the ancien régime, invisible during the first Revolution, kept down by the Empire, condemned even by the Restoration, and tolerated since 1830 so long as they concealed themselves, the Society of the Jesuits had now formed again into regular congregation, recovered immense influence, and become rich and powerful enough to establish two "provinces"—one of Paris, the other of Lyons; to possess 27 seminaries, other houses, and to maintain many more members than they chose to avow. M. Thiers then enumerated the various edicts issued, and laws enacted against the "Company of Jesus," pointing out many that could be still enforced. To the increasing ascendancy and to the instigation of the Jesuits he imputed the growing hostility which a part of the French clergy had for some time past displayed to the laws of the kingdom; and, after professing the utmost respect for the Catholic religion, and sympathising with the free corps lately routed at Lucerne, he declared that, although far from entertaining all the popular prejudices propagated against the Jesuits, it was high time that, supported as it was by the Chamber, the Government should endeavour to separate the cause of a prohibited order from that of the regular clergy. M. Thiers resumed his seat amidst loud acclamations, and a quarter of an hour elapsed before the Keeper of the Seals could obtain a hearing. M. Martin du Nord then admitted that the existing laws permitted the dissolution of unauthorised religious congregations, but claimed for the Government the choice of its own time for putting these laws in force, and for the means which it might deem proper to employ. M. de Carne then addressed the Chamber, and declared that he considered the reply given by the Minister vague and unsatisfactory. M. Dupin followed, and declared that the Society of Jesuits was most dangerous. It was constituted for the purpose of perpetuating the [illegible] of Ignatius Loyola. It was formed in a foreign [illegible] and had a chief who was an absolute despot. It divided Christendom into provinces, was under [illegible] influence, had well-organised finances, and a [illegible] established administration; and the oath was a [illegible] abnegation of the individual, which placed the [illegible] the hands of his general, "like a stick in the hands of a blind man." Then, with regard to the objects of the society; they were completely political, and their great aim was universal sovereignty and [illegible]. They were distinguished from every other congregation and association existing in France, and he therefore called upon the Chamber and country to express their opinion in such a way as would compel the Government to enforce the laws against them. The discussion was then, amidst great agitation, adjourned to next day, when M. Berryer declared that on so grave a question some immediate decision ought to be come to by the Chamber, all parties, he said, being opposed to leaving the matter to the good pleasure of the Government to act in, as the Minister had demanded the day before. He then proceeded to argue that the ancient laws against religious societies no longer existed, and that even if they did, they would be incompatible with religious liberty as it ought to be really comprehended. M. Hebert followed M. Berryer, and denounced the Jesuits with much animation. M. Lamartine, who spoke next, said that, like M. Berryer, he had been educated by the Jesuits, and that if since he entered the world he had lost and adopted political and religious opinions different from those inculcated in him in his youth, he still entertained the highest respect and gratitude for his instructors. He observed that "a political power should carefully abstain from interfering in religious matters; the blood shed for God was always more valuable than that shed on the field of battle. I detest civil and religious war, but I maintain that men gloriously die in defending the independence of the mind of their convictions and faith; and that if soldiers who die on ordinary fields of battle are heroes, those who die on the field of battle of God are victims and martyrs." M. Lamartine next contended that, "Napoleon committed a great mistake in concluding a concordat—a mixing up together spiritual and temporal matters—in converting the ministers of the Gospel into a species of religious magistracy—and, in short, creating religion as he would have created materiel of artillery." He then insisted on the necessity of a separation between the Church and the State, and claimed for all entire liberty of conscience. When M. Lamartine had concluded, the President read the following motion, which had been addressed to him by M. Thiers:—"The Chamber, being confident that the Government will attend to the execution of the laws, passes to the order of the day." M. Odillon Barrot here rose and said that it was indispensible that the assembly should make a clear and unequivocal manifestation of its feeling and opinion on the occasion, and concluded by fully approving the motion. M. Martin du Nord having [illegible] acquiesced in it, in the name of the Government, the Chamber, after hearing some observations of MM. Thiers, Larochejaquelin, and Fontette, adopted the proposition of M. Thiers, by an almost unanimous vote. This result has taken most parties by surprise. The Presse, which is the organ of the Church, deplores the whole proceeding; the National contents itself with ridiculing both parties—both sides of the question; the Univers regards the vote as almost a death-blow to religion; and the Constitutionnel (the imputed organ of M. Thiers) blames, of course, the Jesuits for having provoked the hostility of that statesman.—The discussion on the Paris Fortification Armament Bill commenced on Monday, in the Chamber of Deputies. Of four speakers who had addressed the House up to past hour, three declared themselves strongly opposed to arming the fortifications at present. But no speech commanded so much attention as that of M. Arago, the celebrated astronomer:—

"The general object and aim of the learned gentleman," says the Constitutionnel, "appeared to be to show that the Government seemed to direct its attention exclusively to the casting of the cannon necessary for the arming of Paris, while it neglected to a culpable degree the defence of the enceinte. The application of the progress of science to firearms, and the employment of all the new and powerful means which physics, optics, and hydraulics might furnish for the defence of strong places. The orator particularly attracted attention when he developed his system for the protection of Paris in case of attack, by means of the waters of the Seine. If the master he would establish at the Pont Neuf an ingenious and moveable dam, which would place the river at his disposal. He would carry the river water by these means into the ditches that surround the city, from which he could retire them at his pleasure. He would raise the waters by means of powerful engines, to a height from which he could distribute them in all quarters of the place, and by that means suppress any fire that might be produced by the enemy's bombs. He would throw into the trenches opened by the enemy a sort of artificial [illegible] an intelligent inundation which would destroy the works and disconcert the workers. Add to this, numerous lights [illegible] placed upon and sheltered by the ramparts, which by the aid of mirrors would illuminate the country and prevent a surprise, steam cannon which would render an assault impossible, and would decimate regiments by the dozen, with cannons and cannons of the most perfect construction, and you will have an idea of the frightful nature of the arsenal which our [illegible] modes advocated in the tribune."

At the close of this speech the debate was adjourned, and from present appearances it is likely to be continued for many days, although no doubt is entertained that the Chamber will pass the Bill. On Wednesday the Chamber granted the sum of 41,000 francs awarded as an indemnity to the British claimants aggrieved by the blockade of Portendick. A long discussion, however, took place on this affair, and on the news recently received from Tahiti, after which the extraordinary credit for Oceania was granted. The Chamber of Peers on Wednesday expressed itself in direct opposition to the proposed conversion of the Five per Cent. stock, which the Chamber of Deputies only a very few days previously had voted by a majority of 176. The question came before the Peers in their bureaux, and was unanimously condemned. "Not a single voice," observes the National, "was raised in its favour." The fate of the proposition is, therefore, for the present at least, decided; but the conflict it will occasion between the two Chambers may prove serious. —The Moniteur of Friday publishes the details of the celebration of the King's fête on the preceding day, which appears to have been of the usual kind, except that the out-door amusements provided for the public were not on the usual grand scale. The customary addresses were presented to the King, who replied in similar terms.

India and China.—The Overland Mail, with news from Bombay to the 1st April, has arrived this week. The news is of considerable interest. In the Punjaub confusion reigns supreme, and the disorganisation of Runjeet Singh's kingdom is going rapidly forward, for there are now several Governments established there. Dhuleep Singh, the boy king, with his mother ruling, and her brother as the Minister, governs at Lahore, where the Khalsa, or regular troops, will have everything their own way. Ghoolaub Singh has fixed his rule in his mountain fortress of Janroo, and the notorious Akhbar Khan, son of Dost Mahommed, of Cabul, is preparing to seize Peshawur, and to make himself master of the Sikh province, to the west of the Indus. There were various efforts made by the Queen Mother and the Khalsa troops to bring about an arrangement with Ghoolaub Singh. The troops, called Khalsa, went towards Janroo to force him into terms, but he by a trick out-manœuvred their leaders. On approaching his fastnesses, the Sikh army sent wakeels or agents to confer with him as to the largesse they were to receive. These he treacherously massacred; and a good deal of bloodshed subsequently followed. The last tidings intimate the restoration of peace, but it is doubtful whether it will last long. A sort of convention had been formed by Ghoolaub Singh with the Affghan leaders, by which the latter were to attack Peshawur while the former maintained his position in the hills of Janroo. Akhbar Khan went from Jellalabad, where he latterly had stationed himself, to see his father at Cabul, and they both, having made arrangements for paying the arrears of their troops, were to set out in the middle of February, in order to invade the province of Peshawur, which has during more than 20 years been subject to the Sikhs. Thus the chances of the Sikh kingdom being speedily disorganised are very great. In the meantime the British Government is quietly assembling a large army on the banks of the Sutlej, for the alleged purpose of defending its own territories, but to which it is highly probable the young King Dhuleep and his mother will soon have to apply for protection.—The news from Scinde is interesting and not unimportant. The expedition under Sir C. Napier, which proceeded about the latter end of January into the Cutchee Hills, has succeeded in accomplishing its objects, nearly the whole of the robber chiefs having, after a brief resistance, fallen into the hands of the British troops.—Disturbances are not yet wholly quelled in the southern Mahratta country, and it is reported that further operations on the part of our troops are about to take place. The heads of the Sawunt Warree rebellion still lurk in the Portuguese territory of Goa. —There is no news of importance from China. All is quiet; but trade remains dull.

United States.—The great Western steam-ship reached Liverpool yesterday morning, with news from New York to the 24th ult. The principal topic of interest is the effect of the speeches of Sir R. Peel and Lord Aberdeen on the Oregon question upon the United States, and it is with pleasure we announce that so far from any warlike feelings being excited, the very opposite was the case. War seems to be the most distant from their thoughts. The Caledonia's news, with speeches of Sir R. Peel and Lord Aberdeen, reached Boston late on the night of the 21st, and was published in New York the following day. The Great Western sailed on the 24th, so that only two days elapsed; yet there was no symptom of excited feeling, or any idea of the peaceful relations of the two countries being disturbed. The evidence is the more valuable as showing, that even on the first reading, no anxiety or alarm was manifested. It is quite clear that, in regard to the Oregon question, the passage in the inaugural address of President Polk attracted much more attention in England than it did in America, and it is confidently said that the British minister at Washington viewed the matter as of no great moment. All the respectable journals of New York repudiate the idea of war. The New York Courier says that the language of the British Ministers is a dignified and statesmanlike rebuke to the braggart spirit in which their own public men have treated the question. "Nevertheless," it says, "the effect of the Caledonia's news was, to make men look grave, and though no perceptible fall was occasioned by it in produce or the public stocks, it caused a pause." The Tribune says:—"It is now reduced to a moral certainty that the rival claims of the United States and Great Britain respecting Oregon must be settled by arbitration or by war. We go for arbitration. Who is for war?"—Mr. Elmore, of South Carolina, is said to be the intended Minister of the United States to Great Britain.—The intelligence from Canada has no special interest. The Governor-General is said to be progressing favourably in health.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—The Duke of Buckingham, having recited the facts relative to the late confession made by the criminal Tawell to the chaplain of Aylesbury gaol, asked the Government whether or not the chaplains of gaols were authorised to withhold from the magistrates the confessions made to them by prisoners confined in gaol?—The Duke of Wellington said he had no authority to give an answer to that question. As he understood the canon law, which is a part of the law in England, a Clergyman is prohibited from revealing the purport of a confession made to him, except where it would be necessary to do so for the preservation of his own life.—The Duke of Richmond maintained that the chaplain had no right to refuse to give up the paper he had received from Tawell to the magistrates.—A desultory conversation between Lord Campbell, the Bishop of Exeter, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Bishop of Lincoln, Lord Stanley, Lord Brougham, the Marquis of Normanby, and Lord Denman, took place on this subject, the general opinion appearing to be that, in the instance in question, the chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Cox, had exercised a sound discretion. Their lordships, one and all, denounced the publication of pretended confessions from prisoners as a practice highly detrimental to public morality, and Lords Brougham and Denman protested against the opinion that the confession of a convicted felon should be required to satisfy the public of his guilt, after the question has been decided by the conscientious verdict of a jury.—The Earl of Powis, having presented several petitions in favour of his measure for continuing separate the two dioceses of Bangor and St. Asaph, and having shewn from documents that not merely in Wales, but throughout all England, the desire to preserve the two sees prevailed, moved the second reading of his Bill to provide for the continuation of the ancient sees of Bangor and St. Asaph, and to make provision for the endowment of a new Bishopric of Manchester.—The Duke of Wellington moved, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He called on their lordships not to depart from the system recommended by the several commissions, and adopted with the concurrence of the leading men of both parties in the State. His Grace contended that the union of the two sees would be in every respect advantageous, and that the diocese thus formed would be neither too extensive nor its duties too onerous to be efficiently performed by one instead of two bishops, while the revenue thus obtained could be most usefully applied.—The Bishop of Bangor called upon the House to listen to the prayers of the thousands who had petitioned against the extinction of a see more ancient than even that of Canterbury, and strongly supported the Bill. It was not merely a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, as the Duke of Wellington had represented, but a cause which came home to the feelings of the people.—The Earl of Winchilsea urged that if a Bishop of Manchester were necessary, the appointment ought not to be postponed from the consideration of an endowment, nor ought an ancient bishopric to be suppressed for the mere purpose of supplying the necessary funds, while millions were being squandered upon the most profligate speculations. He was anxious that more bishops should be created, and thought that it would be no derogation of their dignity, if they took their seats as Peers by rotation.—Lord Monteagle thought that there was no necessity for applying any portion of the revenues to be secured from the consolidation of the bishopries of North Wales, to the establishment of the new bishopric of Manchester, because there were funds sufficient for the purpose in the hands of the ecclesiastical commissioners. He expressed his intention of proposing at a subsequent period, that the revenues to be derived from the union of the two Welsh sees should be applied to the promotion of the real efficiency of the parochial clergy in South Wales.—Lord Brougham opposed the second reading. —The Bishop of Salisbury supported it. Quoting the words of the venerable Samuel Wilberforce, he said it was sad to consider how cold and worldly statesmen like Walpole turned a deaf ear to requests of this kind. How little they cared for that which seemed to have a leaning only on spiritual things, and not directly on temporal advantages. The petitions against the annexation of the dioceses had, he believed, been the result of a conviction, almost universal among the clergy, that there was a great and increasing want of ecclesiastical superintendence; and he trusted that the number of bishops would be augmented in proportion to our increasing population. The example of the American Church proved the danger of the want of that episcopate which it was now sought to uphold, and was another evidence that the Church should not "put her trust in Princes" or in their advisers.—Lord Stanley acknowledged the weight of authority against which the Government had to contend, and the general expression of public feeling, but urged that the Bill of Lord Powis was full of danger to the cause in which the prelates and the petitioners were so zealous. The Church had, for several years, been curtailing its superfluities, and had thus conciliated for itself much respect and esteem; but if this just and moderate course were given up, and an increase of political power attempted, the consequences would be most fatal to its character and influence. If it were intended that the additional Bishops should also become members of their Lordships' House, such an increase of the power of the Church would excite the utmost jealousy: and if by any species of arrangement they happened to be excluded, the effect of the comparisons that would be made between the efficiency of those who could attend without interruption to the duties of their dioceses, and of those who were compelled for many months in the year to reside in London, would soon render it impossible that the latter should preserve their rights as spiritual Peers. The noble lord at much length proceeded to justify the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commission, one of the most important of which it was the object of this Bill to set aside; and concluded by commending the subject to their lordships' attention, as involving the great political and religious interests of the country.—The Bishop of St. David's strongly supported the Bill, which he maintained that their lordships were bound by every principle of reason, justice, and expediency to affirm.—The Bishop of London confessed that, after deep deliberation, he had come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to increase the number of bishopries. He protested against the doctrine laid down by Lord Stanley, that at no future period should additions be made to the ecclesiastical body, and avowed that he could not conscientiously vote against the second reading of the Bill, but, considering his peculiar position as a member of the ecclesiastical commission, he thought it better to abstain from voting at all.—Lord Fitzwilliam opposed the Bill; and, after a few words from Lord Carnarvon in its support, their Lordships proceeded to a division, when the numbers were—Contents, 77; Non-Contents, 129. The Bill was therefore lost by a majority of 52.

Monday.—Lord Dalhousie moved the order of the day for going into committee on the Auction Duties Repeal Bill.—The Duke of Richmond objected to the Bill, and moved that it be committed that day six months. Under the present duties the tenant-farmer had an exemption, and now, when so hard pressed, an Act was to be repealed which operated in his favour. To his relief the amount of the existing duties might fairly be applied. Lord Ripon had asked what could be done for the agricultural interest. All they wanted was justice; but if they called for the repeal of the malt-tax, they were told they asked too much; and if they asked for the abolition of the county-rate, the Government said that was too little, and would do them no good. Let the noble lord ask his friends, the manufacturers, whether the bargain made by the landed interest was a good one? He wished the Consolidated Fund was charged with 15 or 20 per cent. of the poor-rate. He should vote for retaining these duties, and for charging 200,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* of the county-rate on the Consolidated Fund. Such a proposition had been opposed in another place, on the ground that it implied a want of confidence in the Ministry; but, for his part, so far as their agricultural measures were concerned, he would support a vote of want of confidence in them. He disliked their policy as tending toward free trade, and because it threw many meritorious labourers out of employ. The Earl of Dalhousie contended that the farmers had received their full share of the reductions made in the articles of timber, coffee, cotton, sugar, glass, &c., and treated as ridiculous the idea that the importation of corn and cattle under the Canada Corn Act and the Tariff would ever materially affect the prices of agricultural home produce. The Earl of Malmesbury supported the amendment. He said that Government had began their reign by depriving the farmers of the protection they enjoyed. Then came the income-tax; and, in order to make that odious measure palatable, Government used the argument that various articles of consumption would be rendered so much cheaper by the Tariff, that people would save the 3 per cent. taken by the income-tax. Upon whom, then, did the difference fall? Why, upon the farmers and agricultural interest generally. That was the first step which the Government took. What was the second? A heavy blow also to the agricultural interest—the remission of the timber duties. The noble earl had talked of that measure as if timber were not the produce of this country: did not the noble earl know that in a bad year, when the seasons were unfavourable, the landed proprietor might redeem his loss by a fall of timber? And as to repairs, wretched and poor indeed must that estate be which was obliged to go abroad for timber for repairs.—Lord Monteagle said he should vote for the amendment, because he objected to the selection of this tax for reduction, and especially to the parting with 300,000*l.* of revenue, when they had only a surplus of 100,000*l.*, a surplus not obtained by the permanent revenue of the country, but by taking into account a temporary tax, most odious and burdensome in its nature, and hitherto reserved for periods of great exigency and time of war. The income-tax had been originally imposed on the ground of great necessity, and Her Majesty had, with much public spirit, announced her intention of contributing her share: the tax was now to be continued that other taxation might be remitted: the reasons which might be supposed to have hitherto influenced Her Majesty now, therefore, no longer existed, and he thought it unconstitutional that the sovereign should be subjected to such a tax.—Lord Winchilsea thought that the constant evasion of the auction duties was a sufficient ground for their remission. He dreaded the ultimate operation of the Canada Corn Bill and the import of salt provisions. On this latter ground Lord Stanley quoted some statistics to prove that no danger need be apprehended: and, after a few words from Lord Beaumont and the Marquis of Normanby, their lordships divided, negativing the amendment by 33 to 15. The Bill then passed through committee.—On the motion for going into committee on the Customs Duties Bill,—The Duke of Richmond moved its committal that day six months. The amendment was negatived without a division, and the Bill passed through committee.—The Sugar Duties (Excise) Bill, and the Colonial Passengers Bill also passed through committee.

Tuesday.—On the motion of the Bishop of London, the Church Buildings Act Amendment Bill passed through committee.—Lord Stanley announced that Government had proposed a measure, founded on the Irish landlord and tenant commissioners' report, to secure to tenants compensation for permanent improvements made by them on land. He promised to lay the Bill on the table immediately after the Whitsun recess. —Lord Brougham took occasion to condemn the conduct of the House of Commons in setting at naught the decision of their standing orders committee in the case of the Dublin and Galway Railway Bill. He warned the shareholders not to throw away their money in attempting to force their Bill this session; and promised them that it should not pass their Lordships' House.—Lord Brougham presented a petition from the churchwardens and parishioners of St. Stephen's, Walbrook. The petition showed that the affairs of the parish had for a long series of years been conducted in the most unsatisfactory manner, and had now become a subject of public notoriety; that certain differences had arisen between the parishioners and Mr. Michael Gibbs, which had now resulted in a litigation of which no man could see the termination, and that in consequence of this the church of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, was falling into ruins, and that no adequate provision was made for the payment of the officers of the church, including the respected rector. Under these circumstances the petitioners prayed that some general Act might be passed, by which the rights and property of the parish might be adequately protected without recourse to so much wasteful litigation.—The Fresh Water Fisheries (Scotland) Bill passed through committee.—The Customs Imports Duties Bill, the Auction Duties Bill, the Sugar (Excise) Duties Bill, and the Colonial Passengers Bill were read a third time and passed.

Thursday.—The Royal assent was given by commission to the Sugar (Excise) Duties Bill, Customs Duties Bill, Auction Duties Bill, Sheriff (Wales) Bill, Colonial Passengers Bill, Companies Clauses, Land Clauses, and Railway Consolidation (England and Scotland) Bills, Fisher-lane (Greenwich) Improvement Bill, Forth and Clyde Navigation Improvement Bill, Birmingham and Liverpool Junction Canal Navigation Company Bill, Wallasey Lighting Improvement Bill, Kingston-upon-Hull Docks Bill, Birkenhead Docks Bill, London Orphan Asylum Bill, and some others. The Freshwater Fishing (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed.—Lord Brougham presented a petition from a gentleman who complained of the encroachment of a railway on his grounds. The noble and learned lord expressed an ardent wish that Parliament were prorogued, and that the railway fevers were abated. An interesting conversation, on the principle that ought to be laid down by Parliament for the purchase of lands by railway companies, followed, in which the Dukes of Wellington and Grafton, Lords Fitzwilliam, Redesdale, Campbell, and Winchilsea, took part. The general result of their lordships' observations was, that though every reasonable facility ought to be afforded to railway companies, yet care should be taken to secure full compensation for proprietors, especially for such of these as were poor, and unable to assert their rights.—Lords Stanley and Dalhousie defended the principle of the Railway and Land Clauses Consolidation Bill from an attack made on it by Lord Beaumont.—The Bail in Error Bill passed through committee.—The Jury Counsel Appellate Jurisdiction Act was read a third time and passed; and a clause introduced to postpone the operation of the Bill to the 1st January, 1846.—Their lordships adjourned, for the Whitsun recess, to Friday the 16th.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—Mr. Mangles asked whether it was the intention of Government, either by Act of Parliament or by means of the dignitaries of the Church, to take any measures to set at rest the differences which had lately arisen amongst the clergy of the Church of England?—Sir R. Peel replied that he was not prepared to answer.—On the motion that the Speaker should leave the chair to go into committee on the Maynooth Bill, Mr. Hindley hoped that the Government would not proceed any further with the Bill. It had excited such dissatisfaction throughout Great Britain, that 1200 persons had come up to London from every part of it, to enter their protest against it. He therefore recommended the Premier to appeal to the country before he proceeded further with it. He read the letter of Dr. Higgins, to show that it would neither conciliate the clergy nor the people of Ireland. Considering the ferment which it had raised in England, and the mode in which it had been received in Ireland, he felt it to be his duty to move that the House would not resolve itself into a committee on this Bill till that day six months.—Col. SIBTHORP seconded the motion, and said that on Friday last the number of signatures subscribed to the petitions against this Bill was 918,000; and he had no doubt that it would be doubled before the Bill reached the stage of the third reading. The first virtue of a Minister was consistency, but Sir R. Peel had grossly deceived and betrayed all parties who had looked up to him as a protector and friend.—Mr. PLUMPTRE made to Sir R. Peel the same appeal which had been made to him by Mr. Hindley. He considered this measure as a most unhappy movement on the part of the Government, whichever way it should be decided. It had not created a ferment, but a calm and deliberate feeling in the mind of the people of England, founded on scruples of religion, that it was not right for them to pay their money for the propagation of religious error. On the other hand, the recent letters of Dr. Higgins and Mr. O'Connell showed that it would not give anything like satisfaction to the people of Ireland. Indeed, Mr. O'Connell, the Irish bishops, and the Irish people, all laughed this measure to scorn. He advised Sir R. Peel to withdraw his Bill, and said that if he did not, he must resist its progress again, as he had resisted it before.—Colonel VERNER rose for the purpose of denying a position affirmed by Sir R. Peel on a former evening, that the Protestant feeling of Ireland was not so averse to this measure as the Protestant feeling of England. He assured the House that the Protestants of Ireland looked at the College of Maynooth now with the same feelings of dislike which they had always entertained towards it.—Mr. REDINGTON gave a very different version of the state of Protestant feeling in Ireland on this subject. His Protestant neighbours had signed a memorial thanking the Government for the introduction of this measure, and promising to support it to the best of their ability.—Sir R. PEEL understood that it was not the intention of the House on that evening to revive the discussion on the principle of the Bill, and he therefore trusted that Mr. Plumptre would not conceive himself treated with any disrespect, if he refused to follow him into the general discussion upon which he had entered. It was his firm determination to persevere with the Bill; but Mr. Plumptre had no right on that account to say that he intended to force it upon the House. He deliberately repeated his former assertion, that much less opposition to this measure had been manifested by the Protestants of Ireland than by the Protestants of England; and he now added that their conduct had generated a kindly feeling towards them among the Roman Catholics of Ireland. He then read to the House a declaration signed by the Protestant and Roman Catholic landowners in the county of Galway, in which they stated their satisfaction at this increased grant to the College of Maynooth. Among the signatures were those of 34 justices of the peace, and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway.—Sir A. BROOKE explained his reasons for opposing this measure.—Lord J. RUSSELL asked Sir R. Inglis what parts of the Bill he intended to oppose in the committee?—Sir R. INGLIS having answered this question, observed that, having already troubled the House twice at some length upon this measure, he did not intend to trouble it again at this stage of it. He could not, however, prevent other members from speaking upon it. Moreover, if Mr. Hindley divided the House upon his amendment, he should certainly divide with him.—The House then divided, when Mr. Hindley's amendment was negatived by a majority of 160 to 52 votes. The House then resolved itself into a committee on the Bill.—On the second clause being read by the CHAIRMAN, which provides that the trustees may, in their corporate capacity, take and possess any personal property, and also lands not exceeding the annual value of 3000*l.*, exclusive of the property already acquired by the trustees, Sir J. HANMER moved the omission of such words as limited the trustees in taking any real property with which it might be desired voluntarily to endow them. He should be sorry to see the State and the House committed to troublesome ecclesiastical questions about the amount of landed endowment which the College of Maynooth should be entitled to hold. He thought that it would be much better to leave every man at liberty to endow his Church as he pleased, instead of restricting him to a certain amount by the old shadow of the feudal laws, which were at present obsolete.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for Ireland contended that this clause was necessary, inasmuch as in the act of 1808 there was not only a clause enabling the trustees of the College of Maynooth to hold lands to the amount of 1000*l.* a year, but also a clause prohibiting them from holding more, exclusive of the land on which the College stood. Now the trustees were incorporated under this Bill, and therefore fell under the Statute of Mortmain, which he assured Sir J. Hanmer was not obsolete.—Mr. HINDLEY confessed himself convinced by the reasoning of the Attorney-General for Ireland, and therefore requested Sir J. Hanmer to withdraw his amendment.—Lord J. MANNERS said that the Attorney-General for Ireland had not given any reason why he had fixed his limit at 3000*l.* a year. He looked upon this clause as a restrictive clause, and he wished to pass this Bill in the most generous spirit.—After a discussion of some length, in which Mr. ROEBUCK, Sir R. PEEL, Mr. REDINGTON, Lord POLLINGTON, Mr. S. CRAWFORD, and Lord CLIVE, took part, the gallery was cleared for a division, but no division took place, as Sir J. HANMER immediately withdrew his amendment.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN then proposed his amendment, which would enable the trustees of the College to hold landed property to the amount of 30,000*l.*, instead of 3000*l.*, as laid down in the Bill. He declared, however, that he would not put the House to the trouble of dividing upon it if it were objected to. The amendment was opposed by Mr. HUME, Sir R. INGLIS, Mr. DARBY, and Mr. GRAINGER, and supported by Mr. SMYTHE, who expressed his hope that the State would not proscribe by act of Parliament munificent liberality in matters of religion. The Committee then divided, when there appeared—For the amendment, 52; against it, 100. Majority against it, 48. The clause was then agreed to. The 4th clause, which makes provision for the salaries of the President, Vice-President, Officers, and Professors of the College of Maynooth, was then read. On the following words in the preamble, "whereas it is expedient that provision should be made for the payment of their salaries" a general discussion on the principles of the Bill was re-commenced by Mr. FERRAND, and continued by Mr. STANSFIELD, Mr. WYSE, Mr. PLUMPTRE, Mr. SHAW, Mr. REDINGTON, and several other members, but it led to no practical result, and was only remarkable for its personality. Several clauses were then agreed to without observation. On the 15th clause being read, which provides that visitations should be held once a year, Mr. PLUMPTRE called the attention of the Committee to the objectionable doctrines taught in the class-books used at the College of Maynooth. If such doctrines were taught in the College of Maynooth, could Government consistently call upon a Protestant people to endow such an institution? The clause was then agreed to. On the 17th clause being read, which provides that the authority of the visitors was not to affect the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion, —Mr. WYSE defended the College of Maynooth from the attack made on it by Mr. Plumptre. He affirmed that Luther was not read, and had never been read in that institution. He showed that the doctrine that the Pope had power over heretical princes was not only not taught, but was positively repudiated by the professors. He could show more objectionable passages than any which Mr. Plumptre had cited, in the writings of the Reformers, from Luther downwards to the present time. But he willingly abstained, for we ought to be mutually charitable to each other—to forget the past—to remember that we all belonged to one Christian family, and to preach the doctrines of mutual faith and charity.—Mr. COLQUHOUN challenged the hon. member to cite any passage from any Protestant writer containing doctrines similar to those which had been condemned by Mr. Plumptre. If Mr. Wyse would only show that any such doctrines were taught in any college in England or Scotland, he would move for a searching inquiry, and also that such a college deserved no public confidence.—Mr. WYSE replied by pulling out of his pocket a small volume, from which he read a passage from the works of Luther, and another from the works of a Mr. Hill, a follower of John Wesley.—Mr. COLQUHOUN said that the question was not whether Roman Catholic or Protestant divines had each written objectionable passages, but whether those objectionable passages were taught in the schools and colleges of their respective creeds.—Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL observed that whatever instruction the Roman Catholics might give their flocks in Ireland, they had not left them, as the Protestant clergy had left their flocks, in the neighbourhood of the Cathedral town in the county which Mr. Plumptre represented, so totally uninstructed as to fall down and worship a maniac as the Messiah.—After a few words from Mr. PLUMPTRE and Mr. M. MILNES,—Mr. PIGOTT read the evidence of the president, vice-president, and dean of the College of Maynooth, for the purpose of showing that they all stated that the Ultramontane doctrines were not taught in the College of Maynooth.—Mr. COLQUHOUN pointed out the discrepancy which existed between the rest of the evidence in the report of 1827, and the declaration of those three officers.—Mr. REDINGTON censured Mr. Colquhoun for the recklessness with which he had adduced charges which he had never come forward to substantiate. He had heard with the utmost pain this discussion, which could not lead to any good or useful result.—Sir R. PEEL had also heard this discussion with the most acute pain: a popular assembly was the worst of all assemblies for the consideration of such topics. He then proceeded to justify the clause, and said that, in proposing it, he had taken into consideration all the evidence contained in the report of 1827.—The 17th clause was then agreed to, as were the other clauses in the Bill.—The clause providing that the expense of buildings for such College, not exceeding 30,000*l.*, be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, was then brought up. On the question that it be read a second time, Mr. LAW renewed his objections to it, and moved that it be rejected.—The Committee then divided, when there appeared for the clause—Ayes, 210; Noes, 88; Majority in its favour, 122.—The clause was then introduced. On the next clause, which provides that the annual sums payable by this act should be charged on the Consolidated Fund, Mr. LAW refused to divide, upon which Mr. HINDLEY declared that he could no longer put any faith in the false fire from Cambridge.—The Chairman then reported progress, the House resumed, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.

Monday.—Mr. BICKHAM ESCOTT was reported, at the bar, as having absented himself from a railway committee, to serve on which he had been nominated by the Committee of Selection. Mr. Escott being present, explained that his absence was caused by his decided opinion that his attendance on two public committees was quite sufficient to absorb his time, without adding to these duties, and his ordinary Parliamentary ones, the additional labour of a third committee. He was willing to obey the House in undertaking any duties within the compass of his physical ability.—A lively debate followed, during which Mr. P. M. STEWART intimated that in addition to the "comparative repose" of attendance on two public committees, he had been made chairman of a committee to which was referred a group of 10 railway bills, with 20 lawyers. A marked reference was also made to the absence of the Irish Members, and a hope was expressed that if attendance on these committees was to be rendered strictly compulsory, the House would provide for the attendance of the voluntary absentees, either by a "call" of the House, or other means; and in reply to these remarks, which were made by Mr. HUME, Lord J. RUSSELL, and Lord CASTLEREAGH, it was intimated by Lord GRANVILLE SOMERSET, that any member—English, Scotch, or Irish—absenting himself from any committee on which he might be nominated, would be committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms.—Mr. HUME then intimated that he would move a "call of the House" on Friday; and the discussion terminated by a vote of the House without a division, directing Mr. B. Escott to attend the committee on the following day.—In reply to Capt. ROUS, Mr. HOPE said that Capt. Fitzroy had been recalled from New Zealand and his successor appointed. He was happy, however, to be able to state that the dismissal of Capt. Fitzroy in no wise affected his honour and character as a gentleman and as an officer. He could also state that the removal of Capt. Fitzroy was not at all connected with the charges which had been brought against him by the New Zealand Company.—Mr. BANKES gave notice that, upon the third reading of the College of Maynooth Bill, he should move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.—In answer to questions respecting Irish measures, Sir R. PEEL stated that on Friday the Home Secretary should explain the nature of the system of academical education proposed for Ireland, and that that measure, together with the Irish Banking Bill, should have precedence of all others, except the Maynooth Bill. Early after the recess, a Bill, founded on the Landlord and Tenant Report, should be brought forward either in the House of Commons or Lords. Bills having reference to registration and to municipal corporations were at present prepared, and would be subsequently produced, the principle of the Municipal Corporations Bill being to give an equality of franchise to Ireland similar to that which exists in England; and the new franchise to be connected with the proposed registration. The Maynooth and Bank Bills would occupy all their spare time up to the beginning of June.—Mr. FRENCH, supported by Sir T. FREMANTLE, obtained leave for the Irish Great Western Railway (Dublin to Galway) "to proceed," in opposition to the decision of the "standing orders" committee. At a subsequent portion of the evening, this matter raised a considerable discussion, many members deprecating this interference with the decision of what Sir R. Peel admitted was a "judicial committee," and as being likely to lead to a revival of the old system of canvassing and jobbing.—After some conversation, raised by Capt. Rous, as to the personal merits of Capt. Fitzroy, the question was put that the report on the Maynooth College Bill be received, on which Mr. S. CRAWFORD, after enforcing the voluntary views of State Churches, moved, as an amendment, "That any provision for the separate or exclusive education of any particular religious denomination, or for the support or endowment of any religious sect or sects by State grants, or funds raised by compulsory assessment, whether under the name of tithes, rents, cesses, taxes, regium donum, or under any other name or form whatever, is a violation of the rights of conscience, detrimental to religious truth, and dangerous to civil and religious freedom; and that all such establishments, grants, or endowments now in existence in the United Kingdom ought to be discountenanced with as little delay as may be consistent with a due regard to the rights of those who have life interests in the same."—Mr. HINDLEY seconded the amendment, and Mr. WILLIAMS, Sir R. H. INGLIS, Dr. BOWRING, and General JOHNSON spoke on the subject.—Sir R. PEEL said that there was nothing which necessarily rendered the College of Maynooth exclusively an ecclesiastical institution. It was originally contemplated as a lay school; and the Catholic body, through Mr. Grattan, had petitioned against any exclusive character being given to it. But Burke, arguing that a priest educated for a life of celibacy at an institution where it might be treated with ridicule amongst the students generally, would thereby have his moral training deteriorated, prevailed; and his views were adopted by the legislature. The Roman Catholics were therefore not responsible for the actual constitution of Maynooth College.—Mr. HINDLEY adduced specific facts illustrative of the strength of the voluntary principle, as evinced by the sums raised for missionary exertions, and pleaded that all connection of the Church with the State was injurious.—On a division there appeared—For the amendment, 2; against it, 141; majority, 139.—The House then went into a committee of supply, and on a vote for wages of seamen and marines, Lord PALMERSTON drew attention to the present condition of slaves in Surinam and Cuba, with reference especially to the tolerated conduct of the Governor of Cuba by the Spanish Government, and urging on Ministers a firmer policy with those countries which evade the due performance of the treaties which we have contracted with them for the suppression of the slave-trade.—Sir R. PEEL agreed that a cordial union between France and England for the suppression of the slave-trade would be a most important step; admitted that since General O'Donnell had superseded General Valdez in the governorship of Cuba, the question of the liberation of captured Africans had become unsatisfactory; and expressed a hope that arrangements would ere long be made, calculated more effectually to suppress the slave-trade. He, however, declined going minutely into a matter for which he was unprepared, and on which a casual expression might do mischief.—Mr. HUME urged the importation of free labourers into our colonies, as the only effectual mode of suppressing the slave-trade, which, notwithstanding all the exertions made by England, was still very rife.—Mr. WARBURTON pointed out that, from the returns furnished to the House, it appeared that all our exertions only enabled us to rescue one in 72 of all negroes carried off from Africa, or about 1½ per cent. He had a right, therefore, to contend that all our exertions had failed, with the addition of exasperating the countries with whose traffic we interfered.—Sir C. NAPIER was satisfied that the only mode of destroying the slave-trade was to raise a black regiment in the West Indies, land them on the coast of Africa, and march them from north to south, destroying all the barracoons and slave stations in their way. This might be contrary to the law of nations, but it was the only way to destroy the slave-trade.—In reply to some observations from Captain PECHELL, Sir G. COCKBURN stated that the recent successes in capturing slavers on the coast of Africa justified them in asserting that their policy was suited to its object, justified as the allegation was by the fact that the price of slaves had lately risen greatly. This country could easily raise any required number of seamen; but these men, when raised, must be maintained, and if, from a fit of economy, we disbanded 4000 men in one year, we must not expect to be able to have them at our command in the next. He, however, bore testimony to the great improvement which had taken place in the general character of our naval service.—After considerable debate, turning latterly on the state of the navy, and its comparative condition under the present and late Governments, the vote was agreed to.

Tuesday.—Forty members not having been present at 4 o'clock, no House could be made.

Wednesday.—The Dublin and Galway Railway Bill was read a first time, with the understanding that its second reading is to depend on the report of a select committee, to be hereafter moved by Sir G. GREY, respecting the late suspension of the standing orders in its favour.—In answer to Capt. POLHILL, Sir J. GRAHAM stated, that in consequence of the interference of his predecessor in the Home-office, the Marquis of Normanby, it was understood that the Corporation of the City of London had established regulations by which the public generally were absolutely prohibited from being present at the "condemned sermon" in Newgate. But his attention having been called to the irregularities, to call them by no harsher name, which, owing to a misunderstanding of the sheriffs, had occurred on the Sunday preceding and the morning of Hocker's execution, he had directed a Prison Inspector to proceed to Newgate, in order to institute a searching inquiry, and if his report, when made, should seem to require it, to introduce a legislative measure founded on it.—Mr. Alderman COPELAND said that the importunity of the public on these occasions exceeded anything that could possibly be conceived, the magistrates of the City of London being overwhelmed with solicitations for seats at the trials, and the "condemned sermon." While this "morbid appetite" existed in all classes, they were placed in a difficult position; and from his own experience as a magistrate, having recently to convict individuals for stealing at the very foot of the gallows, he had come to the conclusion that executions should no longer be public spectacles, and that legislative interference was necessary.—In answer to Mr. BOUVERIE, Sir J. GRAHAM stated the results of the inquiries he had caused to be made into the truth of the accusation against Mr. Mazzini, as to his participation in the alleged assassination of two individuals at Marseilles. Until Tuesday, his original impression had been rather confirmed than otherwise; but on that day there had been transmitted to him, through the Foreign-office, the explicit opinion of the judge and public prosecutor engaged at the trial of the supposed assassins, declaring that nothing whatever had been elicited which in the slightest degree inculpated Mr. Mazzini. Had he known this before, he would have abstained from making the statement which he had done; but, having made it, and thereby inflicted a public injury on Mr. Mazzini, he could only hope that his retractation would be made as public as his original accusation.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE felt satisfied with this result.—The Lord ADVOCATE postponed the second reading of the Poor Law (Scotland) Bill to the 24th inst.—Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of the Chattel Interests (Real Property) Bill. He said the only object of the Bill was to facilitate the transfer of property under wills registered in diocesan courts, which might be afterwards discovered should have been registered in the prerogative courts.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL opposed the Bill, and moved its second reading that day six months.—Sir J. GRAHAM likewise opposed the Bill. He said he was much dissatisfied with the law of probate in this country, and he had proposed what he conceived to be a great improvement of that law: but he found that, in the present House of Commons there was not the least chance of carrying such a measure. If any reform were to be made, it should be by some comprehensive measure, and not by this small fragment.—The House divided, when the Bill was rejected by 30 to 27.—Mr. COWPER moved that his Field Gardens Bill be considered in committee pro formâ, with a view to alterations, to bring it into conformity with the Government Commons Inclosure Bill.—Mr. ROEBUCK objected to the Bill, on the ground that it was a Poor-law Bill in disguise, and was really a delusive scheme to eke out wages, under a plea of humanity. He moved as an amendment that it be considered that day six months.—Sir J. GRAHAM entreated that the Bill be permitted to pass through committee pro formâ, in order to introduce the requisite alterations. There were some portions of the measure, as it now stood, to which he had objections, as that part appointing "field wardens," who being usually the employers of labourers, and the landlords of cottages inhabited by labourers, would be placed in circumstances peculiarly calculated to tempt them to tamper with the rate of wages. But they should wait to see the shape which the Bill will ultimately assume.—Mr. ROEBUCK withdrew his amendment, and the Bill went through committee pro formâ.—On the motion that the Physic and Surgery Bill be considered in committee, Sir J. GRAHAM rose to state the alterations he had to propose in the Bill. Had he foreseen the difficulties of the question, he would not, probably, have taken it up; but having bestowed much labour on it, he was not disposed now, even at the eleventh hour, to abandon hope of a satisfactory settlement. He feared that the differences between the two conflicting bodies of the surgeons and the general practitioners were irreconcileable. The College of Surgeons, by its chartered privileges, enjoyed great influence; the general practitioners were numerically powerful. The latter, if admitted equally with surgeons into the College, would soon become the governing body. This he believed would prove injurious to the great and important science of medicine. In London, division of labour was essential to the progress and improvement of science; and it was important, for this object, that the College of Surgeons ...be retained in the hands of surgeons, for the "pure" ..., as contra-distinguished from the general practitioner, ... teacher and the promoter of medicine as a science, however, would be degraded if the College ... were turned into an apothecaries' hall. But ... it to be practicable to secure the incorporation of the ... practitioners, he proposed certain arrangements to ... that object, consistently with preserving the distinction ... classes of the profession. The College of Physicians and the College of Surgeons are to form a joint board for the examination of candidates: and there is to be another board, composed of general practitioners exclusively, before ... candidates entering on the line of general practitioners ... undergo an additional examination. The age of a ... for general practitionership is to be fixed at 22; ... physicians and surgeons at 26. The general practitioners are to be incorporated by charter; and in favour of this ... the powers and privileges of the Apothecaries' ... as enjoyed under their act of 1815, are to be transferred, with his free consent. What alteration may be necessary in the mode of constituting the Council of Health will be for the House hereafter to consider; but it is absolutely necessary that the general practitioners should be represented ... as also the University of London. An arrangement has been made between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the College of Physicians, by which, though not introduced in detail in the Bill, the practice of the metropolis will be opened to University graduates, on the condition of their appearing before the College of Physicians, at an examination at which the assessors of the Universities will be entitled to be present. There will then be the College of Physicians, the College of Surgeons, and the College of General Practitioners; the former constituting a joint board of examiners, before whom candidates must first pass, and the latter an additional board to which those who intend to enter their body. With these and other amendments, which he stated, he hoped that the House would permit him to pass the Bill through committee in order to introduce the alterations, and thus let the Bill be printed, and he would postpone further procedure until the 9th of June.—Mr. HAWES praised the measure, as large, liberal, and he hoped satisfactory to those interested. Mr. WAKLEY was of a contrary opinion. The general practitioners were unfortunately and unjustly degraded, and the multiplication of medical institutions was absurd. Surgery and medicine were one science: those fitted to practise the one should be equally so for the other. He warmly deprecated the treatment which the general practitioners were receiving from Government, and pressed the appointment of a committee to inquire into the conduct and management of the College of Surgeons. Mr. WARBURTON urged that the contemplated object of securing uniformity in medical education throughout the United Kingdom would fail, with respect to the Universities of Scotland and the surgical colleges of Ireland. After considerable debate, an unsuccessful attempt was made to "count out" the House by Mr. H. BERKELEY, who stated that the reason which had induced him to move that the House be counted was not any disrespect to Mr. Warburton, but a wish to show his disapprobation of the conduct of Ministers in refusing a House to Mr. Wakley yesterday, when he was prepared to bring the conduct of the Council of the College of Surgeons fully under the consideration of Parliament. The recent conduct of that body had justly excited the disgust of all England.—Col. T. WOOD recommended Sir J. Graham to open the door wider to merit in the medical profession. He thought that Mr. Warburton had settled this mock incorporation of the general practitioners, by showing that it would entitle the members of it to no privileges whatever. He then complained of the injustice which would be inflicted on the medical officers of the army and navy by several of the alterations now proposed by Sir J. Graham.—After a few words to the same effect from Captain ..., the House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.—In the committee a lively discussion took place between Sir J. GRAHAM and Mr. WAKLEY, on the merits of the Bill, the former defending it with great warmth, and the latter denouncing it as ..., impracticable, unjust, and tyrannical.—The several ... proposed by Sir J. GRAHAM having been made in the Bill, the House resumed; and the recommittal of the Bill was fixed for the 9th June.—The Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons Bill went through a committee. The recommittal of this Bill was also fixed for the 9th June.—The Courts of Common Law Process Bill, the Courts of Common Law Process (Ireland), and the Court of Session (Scotland) Bills, were read a second time.—The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) (No. 2) Bill was committed.

Tuesday.—On the motion of Sir G. GREY, a select committee was appointed to inquire and report whether any, and which of the standing orders which are enforced in the case of railway Bills in Great Britain are unnecessary, and ought to be dispensed with in the case of railway Bills in Ireland.—Sir J. GRAHAM announced that on Friday evening he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to establish two colleges in Ireland.—Sir T. FREMANTLE said that the Government had prepared a Bill on the subject of pauper lunatics in Ireland, and it would be introduced as soon as possible after the holidays.—Mr. HUTT moved that the House should resolve itself into a committee for the purpose of considering the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to permit grain and flour, the produce of ..., to be imported into the United Kingdom, on payment of the same amount of duty as is now levied on grain and flour the produce of Canada." The hon. member pointed out the advantages which would accrue from acceding to this proposition. It was due to Australasia as a matter of justice and good Government. If acceded to it would open new sources to improvement and prosperity. In this country it would extend our commerce, give an impulse to our manufactures, tend to relieve the distress of agriculture, and knit together Great Britain and her Australasian colonies in the bonds of mutual interest and affection.—The motion was seconded by Sir W. JAMES. Sir G. CLERK opposed the motion on the ground that Australasian corn could not be imported into England at a profit, and that therefore the concession would be worth little if anything to the colony. He also objected to it because he would not unsettle the Corn-law of 1842. He considered it unwise to be constantly tampering with a law on which the greatest portion of the community had embarked their capital and labour. The case of Canada could form no precedent, for that concession was made in pursuance of an agreement specially made with that colony by the Secretary of State. If the Canada Corn-law was an anomaly, that was no reason why a fresh anomaly should be introduced into the legislation of the country.—Mr. LABOUCHERE said that, though he should support the motion, he was not insensible to the danger of extending a system which he believed to be unwise and inexpedient. But he had only a choice of difficulties, and he saw the Australians coming forward, and by the voice of their governors, and resolutions of their legislature, asking to be put on a footing with their fellow colonists. He could not on what ground he could refuse to accede to their request.—Capt. ROCK, Mr. M. GIBSON, Mr. F. T. BARING, and Mr. BRIGHT supported the motion; and Mr. Deputy MOORE, Mr. J. S. WORTLEY, and Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN opposed it. Sir R. PEEL then explained at some length the reasons which had induced the Government to pass the Canada Corn-bill, and expressed a doubt whether it would be for the advantage of the Australasian colonies to fulfil the conditions which would be called upon to fulfil on receiving the privilege contemplated by Mr. Hutt. The Australasian Colonies now received foreign corn into Great Britain duty free; it was now proposed that they should bring corn into Great Britain corn duty free; but Mr. Hutt had not called upon the Australians as Government had called upon the Canadians to levy a duty of 3s. a quarter on all foreign corn brought into their country. He thought that that gentleman, from allowing his mind to dwell long upon this subject, had greatly overrated the benefits which the course recommended by him would confer upon Australasian agriculture. He would much rather consider the question of allowing the introduction of corn duty free from all our colonies than that of allowing it to come in duty free from any one colony in particular. He considered the present motion to be the precursor of many other motions of a similar character, introduced for no other purpose than that of producing a constant discussion on the Corn-laws, and, as such, he would meet it with the most decided opposition. His belief was, that, as this motion, if carried, would excite great alarm among the agricultural interest of this country, and would not create any additional trade in corn between the colonies and Great Britain, the evil would far outweigh the advantage anticipated from it. He repeated, in conclusion, that the case of Australasia was not identical with that of Canada—that Australasia had no claim in justice to the boon now asked for her, and that on grounds of expediency and policy, it was not fitting that he should disturb the settlement of the Corn-laws, to which Parliament had assented in 1842.—Lord HOWICK had never yet heard a speech made by a gentleman standing in the high position of Sir R. Peel that had filled him with so much shame as that which had just been delivered. When the Canada Corn Bill was introduced, the House was told that it was bound to treat Canada as an integral part of the British empire. Ought it not to consider Australasia also as an integral part of the same empire? Two arguments had been used against this motion which were quite inconsistent with each other. It had been said—first, that so much corn would come in from Australasia as would create alarm in the agricultural mind; and, secondly, that so little would come in as would prove that this boon would be no advantage to the colonies. He wished to know on which of these arguments Sir R. Peel intended to take his stand? If so much corn were to come in as to alarm his agricultural friends, it was quite evident that this motion would confer a boon on the Australasian colonies. If on the other hand, so little corn came in as to prove that this motion was no boon to those colonies, what became of the alarm of the agricultural interest? He warned Sir R. Peel that he was on this occasion pursuing exactly the same course which had produced so much mischief and dissatisfaction in Ireland. He was refusing to a sense of justice in Australia that which he had conceded in Canada to intimidation. He told him to beware how he taught the colonies the same fatal lesson which he had inculcated with such ill-omened success into the minds of the people of Ireland.—Mr. NEWDEGATE trusted that the argument of Lord Howick would come home to the bosom of Sir R. Peel, and would induce him never to yield to force that which he would not grant to justice. He approved the course adopted by Sir R. Peel on this motion, and should join him in meeting it with the most decided opposition.—After a few words from Mr. PLUMPTRE, and a reply from Mr. HUTT, the House divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 93; Against it, 147; Majority against it, 54.—Lord DALMENY then obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend an Act entitled "An Act to exempt from county, borough, parochial, and other local rates, land and buildings occupied by scientific or literary societies," and Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend an Act to establish military savings' banks. Both Bills were read a first time.

Missionary Societies.—The Church Missionary Society held their 45th anniversary on Tuesday, in Exeter-hall, the Earl of Chichester in the chair, supported on the platform by Lord Ashley, Lord Sandon, Sir R. H. Inglis, the Bishops of Chester, Ripon, and Cashel, and upwards of 800 clergymen and gentlemen. About 4000 persons were in the body of the hall, more than 3700 of whom were ladies. The report gave an encouraging view of the Society's operations in the African districts, Asia Minor, New Zealand, and in the three Presidencies of India. Numerous converts during the past year had been made, and there appeared to be a growing desire amongst the persons to whom missionaries had been sent to avail themselves of the advantages of Christian instruction. The receipts for the year were 105,249*l.* A strong appeal was made in behalf of missionary schemes in China. On the motion of Sir R. H. Inglis, seconded by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, the report was adopted. Lord Ashley, the Rev. Hugh M'Neile, the Rev. H. Stowell, and other gentlemen having addressed the assembly, the meeting adjourned until the evening, when the Marquis of Cholmondeley presided, and was well supported. Mr. Plumptre, M.P.; the Rev. H. Cunningham, Vicar of Harrow; the Rev. E. Bickersteth, Herts; and other gentlemen addressed the meeting in support of resolutions expressive of thankfulness for the success which had attended the Society's operations. A resolution was also passed pledging the meeting to support the Society's operations in Hong-kong and other parts of China.—The annual meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was held on Monday in Exeter-hall. The chair was announced to be taken at 11, but as early as 8 o'clock people were standing outside the doors waiting for admission. There were between 3000 and 4000 persons present, by far the greater number being ladies. The Marquis of Breadalbane took the chair, supported by the Right Hon. Sir G. Rose, the Hon Fox Maule, the Rev. Dr. Bunting, and other leading members of the Wesleyan body, including ministers from Berlin, New York, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Manchester, Bolton, Leeds, and other important towns. The report gave a favourable account of the progress of the Wesleyan Missions, and was received with acclamation.

British and Foreign School Society.—The 40th annual meeting of this society was held on Saturday at Exeter-hall. Lord J. Russell took the chair, and the hall and galleries were well filled—the greater proportion of the audience consisting of the fair sex. On the platform were Lord Howick, Sir G. Grey, M.P., Mr. V. Smith, M.P., Mr. S. Gurney, Dr. Campbell, Mr. Hawes, M.P., Lord Ebrington, Mr. Hindley, M.P., Dr. Lushington, and Lord J. Stuart, M.P. After an address from Lord J. Russell, Mr. S. Gurney, the treasurer, read the financial statement, from which it appeared that the total receipts for the year ending December 31, 1844 (including Her Majesty's annual subscription of 100*l.* and a donation from the Duke of Bedford to the same amount), had been 16,393*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.*; the expenditure 16,140*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.*; leaving in the hands of the treasurer a balance of 252*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.* The report was unanimously adopted, with a resolution moved by Dr Lushington, to the effect that the meeting being deeply sensible of the necessity which still existed for the extension and improvement of education among the labouring classes, rejoiced to hear of the establishment of 204 new schools in connexion with this society during the past year, and expressed its hope that greater efforts would be made in future to promote scriptural instruction. The Rev. Dr. Bart, of Wirtemberg, moved the next resolution, which was to the effect:—"That this meeting, while deeply solicitous for the spread of Christian instruction in England, cannot forget the claims of the colonies and other dependencies of Great Britain, and trusts that a large measure of success may attend the establishment of schools in Africa, in the East and West Indies, and in other colonies of Great Britain." The Rev. J. Aldis seconded the motion, which was agreed to, and an address of thanks adopted to Her Majesty and Prince Albert for their patronage and support.

British and Foreign Bible Society.—The annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held on Wednesday at Exeter-hall, which was crowded in every part by the friends and supporters of the institution. Lord Teignmouth occupied the chair, in the absence of Lord Bexley, and was supported by Lord Glenelg, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, Mr. Plumptre, M.P., the Bishops of Norwich, Chester, Cashel, and a large body of the clergy. The Chairman having briefly opened the business of the day, the Secretary read the report. It appeared, from the financial portion of it, that the free contributions of auxiliary societies amounted to 31,548*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, being an excess of 1904*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* over those of last year; the donations to 6324*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*; and the legacies to 853*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* These, with a few other items, gave a total for the general objects of the society of 49,855*l.* 17*s.*—being an increase in this department of the receipts to the extent of 3292*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.* The money received on the purchase account was 47,899*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*; and the Society had expended during the year 85,817*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*; its present engagements amounting to more than 42,000*l.* The issues of the Scriptures had been—at home, 695,600; abroad, 310,211; total, 915,811 copies. The report was unanimously adopted, and several of the noblemen and gentlemen present subsequently addressed the meeting.

The Coliseum.—This popular place of entertainment has recently undergone a thorough renovation, both as regards scenery and decorations; and so successfully has Mr. Bradwell laboured for the public amusement that it promises to become for a long time the favourite exhibition in the metropolis. The large panorama of London has been repainted by Mr. E. T. Parris, the room of sculpture has been rearranged on improved principles, and new scenes illustrative of Alpine scenery, the cave of Adelsberg, and other interesting objects, have been added, making altogether a surprising variety of effects considering the small space into which they are crowded. Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the Exhibition with a visit, on Saturday, before it was thrown open to the public, and expressed the highest satisfaction at the ingenuity and taste of the arrangements.

The Medical Reform Bill.—On Tuesday evening the National Association of General Practitioners in Medicine, Surgery, and Midwifery, met at the Hanover-square rooms, to receive the report of the committee, relative to the proposed college, the qualifications and franchise of members, &c. Mr. R. R. Pennington, president, in the chair. Mr. H. Ancell, one of the secretaries, submitted the report of the committee, which recommended the application for a new charter, and recorded the result of an appeal to the members of the association (now 4000 in number), whose votes were found to be unequivocally in favour of a five years' franchise and 15 years' qualification for a seat in the council. A long and stormy discussion followed, the chief point at issue being the course of procedure with regard to the College of Surgeons—whether to seek a reconciliation with that body, or the incorporation of a distinct one. Mr. Hawes, M.P., urged the necessity of unanimity in their proceedings, in order to render them effective, and hoped he should be able to fight the battles of the general practitioner in cordial concurrence with his hon. friend, the member for Finsbury. Mr. Hillier and Mr. Wakley, M.P., addressed the meeting, the latter speaker in justification of his former charges against the committee of the National Association, and in support of a conciliatory tone towards the College of Surgeons, whose valuable museum, library, &c., were too important to be sacrificed. Succeeding speakers denied that any right would be sacrificed by the members of the new college; and after hearing Mr. Clifton, Dr. Webster, and others, in favour of the report, the meeting agreed to its adoption, the number of hostile hands being comparatively very small. Mr. Wakley again attempted to address the chair, but the greatest confusion prevailed for some time. He was understood to propose a resolution deprecating a new charter; but, having been informed by the secretary that the avowed object of the National Association was to apply for a new incorporation, irrespective of the College of Surgeons, Mr. Wakley withdrew his proposition, declaring that he had heard, for the first time, that such was the object to which the Association was pledged, and intimating his conviction that the country would hear the avowal with much dissatisfaction. Resolutions were then passed admitting country practitioners to the committee of the Association, and sanctioning the term of franchise and qualification voted for by members.

University College.—The distribution of prizes to the students of medicine took place on Wednesday. Dr. Paris, the president of the Royal College of Physicians, in the chair. Much interest was excited by the appearance, among the visitors, of four native students of the College of Calcutta, in the full costume of their country, with Dr. Goodeve, the professor of anatomy in that institution. One of these had received the medal of his College. Dr. Paris opened the business by expressing his gratification at being invited to discharge the duty of delivering the prizes to the students. He did not the less appreciate the distinction thus conferred on him of occupying a post which had been filled by so many eminent predecessors, because he was indebted for it to the office which he had the honour of holding as President of the Royal College of Physicians. On the contrary, he was the more gratified that the compliment was to his office rather than to himself, as it afforded proof of the existence of harmonious feeling so desirable between boards of examination and institutions of education. He had taken pains to inform himself of the condition of the College, and had been highly gratified at the ample appliances which he found provided within this noble institution for the instruction of its students. Although he had particularly admired the arrangements for teaching chemistry, both theoretically and practically, he had not been less struck with the advantages presented for the study of anatomy by the valuable collections in the museums, and by the vast dissecting room, so well adapted for the purpose by the spaciousness and modes of light and ventilation. He called on the Dean of the Faculty, Dr. Williams, to read the report of the faculty. The report stated that the number of students of the faculty was 306, of whom 94 had commenced their studies this year; and that the change among the teachers had been the appointment of Mr. George, formerly a distinguished student of the College, teacher of dental surgery. Much satisfaction was expressed with the conduct of the students during the past session and with their attainments, evidenced as well by the examinations of which they were met to announce the results, as by the distinctions conferred by the University of London, where four out of six scholarships and exhibitions, and eight out of 16 gold medals, had been obtained by the students of this College. The report concluded with an expression of satisfaction at the frequent substantial proofs of the high attainments of the students of the College, exhibited by the successful professional career of many who had been distinguished for their assiduity and talent, and who on similar occasions had gained prizes, which had proved to be the sure earnest of future prosperity. The awards of the professors were then announced, and the prizes delivered by the Chairman in the following order:—Medicine (Professor Williams, M.D.)—Gold medal, Nicholas Henry Littleton, of Saltash, Cornwall: first silver medal, Alexander Henry, of Kingsbridge, Devon; second silver medal, John Elliott Wood, of Rochdale, Lancashire. Anatomy and Physiology (Professor Sharpey, M.D.) — Gold medal, William Henry Ransom, of Cromer, Norfolk; first silver medal, F. Cornelius Webb, of Devon; second silver medal, C. W. Randell, of Reading. Chemistry (Professor Graham) — Gold medal, William Henry Ransom; first silver medal, Alfred Williams, of Scarborough; second silver medal, Edward Palmer, of Sheffield. Silver medals (Essay) equal, Alfred Laming and T. A. Cammack. Anatomy (Professor Quain).—Gold medal, William Henry Rausom; first silver medal C. W. Randell; second silver medal, W. Cock, of Rame Cornwall. Junior Class.—Silver medal, W. D. Wilkes of Salisbury. Comparative Anatomy (Professor Grant, M.D.) — Gold medal, Alexander Henry. Materia Medica (Professor Thomson, M.D.)—Gold medal. Thomas Park, of Lincoln; first silver medal, Edward B. Passmore, of Bath; second silver medal, Edward Palmer. Midwifery (Professor Murphy, M.D.).—Gold medal, John Elliott Wood; first silver medal, W. Withers Moore, of Doncaster; second silver medal, John Gabb, of Bewdley. Surgery (Professor Cooper).—Gold medal, William Cadge, of Norfolk; first silver medal, W. W. Woore; second silver medal, Robert Ripley, of Whitby, Dental Surgery (Mr. D. George, lecturer)—Silver medal, Alfred Jackson, of Portsmouth. SUMMER TERM, 1844.—Botany (Professor Lindley, Ph.D.)—Gold medal: John Owen Evans, of Stoke Newington; silver medal, George Hewlett Bayley, of London. Medical Jurisprudence (Professor Thomson, M.D.)—Prizes equal: John Newton, of Nottingham; William Brown, of Cornwall. Pathological Anatomy (Professor Walshe, M.D.)—Gold medal: Alfred Jackson. Fellowes Clinical Gold Medal.—Robert D. Harling, of Chester. The Chairman dismissed the meeting with a short address of congratulation to the successful competitors, and of encouragement to those who had found their efforts surpassed by their fellow-students. These he exhorted to bear in mind that disappointment in the attainment of an object should animate to renewed exertions for future success. He then commented on the advantages which the College affords for the cultivation of those literary and scientific branches of education which should be preliminary to the study of every profession, and recommended that all who contemplated becoming practitioners in medicine, should avail themselves of them as an indispensable preparation for their intended pursuits. On this subject he expressed his concurrence in the views so lucidly set forth by Professor Quain, of this College, in his recent pamphlet addressed to the Secretary of State, on the effect which some of the clauses of the new Medical Bill were calculated to produce on the education of the faculty, and said that the way in which he had advocated this question entitled him to the respect and gratitude of all medical men.—Lord Auckland, in the name of the council, offered their thanks to the chairman for the able manner in which he had discharged the duty; and on his lordship's motion, thanks were likewise voted by acclamation.

City Antiquities.—On Saturday, as some workmen were engaged in excavating the ground adjoining the church of St. Lawrence Jewry, in Gresham-street, for the formation of a sewer, they found the original Roman wall, which was constructed previous to the Roman wall which passed along London-wall, and proceeded to the Tower. The wall was at a depth of about 12 feet from the surface, and was composed of Kentish rags, chalk, and Roman tiles, firmly cemented together. The tiles were about 14 inches square.

Anti-Maynooth Conference.—The adjourned sitting of the conference have been brought to a close this week, after numerous delegates from several important towns in the United Kingdom had been heard in opposition to the Bill. Many of the delegates reported the results of interviews with their representatives in Parliament, and stated that several members had pledged themselves to vote against the second reading. Resolutions were also proposed and adopted, recommending that meetings should be held by the various deputations on their return, and that it was desirable that Sunday, the 18th, be appointed as a day for especial prayer.

Loss of the Duke of Sussex Steamer.—The Duke of Sussex steamer, on her passage to Boulogne on the 2d inst., sprung a leak about 14 miles from thence, her engine-room filled with water, and her fires being extinguished, she drove on shore, when within 300 yards from the pier-head of Boulogne, and was wrecked. The crew and passengers were saved, but very little of the ship's furniture was secured before she went to pieces.

Library of the late Duke of Sussex.—On Monday the sale of the fifth portion of the library of the late Duke of Sussex, after lasting 12 days, was concluded at Messrs. Evans' rooms in Pall Mall. The number of lots disposed of was 2956. The sum they realised amounted to near 2500*l.* The 6th and concluding portion of the sale will shortly take place.

Death of Mr. Thomas Hood.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. Hood, which took place on Saturday, after a long and severe illness. The event had been long expected both by himself and family; indeed, from the nature of his disease, no hope of recovery could be entertained. Mr. Hood was well known as a popular writer and humourist; his works will be long remembered, and for genuine humour were unrivalled.

The Self-accused Murderer.—The man named Walter Chambers, who accused himself of being the murderer of the barmaid Davis, near the Regent's-park, in 1837, was again brought up on Friday, but, as was anticipated, the charge ended in nothing. It appears that he was drunk when he made the statement, that he was formerly in business as a publican at Dockhead, where he failed, and that he has twice been a constable in the police force. The prisoner expressed his contrition for his foolish and mischievous conduct, and was ordered to enter into his recognizance in 25*l.* for his good behaviour for the next six months.

Murder at Greenwich.—On Sunday morning the infant son of Mr. S. D. Ffinch, of South-street, solicitor, and clerk to the magistrates, was murdered by the nurse girl, Martha Bricksey, who nearly cut its head off with a table-knife while sleeping in his cot. The girl had received notice to quit Mr. Ffinch's service, and was the first to give notice that she had murdered the infant. The jury, at the inquest, returned a verdict of Wilful Murder, and the prisoner was committed for trial.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending May 3:—West Districts, 150; Northern, 129; Central, 163; Eastern, 206; Southern, 235; Total, 883; males, 460; females, 423. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1339; males, 701; females, 638.

Lostwithiel.—One of the largest fires that has been known in Cornwall for many years happened a few days since, in the parish of Boconnoc, adjacent to the park of the Hon. G. Fortescue. It originated among some loose furze on a large heath, by the falling of a quantity of burning peat, and owing to the dried condition of the furze, the flames spread in all directions. The surrounding domains being in danger, about 250 labourers were engaged to stop its progress. They immediately attempted to check it by cutting down the shrubs, but they speedily found this of no avail, for before they could remove it, it became fired. The conflagration is described to have been one of a most serious character, and at one time fears were entertained for the safety of Bradock church and the park. After it had raged for several hours, destroying nearly 200 acres of plantation, the fire was at length subdued by digging a deep trench in advance of the flames. The property belonged to the Hon. G. Fortescue.

Oxford.—The following document, in reference to Tract 90, has been published with the signature of Dr Symons, as Vice-Chancellor. At a meeting of the board of heads of houses and proctors held May 5, 1845, the Vice-Chancellor having communicated to the board a memorial from members of Convocation, very numerously signed, conveying their "earnest entreaty that the University of Oxford, having been precluded by the intervention of the proctors from publicly expressing its opinion upon the '90th Tract for the Times,' the matter may again be submitted to Convocation." Resolved, "That the board gladly recognise in this memorial the cordial desire of members of Convocation to co-operate with the heads of houses and proctors in their endeavours to maintain the statutes of the University, and to secure integrity of subscription to the articles of religion. That the board retain the same opinion of the '90th Tract for the Times' which they expressed to the University at the time of its first publication, and upon which they appealed in February last to the judgment of Convocation. Trusting, however, to the moral effect of the decision then pronounced by the University upon a kindred subject, and considering also that the question of a faithful subscription to the articles of religion is at present submitted to a high ecclesiastical tribunal, the board are of opinion, that a formal censure of the tract need not, under existing circumstances, be brought before Convocation. And the Vice-Chancellor is requested to communicate these resolutions to those members of Convocation by whom the memorial was presented to him."

Sittingbourne.—On Monday evening a destructive fire, which illuminated the surrounding country for many miles, broke out in the stabling belonging to Mr. Ludgater, farmer, of Lower Halston, about 4 miles from Sittingbourne. The premises, which form an extensive range, consisting of substantial barns and granaries, stacks of corn, stables for several horses, sheds for agricultural implements, and waggon lodges, are, with their contents, completely consumed, and the total loss is not less than 2000*l.* The fire was entirely accidental.

Wells.—On Friday evening as Dr. Goodenough, the Dean of Wells, was walking round his fields near his residence, accompanied by his son, a lad of about 12 years of age, he found two boys sporting on the grass, and beckoned to them to desist, but the boys taking no notice he ran after them, and succeeded in capturing one, and whilst in the act of shaking him by the collar, as a punishment for the offence, he fell down on the grass, apparently in a fit. A woman who witnessed the fall, hastened to the spot, and asked the son who it was, but on the child replying that it was his papa, and that he would be all right again in a minute or two, she proceeded with her walk. She, however, had not gone far before she heard a death-like noise, apparently proceeding from the deceased, whereupon she returned, and again asked the child who it was, telling him that, as he appeared to be in a very serious condition, she would send for assistance. The son answered that it was the Dean of Wells, and begged the woman to dispatch some one to the deanery, which she did without delay. On the news reaching the deanery, medical aid was immediately dispatched, but life was quite extinct. The jury, at the inquest, returned a verdict of accidental death.

Yarmouth.—One of the most calamitous events which ever befel this town took place on Friday week, and has spread lamentation and grief throughout the entire population. The scene of this dreadful event was the Suspension-bridge, on the North-quay, crossing the river Bure, and which has been the entrance to the town from the railway terminus, and the new road from Acle. It appears that Cook's equestrian company has for some time been staying in the town, and on the morning of this fatal day it was announced by public handbills that one of the clowns would sail up the Bure, starting from Yarmouth-bridge to the Vauxhall-gardens, at 5 o'clock, in a common washing-tub, drawn by four "real geese," elegantly harnessed and caparisoned. At the time appointed, this absurd exhibition took place. The clown and his geese started from the Old Bridge in the presence of an immense concourse of persons, who had assembled on the banks of the river to witness the feat. By far the most advantageous view was had from the Suspension-bridge, and this was eagerly sought for by the populace. About 400 persons occupied this position, and were pressing on the south side to obtain the first glance of the exhibition. The bridge is an elegant structure, suspended from two piers, and capable of standing a much larger number of persons; but every point of vision towards the spot where the geese were to be looked for was densely crammed with men, women, and children, and even the chains and suspenders had many occupants. In order to accommodate the increased railway traffic, which has lately used the bridge, the proprietors have extended the bridge on each side the chains, to the extent of 4 feet for foot passengers, and the platform on the south side was the chief receptacle for the multitude who were on the bridge on this occasion; the north side was comparatively empty, consequently there was an extreme pressure on the south—so much so, that the crown of the bridge, instead of maintaining its convex form, was completely flattened. A gentleman remarked this circumstance to a companion, but at this moment all eyes were stretched to the utmost, for the first announcement of the clown's appearance. This anxiety was brought to its highest pitch by the cry of "Here come the geese." At the same instant, the bridge was observed to give way; it lowered on one side; the chains snapped asunder, one after another in momentary succession, and the bridge hung suspended on one side by its unbroken chains—cleared of all its occupants—every one of whom was plunged into the stream. Those who witnessed it asserted that not a scream was heard nor a sound emitted from the unfortunate victims. A fearful splash and a few struggles only recognised the spot which had swallowed such a mass of human life. Some few men hanging by the broken chains were earnestly entreated to maintain their hold, but it was soon observed that in consequence of the obstruction of the stream by the fallen bridge, and the human bodies below, the advancing tide would soon bury even them from sight. Every boat was immediately in requisition, and as many as 25 were soon on the spot, and rendered active service. The children were many of them found with their heads fast in the railing (which on the bursting of the chains lapped over into the water), doubtless fixed in that position in their anxiety to witness the sight. It was with difficulty they were extricated, and there were some discovered with their heads smashed to pieces by the falling of the iron-work. A few of the bodies were not dead when taken out of the water, and were restored by proper attention, but by 11 o'clock at night 73 dead bodies had been found. The great majority of them were women and children. Persons whose relatives and children were down to see the sight, on hearing of the catastrophe, flocked from all parts of the town to make inquiries, and to examine the dead bodies; fathers and mothers were moaning for their children, and children for their parents, husbands for their wives, and the distressing scene was such that no description can do justice to. The bodies were removed by the relations as they were recognised, and at 12 o'clock only one body remained that had not been recognised. According to the latest accounts, 113 bodies have been taken out of the river; the number will probably be 130 to 140, as many are under the bridge, as well as those who have been carried up the river. The bridge has fallen down on the side nearest Breydon, and forms a complete barrier to the stream and navigation. The excitement and sympathy occasioned by this painful disaster continues unabated, and the trains are overflowing.

Ireland.

Dublin.—The Maynooth Grant appears to have been received by some of the Catholic prelates less graciously than Mr. O'Connell's declarations had led Ministers to anticipate. Dr. M'Hale and Dr. Higgins have published long letters to show how insufficient this grant is to satisfy the demands of Ireland, and Dr. Higgins in particular has expressed himself with so much violence, that Mr. Hindley on Friday night called the attention of Parliament to his address, in order to show how little was to be expected from conciliation. The following is the passage alluded to:—

"Much has been said about the gratitude we owe for the grant to Maynooth, but I confess that I for one (and I am joined in the sentiment by the priests and people of this diocese) feel no gratitude whatever. In the first place, our own energies and determination wrung that paltry sum from a bigoted and anti-Irish Cabinet; nor shall we ever thank the rich glutton when he disdainfully flings us the crumbs from his table. Secondly, the grant is so miserable in amount, that it can be looked upon in no other light than as a sheer mockery and insult. There are 8,000,000 Catholics in this country, and the grant would be about three farthings yearly to each. Does the childish Minister imagine that the Catholics of Ireland would not give annually three farthings each for the education of their revered clergy? or does he so far deceive himself as to believe that any one Irishman would sell his birthright for that notable sum? It would appear, however, that he does actually indulge in this extravagant delusion, and expects that we will, one and all, sit down quite contented with a mock representation, bad laws, bad partisan magistrates, a domineering and robbing corporation called the Church establishment; in short, that we will patiently endure every species of misrule, misrepresentation, and oppression, and all this for the yearly sum of three farthings per head."

Some doubt has been thrown during the last week on the probability of Her Majesty's visit this summer. The altered tone in the Repeal organs, which now threaten that cries of "Repeal" shall be heard in every quarter where Her Majesty may appear, is supposed to have thrown some impediment in the way; and Mr. O'Connell has acknowledged that his anxiety for the royal visit has very much diminished. The Nation says:

"If the Queen come she shall not complain of Irish deceit or Irish sycophancy; nor shall she leave us ignorant of Ireland's determination. If she come, she shall be welcomed with the cry of 'Repeal;' in our thoroughfares it shall make her coursers tremble; in her revels it shall break in like a round shot; in her levee it shall approach her in the green uniform of her new volunteers; in her council it shall reach her a confederate nation's demand for an army and a senate of their own."

Notwithstanding these demonstrations the corporation have resolved, though not by a large majority, to send an address of invitation to Her Majesty, praying her to visit her loyal subjects in Ireland.

The Weekly Meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday, in Conciliation-hall, Mr. M. J. Farry in the chair. Mr. S. O'Brien read a letter from Mr. Grey Porter, announcing his retirement from the Association. Mr. Porter, in his letter, adverts to the speeches at the Dundalk meeting, as pledging the Association to the establishment of a Parliament in Dublin, and says:—"If the Repeal members would make a trial in Parliament to get a fair union (and thousands and thousands of Irishmen, now hostile or neutral, would assist them in the trial, and it could be done within a month), and should fail in the attempt, I would be as warm an advocate of a Parliament in Dublin as yourself, and you would then carry with you the public opinion of the country. But without the previous failure of such an attempt, i. e., without some visible proof of the necessity of an Irish Parliament, I am quite sure that you cannot even try to establish a Parliament in Dublin without a violent civil war and social revolution. I especially regret that the Association will not at this most favourable time use its great influence to get a better Act of Union, as I think that in that case her Majesty might visit Ireland this summer, and that those questions which have so long disturbed the country might be brought to a fair and honourable settlement, and a great career of prosperity open to Ireland. I also quite deny that under an Irish Parliament, and with separate independence (and the terms are, in fact, one and the same), the people of Ireland are likely to be better off, or to enjoy more liberty or more happiness of any kind, than under a good union with Great Britain, and under one supreme legislative Parliament in London, over this immense empire." Mr. O'CONNELL then rose to move that the letter of Mr. Grey Porter be inserted on the minutes, and that the thanks of the Association be tendered to him for the spirit and manliness of his conduct. He (Mr. Porter) differed with them, as he had a perfect right to do. He had made an experiment, and although attached to his own opinions, he nevertheless respected their. Surely, Mr. Porter must have forgotten that he had established a Precursor Society; and if they had succeeded in obtaining the object which they aimed at, namely perfect equality with England, they would never have sought for a Repeal of the Union. After some routine business, Mr. O'Connell again addressed the meeting, referring to the condition of the people, and asserting they would therefore continue the agitation in the same legal and constitutional manner which had at all times characterised their exertions. During the present month they would have a demonstration in Cork, and another in Meath, besides the celebration of the 30th of May, in Dublin. Against the commencement of the next session of Parliament, they would have petitions from every county, every town, every village, and every family in Ireland, in favour of domestic legislation. He was determined that the British Minister should have similar demonstration of the feelings and wishes of the Irish people. Sir R. Peel seemed disposed to win the people of Ireland from him. He would freely give them to him, but he knew the terms. The Minister deserved their gratitude for abolishing the duty on glass, and the monopoly of the Bank of Ireland, and also for his excellent Maynooth Bill. He was grateful for these measures, and he understood they were to be succeeded by others of an equally liberal character. He trusted he was not misinformed, but he could not be grateful by anticipation; he would thank him for them when he saw them. Let Ireland be conciliated, and England might defy the conjugated powers of the world.—The rent for the week was 406*l.* 8*s.*

Dundalk.—The Repeal Meeting and Banquet in this town is one of the leading topics of the papers, which describe it as the greatest demonstration which has occurred for months. It took place on Thursday of last week. Mr. O'Connell on entering the town addressed the people at great length, in the Market-square. He said:—

"I will take all I can get for the Irish people, and I will ask for the rest the moment afterwards. Give me, I will say, sixpence in the pound of my debt, and I will look out afterwards for the other nineteen and sixpence. They came out on me and said—'We, great Ministers of State, will take away the people from O'Connell, and from the other Repeal leaders—from Smith O'Brien' (Cries of 'No'). I could say to myself, but you were not there to say the no. Ministers, amongst themselves, said they would take away from you the Repealers, but they said, 'How will we take them away?—oh, we will give a spoonful of honey to Maynooth College.' And there is an old proverb that you can catch more flies with a spoonful of honey than with a tun of vinegar. They were using the vinegar hitherto, and they at length sent it to us in a vinegar-cruet on two legs, Attorney-General Smith. But, said they, we cannot catch any flies with the vinegar, and we will now try the honey. Well, the honey was very good, and from my heart I am delighted that Maynooth got it, but I can tell the Government this for their comfort, that they are as near catching the flies as if they had used nothing but vinegar. Be it remembered that not a single Roman Catholic of the millions of Catholics that are to be found in Ireland petitioned for that increase to the Maynooth grant. Not a single petition was presented for it on behalf of the Irish Catholics. For my own part I did not say so much as 'Ah, do be so kind as to give it to us.' Not the least compliment did we condescend to ask at their hands. Nobody asked them for it. They did it of themselves—of their own free will and accord; and why, do you think? I'll tell you. For a reason they had. That reason was a deep-sounding one—a long one—a loud one. The same bird which discoursed so eloquently to them at home spoke also in America, and in a place which had been called, after the Irish idiom, O'Beggan. 'Oregon!' shouted the American bird. 'Maynooth!' cried the bird in London, and between both birds we managed to pluck some feathers off our friends in high places; but we are not one bit the more reconciled to the wild geese on that account. Why should not your bosom beat high with hope? Are you aware that Peel has acknowledged we cannot be put down by force? Yes, he has distinctly admitted that Repeal agitation cannot be put down by force, and he is right. He can't put us down by force, because we will use no force against him; and the question then resolves itself merely to this—who will be the first to give way? We will never give way. We will bide our time in tranquillity and peace, and take our opportunity when it comes. Things can't remain as they are. Before three months elapse, England may be in a war. Good luck to her in that war if she does justice to Ireland first. I will not pray at all on the other side of the question—for it is past praying for. There is no knowing how soon some vicissitudes in the fortunes of England may achieve everything for us, and take my word for it, that if there be a war within the next three months or so you will be walking up to Dublin before Christmas next, with small sticks in your hands, just for the purpose of seeing what an Irish Parliament looks like. Every political blessing that you can set your hearts upon will inevitably follow from Repeal."—Mr. O'Connell's health having been drank at the banquet, he said—"We have become a nation in operation before we are one in point of law. We have the power of a nation before we have the army or navy of a nation—and the humble individual who addresses you, representing the wants, the wishes, the peaceable qualities of the Irish people, becomes disengaged from his own nothingness, and expands into the powers of one of the monarchies of Europe by this magic. I have not personaly deserved it; but I cannot shut my eyes to it, nor can others, that insignificant as I am individually yet I am one of the class of ruling powers. Whoever shall declare war, or truckle for peace, our determination is, not to make peace with anybody. We shall not carry on war with any person, nor shall we make peace with anybody, until we make it in College-green. The conduct of the Ministry, to be sure, is most consolatory, but at the same time, there is something in it like inconsistency—tergiversation—turning round—and then jumping Jim Crow. They come to a resolution one day—they declare it solemnly and publicly; but notwithstanding its solemnity, it is as perishable as those beautiful sentences of determination which the schoolboy writes in the strand when the tide is out, but all trace of which is obliterated by the next wave that passes over the sand on which they are traced. The Secretary of State for the Home Department declared that concession to Ireland had reached its limits, but the waves from Conciliation-hall have blotted out that declaration, and like the inscription of the schoolboy, every vestige of it is obliterated. I am thankful for what we have got, but we have not asked for it. I have not heard of any Irish petitions in favour of it, with the exception of a few, for which I am grateful, and one of which was from Belfast. But the Catholic people are looking on with the dignity of men who had been fully robbed and ought to be conciliated. They are looking calmly on, allowing those who robbed them to make them restitution. There is no exaggeration in stating it that the opinions of the British Ministry, of the British Government, must abide the messages of peace they send to Ireland. If they conciliate Ireland they can bully the rest of the world, but they cannot bully Ireland. They tried in vain before—they sent me to jail for one hundred days, and I rejoice to say that we are a hundred times stronger now than when we went into jail. We have only one course to adopt, and that is perseverance, keeping at the same time within the bounds of the law."

CHESTER RACES.

WEDNESDAY. The principal event of these races was the Cup, or Tradesmen's Plate of 200 sovs, added to a Handicap of 25 sovs each, 15 ft, and 5 only if declared. 12 subs, 9 paid 5 sovs each. Mr. Skerratt's Intrepid, b b, 4 yrs, 6st 6lb, beat Mr. Gully's St Lawrence, aged, 8st 9lb; Mr. Mostyn's Malton, 4 yrs, 8st 8lb; Mr. Hesseltine's Fitz Allen, 4 yrs, 5st, and 16 others who were not placed. Won by 3 lengths. The race commenced in heavy rain, which increased in violence as the race was run, and, to the astonishment of all, ended by the favourites being beaten, and an unthought-of outsider proclaimed the winner after a severe race from end to end. There was a long tail, and the jockies were thoroughly soaked. Mr. Gully has objected to the winner that he is thorough-bred, and the stakes are withheld.

The Directors beg to announce that, by having secured the purchase of the Works of the late Manchester and Liverpool Plate Glass Company, at less than half the cost price, they will be enabled to commence the manufacture of Plate Glass in about six months, and with decided advantages over any other works in point of outlay. These Works are situate on the St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap Railway, and are in the immediate vicinity of Coal, Sand, and Alkali—the material necessary for the manufacture of Glass.

In addition, however, to Plate Glass, it is proposed to manufacture other kinds of Glass, should the Directors think it expedient.

The instalment of only Two Shillings per Share on allotment, is in compliance with the provisions of the 7th and 8th Victoria, cap 110, which only allows a provisional deposit of Ten Shillings per cent. on the amount of the Shares, but a call of £2 18*s.* will be made immediately on the completion of the Company. NORFOLK WATERING PLACE, HUNSTANTON, ST. EDMUNDS.

The Proprietor having signified his intention of appropriating a competent part of the celebrated Cliff of Hunstanton, and the fields adjoining, with the view of meeting the expressed desire of many families in Norfolk, and the neighbouring counties, to have the opportunity of enjoying the advantages of sea-air and prospects, which this part of its coast so abundantly furnishes, it has been deemed advisable to establish a company to form a village of between 60 and 80 detached cottages of various sizes, with an Hotel, Bath-house, Library, Shops, and other buildings necessary for the establishment of a Sea-bathing Village. In the arrangement of the plan, a site for a Chapel will be reserved.

There is a Chalybeate Spring within a mile of the proposed Village, to which a pleasant walk can be formed. The average cost of the houses to be built will be between 700*l.* and 800*l.*, and the amount required is proposed to be raised in shares of 50*l.* each. A Prospectus and Plans are preparing, and further information may in the meantime be obtained, by applying to FREDERIC LANE, Esq., Lynn.—May 10.

Immediately on the announcement by Government of their intention to abolish the Duty on Glass, and thus remove the principal cause of failure in previous undertakings of this kind, the Promoters determined to proceed in the formation of a new Company.

The Directors beg to announce that, by having secured the purchase of the Works of the late Manchester and Liverpool Plate Glass Company, at less than half the cost price, they will be enabled to commence the manufacture of Plate Glass in about six months, and with decided advantages over any other works in point of outlay. These Works are situate on the St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap Railway, and are in the immediate vicinity of Coal, Sand, and Alkali—the material necessary for the manufacture of Glass.

In addition, however, to Plate Glass, it is proposed to manufacture other kinds of Glass, should the Directors think it expedient.

The instalment of only Two Shillings per Share on allotment, is in compliance with the provisions of the 7th and 8th Victoria, cap 110, which only allows a provisional deposit of Ten Shillings per cent. on the amount of the Shares, but a call of £2 18*s.* will be made immediately on the completion of the Company. The allotment will be made without delay, and the Shareholders in the late Manchester and Liverpool Plate Glass Company will have a preference over other applications.

Applications for Shares, in the following form, may be addressed to the Solicitor:—

To the Provisional Directors of the Manchester and Liverpool Glass Company.

Gentlemen,—I request you will allot me Shares in the proposed Manchester and Liverpool Glass Company, upon the terms of the published Prospectus; and I agree to take such Shares as may be allotted to me, and pay the Deposit on the same, and execute such Deed of Settlement, as may be considered requisite.

JOHN KING, Actuary.

News of the Week.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM on Friday night brought before Parliament the Government measure for the endowment of provincial colleges in Ireland. By this measure it is proposed to establish three colleges for the education of the middle and higher classes of the Irish people; that for the south being at Cork, that for the west at Galway or Limerick, and that for the north at Derry or Belfast. For the erection of the three collegiate buildings ministers propose to grant the sum of 100,000*l.*; and the further sum of 6000*l.* a year to each of them, for the annual expenses of the officers and professors, all of whom are to be appointed by the Crown. There are to be no professorships of divinity, the fundamental principle of the Bill being the avoidance of all interference, positive or negative, in any matters affecting the freedom of conscience. Facilities, however, are proposed to be afforded for the voluntary endowment of theological professorships, but the attendance at the lectures of these professors is not to be compulsory. The Bill proposes not to interfere with Trinity College, Dublin, as an institution established for Protestant purposes, but it gives power to the Crown to incorporate these new Colleges into the existing University, or to establish a new one in Dublin according as circumstances may render necessary. Mr. Wyse, and other Irish members, who may be considered to represent the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians of Ireland, expressed their approbation of the Bill, but at the same time Mr. Wyse regretted that it contained no provision for theological chairs in connection with the different religious communities. Sir R. H. Inglis also regretted the absence of all religious instruction, and denounced the measure as "a gigantic scheme of Godless education." Mr. Sheil defended it from this imputation, but demanded that Trinity College and its emoluments be thrown open to the Roman Catholics. Sir R. Peel replied to these several objections, and advocated the Bill as a means of establishing a perfect system of secular education, and of diminishing the acrimony of religious differences. Mr. M. J. O'Connell hailed it as a gracious concession to the people of Ireland; Lord Palmerston said that it had been conceived in a good spirit, and with practical good sense; and after a desultory discussion the Bill was brought in and read a first time. Notwithstanding the powerful support which the Bill is likely to receive in the House of Commons, the Repeal party in Ireland are by no means contented with it. Mr. O'Connell adopts the energetic denunciation of Sir R. Inglis, and declares that it will never meet the approval of the Irish people.

In France, the great debate on the fortifications of Paris has terminated in favour of Ministers, the Bill for providing the materiel for arming the fortifications having passed the Chamber of Deputies by a majority of 96. A condition attached to the Bill by the committee to which it had been referred, stipulating that the ammunition shall remain at Bourges until the occurrence of war, was also carried by a large majority. — From the United States we have advices a week later than those received by the Great Western. They are important, as showing that, although the declarations of Sir R. Peel and Lord Aberdeen on the Oregon question have excited much bitterness in the democratic party at Washington, there is still every reason to believe that the matter will be amicably settled by peaceful negotiation. It is even said that President Polk has resolved on sending Mr. Van Buren to this country for the special purpose of such a negotiation.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Prince of Leiningen, left Buckingham Palace on Saturday for the Isle of Wight, travelling to Gosport by a special train of the South Western Railway. Her Majesty was received by the authorities of the dockyard and the chief officers of the port, and embarked immediately in the Lightning steamer for Osborne House, under the usual salutes from the batteries and ships of war. Her Majesty remained in the Isle of Wight until Thursday, taking her usual daily walks in the grounds of her new residence, and on Wednesday visiting Carisbrook Castle and other places in the neighbourhood. On Thursday Her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the Princess Royal and the Prince of Leiningen, returned to town, crossing to Gosport in the Lightning steamer, and proceeding by the South Western Railway, performing the journey from Osborne House to Buckingham Palace in four hours and a half. In the evening Prince Albert honoured the Archbishop of Canterbury with his presence at Lambeth Palace. The Hon. Miss Murray and the Hon. Miss Kerr have succeeded Lady Caroline S. Cocks and the Hon. Miss Devereux, as Maids of Honour in Waiting to the Queen. It is reported that it is the intention of Her Majesty to pay a visit to the Earl of Ellenborough, at Southam-house, during the coming summer.

Parliamentary Movements.—Lord Francis Egerton has announced his intention of retiring from the representation of South Lancashire, partly on the ground of ill-health, but more especially on account of the dissatisfaction which he has caused among his constituents by supporting the Maynooth Bill. It is rumoured that his lordship will be very shortly called to the House of Lords.

Death of Lord Carbery.—This venerable peer died on Monday at his residence, Castle Freke, county of Cork. His lordship was born in 1765, married 1783 the daughter of the Earl of Arran, succeeded his father in the baronetcy in 1777, and his cousin in the peerage in 1807, and was 80 years of age at the time of his decease. The title devolves upon his nephew.

Knighthood.—The Queen has been pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood upon John Macpherson Brakenbury, Esq., late Consul at Cadiz, and upon Charles Fellows, Esq., of Russell-square, to whom the public are indebted for the Xanthian marbles, now in the British Museum.

Order of the Bath.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint Admiral Sir Robert W. Otway, Bart., and Vice-Admiral Sir Edward W. C. R. Owen, Knights Commanders of the Order of the Bath, to be Knights Grand Cross of the Order; and Rear-Admiral Sir Edward Chetham, Knt., Companion of the Order, to be Knight Commander thereof.

The Church.—The Rev. Samuel Wilberforce, D.D, has been installed as Dean of Westminster, and it is announced that he will preach his first sermon in the Abbey on Sunday. The Bishop of London has appointed the following gentlemen to be prebendaries of St. Paul:—Rev. C. B. Dalton, M.A., Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, Chaplain of Lincoln's-inn, his Lordship's Chaplain; the Rev. R W. Browne, M.A., Professor of Classical Literature in King's College, London; and the Rev. T. G. Hall, M.A., Professor of Mathematics in King's College, London, and Rector of St. Benet's, Paul's Wharf.

Lord Lieutenancy.—The Marquis of Westminster has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Cheshire, vacant by the death of the late Earl of Stamford and Warrington.

Public Pensions.—It is stated in the Irish papers that Sir Robert Peel has granted to the widow of the late Mr. John Banim, author of the "O'Hara Tales," 50*l.* from the Royal Bounty Fund, and has further engaged to place her name on the pension-list when a vacancy occurs.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The Maynooth grant and the debates in Parliament, both on that subject and on the new plan of academical education in Ireland, introduced by Sir J. Graham, have excited great interest in Paris, and the two measures are generally approved of as a great step in the march of toleration and civilisation. The Débats especially, which was at first inclined to find fault with the new policy adopted by Sir Robert Peel, because he could only hope to carry it out "by the assistance of his natural opponents," now gives the plan its approbation, and claims for France the merit of having been the first to act upon the principles which are at length tardily followed out by the English Government.

"The measures," says the Débats, "are based upon the principle which has long dominated in France—viz., the neutrality of the state in religious matters. They are based upon the principles of the philosophy of the eighteenth century, which were consecrated by the revolution of 1789, and which are the very foundation of the constitution of our country. On these grounds, we cannot but express our entire approbation of them, but we claim the liberty of saying, as an historical fact which cannot be contested, that these measures are a perfect revolution in the spirit of English legislation, and that the principles are completely opposed to those upon which the constitution of Great Britain has hitherto rested. We must not forget that the revolutions of England were religious revolutions, while those of France were philosophical revolutions. That on the one side it was the principle of Protestant supremacy that triumphed, and on the other that of the equality of all religions in the eye of the law. This is the position that English Protestantism now abandons. The State which, since the time of the Reformation, had become Protestant, is now become laic, and the French principle, or rather the social principle of the separation of temporal and spiritual power, is now admitted into British legislation."

The great debate on the Paris fortifications, the commencement of which we noticed in our last, is the leading domestic topic of the papers. After a desultory and technical discussion on the time required for casting of the necessary pieces of ordnance, M. de Lamartine commanded the attention of the Chamber by a very long and vehement speech, not only against the Bill, but against the fortifications themselves.

"All the events," he said, "accomplished in the last 15 years had tended to the sole purpose of raising the Paris fortifications; and, in 1840, Louis Philippe, France, England, all Europe, in short, had agreed to manifest the anxiety and feign the apprehensions of a general war, so generally prevalent at that period, solely in order to enable a Cabinet—the accomplice of the Court—to commence the fortifications in virtue of a mere royal decree, and to terrify a patriotic majority unto blindly sanctioning so Machiavellian a scheme. M. de Lamartine reviewed in the boldest language the policy pursued since 1830; he dwelt on the revolution, which he pronounced so lawful and so generous, and which had given rise to such enrapturing but wofully frustrated hopes—on the confidence of the people in the Prince to whom their representatives had awarded the Crown, and on the distrust and struggle that arose between the people and the Prince on the very morrow of his elevation—on Lafayette ungratefully set aside, and Laffitte soon after compelled to withdraw from public affairs—on the right of forming associations which had not been regulated by a law, but entirely suppressed—and on the first design of raising forts at Paris, which had been betrayed the day after a riot. M. de Lamartine urged that every calamity, every attempt on the life of the King, although they had excited the indignation of the whole country, had been followed by some fresh attack on its liberties; that the laws of September against the press had closely succeeded to those against associations; that the administration of justice had been most deeply impaired by the transferring of various political offences to the cognisance of the Court of Peers; that the pernicious and blind efforts to strengthen, by all possible means, one of the powers of the State at the expense of the other had been perseveringly made; and, lastly, that an overawing "institution," not of a republican, but of a pure military nature, and made of stone and bronze — the Paris fortifications — had ultimately crowned, amidst the confusion created by the approach, or rather the mere appearance of public perils, the scheme so long and so patiently premeditated."

So great was the excitement created by M. de Lamartine's fiery language that 20 minutes elapsed before Count Duchatel, the Home Minister, could obtain a hearing. In his reply he vindicated the principal acts of Louis Phillippe's reign, especially the erection of the fortifications, and the projected arming of them, which, he said, excited no distrust in the country at large. His answer was considerably disturbed by M. George de Lafayette, who rectified a statement he had advanced respecting the late General Lafayette's resignation of the command of the National Guards of France. The last speaker was the Republican Member, M. Garnier-Pages, who was tumultuously called to order for saying that Lafayette and Laffitte had successively retired because the promises made to the country in 1830 had not been fulfilled. The general debate was then closed amidst immense confusion, and the discussion on the articles of the Bill adjourned to the following day, when the first clause, which grants the sum of 14,130,000 fr. towards the expense of providing artillery and other materiel, was carried by a majority of 227 to 131. The debate which preceded the vote was rendered interesting by some remarks and explanations, rather of a personal nature, which passed between M. Thiers and M. de Lamartine, in respect to the observations of the latter on the previous day, as to the policy of the Government of which M. Thiers was the head, in 1840. M. Thiers said that if had done his country any service, during the 15 years he had mixed in its affairs, he felt satisfied that it was principally on the day when, on his own responsibility, he had called on the Government to undertake the fortification of Paris. His conduct on that occasion had drawn upon him shameful calumnies; but he despised them, from whatever quarter they came, even if expressed as they had been the day before. He declared that if what M. de Lamartine stated were true, the Chamber of Deputies who voted the fortification of Paris must have been either "dupes or traitors," instead of being, as they were, honest men, acting from conviction, and conferring the greatest benefit on their country.—M. de Lamartine replied that the very violence of M. Thiers justified the doubt and uneasiness of the country on the subject of the fortifications. He read extracts from the despatches of M. Thiers at that period, to show that he had no real intention of going to war, and he argued from that circumstance that the cause assigned for the fortification of Paris was a mere pretence, and that the measure was nothing more nor less than an act of Ministerial dictatorship. With respect to the expression made use of by M. Thiers, it was one never applied to him before, and he should call upon that gentlemen to explain it. On hearing the explanation, he would know what reply to make. The President immediately interfered, amidst the utmost sensation, assuring both parties that the Chamber saw nothing of a personal nature in the political views they had taken of the fortifications. M. Thiers remained silent, but his ally, M. de Remusat, vindicated the conduct of his administration, of which he was a member, and enthusiastically gloried in having promoted the erection of the fortifications. After some further discussion, M. Allard, the reporter of the committee, then presented in its name the following amendment, which was to be inserted after the first article:—"The artillery intended for the armament of Paris is to be deposited at Bourges, and removed to Paris only in case of war." This amendment was postponed, and the first article, placing 14,130,000f. at the disposal of the Minister of War for supplying the matériel necessary for the defence of the fortifications of Paris, was then put from the chair and carried by 227 to 131. Immediately after the sitting, the President summoned before him M. Thiers and M. de Lamartine, who were accompanied by their respective friends, MM. de Remusat and Ganneron, and General Laidet and M. de la Rochejaquelein. Owing to the President's seasonable and friendly mediation, it was hoped that the angry words exchanged by the two "illustrious orators" would have a pacific issue, and this hope was confirmed on Friday at the opening of the sitting, when the President informed the Chamber that mutual explanations had taken place between M. de Lamartine and M. Thiers, in consequence of some hasty words used by those gentlemen on the day before; and that they had ended, to the satisfaction of their friends, in the expression of reciprocal regard. This information was received with general applause, and M. de la Rochejaquelein's amendment to the first article of the Bill for arming the fortifications came immediately after under consideration. As it met with very little support, no division took place; but M. Bethmont then moved an amendment, whereby the matériel required for the fortifications was not to be removed from Bourges to Paris without a special law being enacted for the purpose; but after some discussion it was rejected by a majority of 206 to 178. The second article of the Bill, specifying the sums which the Minister of War is to dispose of in 1845 and 1846, was adopted without much opposition. The third article, introduced by the committee, whereby "the ordnance destined for the arming of Paris shall be deposited at Bourges, and shall be removed to Paris only in the event of a war breaking out" encountered more resistance. Several amendments to it, denoting a want of confidence in Government, were successively moved and rejected. The Marquis de la Rochejaquelein took a leading part in this part of the discussion; he vehemently exhorted the Chamber to secure better guarantees than mere verbal assurances, and declared that if ever the ordnance deposited at Bourges were conveyed to Paris in any other case than that of war, it would be so outrageous a violation of the law, that France would be justified in resisting the payment of the taxes, and he should be the first to set the example. The committee's article was, however, ultimately adopted, and on the division taking place on the whole Bill, it was carried by the majority of 227 to 131—a far larger one than was anticipated when Ministers presented it to the Chamber of Deputies.

"The report," says the Revue de Paris, "that several crowned heads are soon to arrive at Paris, is daily more and more confirmed. Well informed persons affirm that this meeting of 'constitutional' sovereigns will take place in July. The illustrious personages who are to be the guests of the King of the French are the Queen of England, the young Queen of Spain, the King and Queen of Naples, and the King of Holland. Louis Philippe and his family will do those several Sovereigns the honours of France and Paris. The Duke and Duchess de Nemours will go and meet her Britannic Majesty, who will next arrive; the Prince de Joinville will repair to the frontier of Spain in order to receive the young Queen of that country; the Duke d'Aumale will proceed to Marseilles and receive there the King of Naples, and the Duke de Montpensier will receive the King of Holland, who will come by sea, and land at Dunkirk. In order to give a suitable reception to these august visitors, the apartments formerly occupied at the Louvre by Henry IV. will be, in addition to the Tuileries, thoroughly repaired and sumptuously furnished."

The health of M. Guizot is so much improved that it is hoped he will be able to attend in his place in the Chamber, and support his budget as Minister of Foreign Affairs.—The journals have accounts from Algiers to the 1st inst., when several corps of French troops were moving in the direction of Milianah. Marshal Bugeaud was to set out next day, accompanied by the Duke de Montpensier, in order to assume the command of the expedition, which was likely to be a protracted one, if, as was feared, Abd-el-Kader made his appearance within the territory of France.

SPAIN.—We have accounts from Madrid of the 7th inst. The debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the ways and means, which has been going on for some days, created little interest, but the speculators on the Bolsa were in a state of great excitement, in consequence of a combination of capitalists, said to have been formed for the purpose of bringing down the price of the funds. The Queen Mother had given an entertainment at Vista Alegre, which had caused some interest in fashionable circles. It is said that the projected Carlist movement in Spain has been postponed in consequence of the satisfactory aspect of the negotiations now going on between the Spanish Government and Don Carlos. Letters from Bourges state that the Princess de Beira is for the present out of danger. Her medical attendants strongly advise a change of climate; they recommend Naples, and are trying to impress upon her mind that another pulmonary attack at Bourges like the one she has just escaped from must prove fatal. The Princess is very averse to leaving her husband, but it is reported that Don Carlos will shortly be permitted to leave his present place of confinement for Italy.

PORTUGAL.—Accounts from Lisbon of the 6th inst. inform us that the Prime Minister Costa Cabral, has been obliged by ill health to relinquish temporarily his official duties, and was about to proceed to Cabias, for some months, for the benefit of his health. It would appear that some of the Cabral party were desirous of placing his brother, the well-known civil governor of Lisbon, Senhor Jose Bernardo Cabral, permanently in the offices held by the former, and had so far succeeded in preparing the way for the accomplishment of their object as to get him appointed Minister of the Interior and of Justice ad interim. This appointment seems to have produced a considerable sensation. The Cardinal Patriarch died on the 5th inst. The amount of wines exported for foreign ports from Lisbon in 1844 was 19,135 pipes, and the estimated value 22,000*l.* sterling.

SWITZERLAND.—The affairs of Switzerland are now finally settled. The Grand Councils of Soleure, Argau, and Berne, have almost unanimously ratified the convention concluded between their delegates and the commissioners of Lucerne for the liberation of the prisoners captured by the latter canton. The ransom to be paid for such prisoners as do not belong to Lucerne will amount to 20,000*l.* Letters from Zurich of the 7th state that the capital sentence pronounced against Dr. Steiger has been confirmed by the Supreme Tribunal of Lucerne. His last hope rests in the Grand Council, which alone can pardon him. The Governments of Zurich and Berne had each sent one of their members to Lucerne to intercede in his favour. A grand popular meeting was to have taken place at the gates of Berne on the 27th ult., the object of which was the subversion of the Government. Its consequences had, however, been averted by the Council of State hastening to propose to the Grand Council the issuing of an amnesty to all such as had participated in the late occurrences, instead of persevering in the proceedings instituted against the public functionaries who had joined in the expedition against Lucerne.

UNITED STATES.—By the royal mail steamer Caledonia, which reached Liverpool on Tuesday, we have accounts from New York to the 30th ult., one week later than that received last week by the Great Western. Among the passengers by the Caledonia is the Hon. A. Smith, Chargé d'Affaires of Texas, whose mission, according to the New York Herald, is to see what new conditions they may procure for Texas, provided she remain independent, and refuse annexation. Of course, the question is much canvassed. Although the more democratic part of the press had issued several intemperate and warlike articles on the subject of the relations of this country with the United States, yet, on the whole, there is hardly any reason to fear that hostilities will be resorted to, but that by peaceful and prudent negotiation the matter will be amicably settled. It was rumoured at Washington that this course had been resolved upon by Mr. Polk, and that Mr. Van Buren had been selected as minister to England, upon the special mission of this negotiation. In such a crisis, however, it is important to watch the course of the Government organs at Washington. The principal organ is the Globe; but there are two other journals, the Madisonian and the Constitution, that may be quoted as semi-organs. These three are for maintaining the entire claim to the Oregon territory, from lat. 42° to 54° 40′, at all hazards, even including that of war. The Globe, in one article, refers to the two former wars with England, and compares them to the two ancient Punic wars, hinting that the third Punic war, as of old, might result in the destruction of the "Mistress of the Seas." In a subsequent article it denounces war, its misery, and its crimes, but thinks that the United States will be compelled to resort to it. "The only mode," it says, "to avoid war is, the firm adherence by the President to the letter and spirit of his inaugural address. He will be sustained by the nation in that; for, notwithstanding the English Ministers choose to level their lances at Mr. Polk, it is not to be forgotten that the previous action of the House of Representatives has, by an immense majority, given their sanction to his language. By the truckling abandonment of our rights by Mr. Webster in the Ashburton treaty, we lost the subject of controversy, forfeited the respect of the world and of ourselves, and invited new and unfounded pretensions from our adversary." It is some consolation, however, to reflect that nothing serious can occur for more than a year, as the treaty for joint occupation requires one year's notice to terminate that agreement, and it is considered possible, that much of the action of the American government may be merely intended to drive negotiation to a crisis, and give it a more favourable character for the claims of the United States. —Next in importance to the Oregon question, comes the difficulty with Mexico, with regard to the annexation of Texas. War with Mexico appears to be almost immediate. Four American men-of-war were seen in the Gulf of Mexico making their way for Vera Cruz, and Com. Stockton, with the war steamer Princeton, and 3 other ships of war, has orders to sail from Norfolk, with despatches, to be opened in a certain latitude. It is known that this squadron has been commanded to the Gulf of Mexico, and it is probable that in a short time there will be an American fleet of 10 or 12 vessels riding off Vera Cruz. The Texas correspondence between Mr. Shannon, the United States' minister, and the Mexican government had closed abruptly, by the Mexican minister declining to hold communication or correspondence with Mr. Shannon, who, at the latest accounts, had quitted the capital, and only awaited the arrival of the despatches, which were on their way, before he quitted the country to return to the United States. The city of Mexico had been the scene of a severe earthquake, which had destroyed numerous buildings and property; but few lives fortunately were lost. Accounts from Rio to the 19th March, published in the American papers, report the amicable settlement of the difficulties between the Brazils and United States. —The Bowery Theatre, New York, has been burnt down, with several adjacent buildings: loss 100,000 dollars. This is the fourth time this theatre has been destroyed by fire within seven years.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—Numerous petitions were presented against the Maynooth [illegible] and against the Union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor.—The Marquis of SALISBURY presented a petition from the master, wardens, and commonalty of the Company of [illegible]-workers of the City of London, praying to be heard at the bar against the Bill for securing the due administration of charitable trusts in England and Wales.—Lord BROUGHAM wished the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack would not press the Bill forward, but would afford ample time for discussion.—The LORD CHANCELLOR was so sensible as any one that the Bill should undergo a thorough discussion, and would fix the second reading for Thursday next.—In reply to a remark made by Lord ASHLEY that the LORD CHANCELLOR said he thought that petitioners misunderstood the object of the Bill. It was only applicable to charities under a certain amount. The only thing that would be required from those parties would be from time to time to state the amount of their revenue and the application of their funds, and no public body ought to raise an objection to the production of such information. The administration of charities would in no way be affected provided they were of such a nature as to come within the practical jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.—[Left sitting.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—Sir J. GRAHAM introduced his Bill for academical institutions in Ireland, and commenced by observing, that he would not dwell either on the importance or the difficulty of the subject, as his object was to improve the social condition of Ireland, and the difficulty of accomplishing such an object would be most distinctly discerned when he stated that the plan which he conceived to be most essential for that object was the diffusion of the benefits of education among the higher classes of the people. Religious differences formed the great obstacle to the satisfactory adjustment of the general question of education there. For a long series of years the religion of the majority of the Irish people had been treated by the State as hostile; but that notion had been gradually abandoned. The penal laws had either been removed, or were in the course of removal, yet traces of them were still perceptible, and operated most injuriously in their interference with the education of the people. The difficulty which the remnants of these laws still created was well known. It had been the subject of inquiry by several commissions from the Crown and by several committees of that House since the Union, and Parliament had thus great advantage in knowing the way in which that difficulty had been hitherto overcome. He then referred to the previous inquiries which had been instituted on this subject, and quoted an extract from the report presented in 1812 by the commission appointed in 1806, to show the principle on which his present Bill was founded. That principle was, that in framing a system for the education of the lower classes of the people of Ireland no attempt should be made to influence or disturb the religious tenets of any sect or description of Christians. Another commission, appointed in 1824, recommended that schools should be established to give to children of every religious persuasion such instruction as they were capable of receiving without any interference with their religious creed, and proposed that this religious education should be given to the Protestants and Roman Catholics, not jointly, but separately. In 1831 after the subject had been again considered by a commission in 1828, and by a committee of that House in 1830, the present system of national education for the poorer classes was established in Ireland; and the principle on which it rested was, that the national schools should be open to all denominations of Christians—that no child should be present at any religious exercise of which his parent or guardian disapproved—and that time should be supplied for the communication to each child of such religious education as his parent or guardian might provide for it. After pointing out the manner in which Mr. Leslie Foster's scheme for separate education had failed, and showing why the national system had eminently succeeded, he proceeded to notice the observation that that system of education only affected the lower classes of the population, whereas his proposition affected those who were connected with the middling and higher classes. He therefore thought it necessary to show the beneficial results which had accrued from the absence of all religious tests in the metropolitan colleges of London and Edinburgh: and, having done that, he announced that Government had no hesitation in recommending to the House the establishment of three provincial institutions for education in Ireland, all founded upon the same principle as those metropolitan colleges in England and Scotland. He proposed that Cork should be the site of the college for the south, Galway or Limerick for the west, and Derry or Belfast for the north of Ireland, though he thought that an arrangement might be made by which Belfast would be better qualified for the site of the college in the north. He could not pledge himself for the exact amount of the expense which would be necessary to carry this proposal into execution; but he conceived that 50,000*l.* would be wanted for the erection of each of the three collegiate buildings which the Government proposed to make; and he would therefore mention 150,000*l.* as a sum which would be amply sufficient for that purpose. For the annual expense of the officers of these institutions, and of the prizes to be established for the encouragement of learning, Government recommended that a sum of 18,000*l.* should be supplied: in other words, 6000*l.* for each of them. He then gave a sketch, which he admitted that it might be necessary to alter hereafter, of the different officers whom he would establish in these institutions. In each college there would be a principal, with a salary of 1000*l.* a-year, and 10 or 12 professors, with salaries of 500*l.* a-year each. At Belfast and at Cork a medical school would be attached to each college, and lectures would be there given in pharmacy, surgery, and chemistry. It was the intention of Government to propose that in all the three colleges the professors should be nominated by the Crown, and that the Crown should have the power to remove them for good cause. The principal would reside within the walls of the college; but it was not intended to provide within them residences, either for the professors or the students. The scheme of instruction would be by lecture and by daily examination of the pupils. Consistently with the principle of the measure, there would be no faculty of theology, and therefore he did not intend to propose the establishment of any professorships of divinity. Religion would not, however, be neglected; on the contrary, every facility would be given for the voluntary endowment of theological professorships, but the attendance at the lectures of these professors would not be compulsory. For the fundamental principle on which he asked the House to sanction this Bill was the avoidance of all interference, positive or negative, in all matters affecting the freedom of conscience. At Belfast there were particular circumstances to which he wished to call attention. The academical institution at Belfast, which was mainly attended by Presbyterians, and was established for the training of the ministers of that religion, had for the last 20 years received 2000*l.* a year by a Parliamentary grant. Four of its professors were divinity professors, and were nominated, not by the governing body of the institution, but by the General Assembly of Ulster. It would be hard to deprive the General Assembly of the benefit which it had so long enjoyed: and Government, therefore, proposed to continue the allowance to these four Presbyterian professors, not only in the present, but in every future year. He had reason to believe that, if this Bill should be sanctioned by the House, the academical institution would transfer its buildings and its library on easy terms to the new college at Belfast. There was another difficulty on this subject with which he was prepared at once to grapple. This Bill only founded colleges in Ireland; but then this great question presented itself for consideration—should these three colleges be incorporated into one great central university, or should Parliament invest each of them with the power of granting degrees in arts, science and medicine? It was not expedient or necessary to come to any definite judgment on that point at once; but he would not be so deficient in candour as not to state his own private opinion upon it to the House. He thought that the advantages of having a central university decidedly predominated, and that the good effects of this measure would be to a certain degree paralyzed if the three colleges were not associated together in one central university. Now if you were to have a central university it must be in the metropolis of Ireland. That consideration at once presented to view a question of great difficulty, which he would not touch. He was decidedly of opinion that mixed juries nor juries permitted me to interfere with Trinity College as it now existed. It was founded by Queen Elizabeth for Protestant purposes, and was the [illegible] Protestant [illegible] from its foundation. The House had manifested an earnest desire to promote the education of the Roman Catholic priesthood of Ireland by increasing the grant to Maynooth. He had already stated that the funds granted at present would be confirmed to the Protestants of the north of Ireland for the continuation of their institutions. He found that Trinity College was endowed for the education of priests of the Church of England, and he could not consent to have its property invaded, or the uses of it disturbed for any consideration whatsoever. The University of Dublin was not an exclusive establishment. He reminded the house that in the year 1793 an Act was passed by the Irish Legislature by which it was provided that students, on taking their degrees, should not be called upon to take any oath or subject to any declaration save that of allegiance. That act, therefore, entitled Roman Catholics to enter Trinity College, Dublin, to take degrees and [illegible] to its advantages, save its emoluments. But the reason why they could not obtain its fellowships was, that all the fellows except two were obliged to be clergymen of the established Church. As to the scholarships, there was some doubt whether it was essential that the party holding them should be Protestants or not; but some years ago, when Mr. O'Connell was examined on oath before a committee of the House of Lords, and was asked whether those scholarships ought to be open to Roman Catholics, or to be confined to Protestants, he replied that those scholarships, having been originally founded for the benefit of young men intended to become Protestant clergymen, no person of any other religion had a right to interfere with them. To that opinion of Mr. O'Connell he had nothing to add—for it was quite [illegible] to the point, that these scholarships ought not to be opened. Apart from these considerations, any attempt to force the Roman Catholics of Dissenters upon the fellowships and scholarships of Trinity College would render such a process of Charters necessary, and would give such offence to Protestant feeling throughout the empire, that he had no hesitation in stating that to such a proposition Government would not give the slightest sanction. The right hon. Baronet entered into this question at some length, he reminded the house that it did not necessarily rise upon this Bill; for it did not establish an university, but only afforded means to Her Majesty to establish a new university in Dublin, or to incorporate into the existing university these new colleges. After rendering a tribute of applause to Mr. Wyse for his great and disinterested exertions on the subject of education in Ireland, he quoted a passage from that gentleman's letter to Lord Morpeth, in which he [illegible] the practicability of establishing not one university but a series of provincial universities in Ireland, and in which he stated that every day added to his conviction, that a greater boon could not be bestowed upon Ireland than a measure which would accomplish such objects, nor one which would tend more effectually to promote its virtue and prosperity. He fully concurred in that opinion, and was convinced that if the House gave its sanction to his present proposition, it would have a most favourable effect on the moral and social condition of Ireland. He then moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable Her Majesty to endow new colleges for the advancement of learning in Ireland.—Mr. WYSE entered into a review of various parts of the project just submitted to the House by Sir J. Graham. He considered it desirable that theological chairs in connexion with the different religious communities should be established in the new colleges, and would combine with those chairs professorships of metaphysics, moral philosophy, and history. He then remarked on the necessity of arming the authorities of these new colleges to exercise some control over those students who attended them and did not reside with their own families. He thought that a more industrial character should be imprinted upon the education which they afforded than that which existed in the colleges of this country. He considered the number of new colleges proposed to be established in Ireland quite sufficient, and believed that their proposed sites had been judiciously selected. He hailed with [illegible] satisfaction the propositions brought forward by Government, thanked Sir J. Graham for the flattering terms in which he had adverted to his labours in this cause, and heartily rejoiced at the near approach of the time in which Ireland might hope to be regenerated by improved intelligence and morality rather than by force and violence.—Mr. ROSS, Mr. LEFROY, and Mr. ROCHE, approved the proposition of Government, and had no doubt that it would give general satisfaction.—Sir R. INGLIS observed that the principle of this bill was not of local, but of national, and indeed universal importance. Considering, however, that the ground on which the experiment of it was to be tried was Ireland, he had determined to wait till gentlemen connected with that country, which was still united to Great Britain, had delivered their opinions upon it. After noticing the satisfaction which it had given to almost every one of those gentlemen, he observed that he could not concur in their satisfaction. One question which he wished to put to Sir J. Graham was this—"Was there to be no religious instruction whatsoever given to the students of these new institutions?" From the gestures of Sir J. Graham he concluded that there was to be none. This, then, was the first instance in the history of Great Britain in which a national endowment for education, without any provision for religious institutions had been made by it as a state. Such instruction as Sir J. Graham proposed to establish ought to be erected not only for the enlightenment of man, but also for the glory of God. A more gigantic scheme of Godless education had never been proposed in any country than that which was now under consideration. He differed entirely from this measure of Government, and never could give his assent to it. He would not, however, divide upon the question that leave be given to bring it in.—Mr. SHEIL commented with severity on the denunciation which Sir R. Inglis had launched against this measure, when he called it "a gigantic scheme of Godless education." He thought, however, that it was unfortunate that some means had not been devised for removing from these institutions the reproach that no religious instruction was to be given to students. He hoped that Government would open Trinity College, Dublin, to the Roman Catholic portion of the population of Ireland. Such a measure would be of the greatest importance in carrying out the system of conciliation on which Government now professed to act. When these new institutions were founded, Trinity College would have a paramount importance over them all from its large landed possessions, and from the large incomes of its fellows and professors. He reminded Sir J. Graham that when Mr. O'Connell declared that the scholarships of that college should be confined to the Protestants, and not opened to the Roman Catholics, Lord F. Egerton had proposed to make an endowment of 30,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* a-year for the Roman Catholic clergy. Under such circumstances Mr. O'Connell might be justified in saying that those scholarships ought not to be held by Roman Catholics. But now, when that endowment was neither offered to the Roman Catholics, nor would be accepted by them if offered, it was unjust that they should not be allowed to taste the golden fruit which hung upon the tree of knowledge.—Sir R. PEEL observed, that the speech of Mr. Sheil was not calculated to remove an impression which he had long entertained,—that the main difficulty of his administration would be Ireland. He placed before the House the situation of that country with respect to education, showed that it had provided large sums for the education of the poorer classes in that country, and pointed out the lamentable want of academical institutions for the education of the higher classes. At present the only academical institutions in Ireland were Trinity College, Dublin, and the College of Maynooth. It was proposed to supply that want by forming three new institutions in different parts of the country. The institution at Belfast, in all probability, would be chiefly attended by Presbyterians, but the institutions in the south and west of Ireland would be principally attended by Roman Catholics. Now, Sir R. Inglis objected to those institutions because they were not made religious institutions. Considering that they were to be attended by Roman Catholics, it was impossible to make them so. If Sir R. Inglis wished to attach to these new academical institutions the condition that they should give instruction in the Protestant religion, he would render them nugatory, and of no avail. Well, then, did Sir R. Inglis recommend Parliament to establish Roman Catholic chairs in these new colleges? Certainly not; and what was the result? Because Ministers would not make that recommendation which Sir R. Inglis would be the first to oppose, he charged them with promoting infidelity and atheism. But did Ministers really banish religion from these institutions? In one sense of the words they did; but at the same time they confidently hoped that the parents and guardians of the youth educated at them would take care that they were imbued with the principles of Christianity, according to the faith which they respectively professed. It should be be recollected that Government attached no place of divine worship to these institutions, and that it did not make any provision for the residence of students within their walls. Their parents would, therefore, be obliged to place them under the care of others; and those parties would, he trusted, be made responsible for the instruction of their boarders in religious faith. If these institutions were "Godless," then had Sir R. Inglis been voluntarily supporting, for the last 20 years, a Godless institution; for these institutions were to be founded on the same principle as the present academical institution at Belfast, to which Parliament had long made an annual grant, and in which the professors had given up the attempt to enforce attendance either on theological lectures or on religious worship, because they saw that the attempt to enforce it would be fatal to the success of their establishment. He trusted that the House would sanction the establishment of these new colleges, and that it would introduce into them a perfect system of secular education. By so doing, it would promote social concord, and diminish the acrimony of religious differences; and thus, instead of forfeiting the advantages to be derived from religious education, would be more likely to make its subjects good Christians, and to endow them with reciprocal charity and affection towards each other.—Mr. SHAW concurred so far in the satisfaction expressed by his countrymen on the other side of the House at the introduction of this measure, that he would not offer any objection to its introduction. He thought that these new colleges would, in all probability, be useful institutions. He considered Mr. Shell to be most unreasonable in demanding that Trinity College, Dublin, should be opened to the Roman Catholics. At present all its advantages, and some of its emoluments, were within their grasp. There were eight professorships in it open to the Roman Catholics, and one of them was at present filled by a gentleman of that persuasion.—Mr. WARBURTON explained the regulations of the University of London with respect to religious instruction, because great misapprehension appeared to prevail in that House on the subject. He expressed his approbation of this measure as far as it went.—Mr. PLUMPTRE considered it a great misfortune that there was to be no recognition of Christianity in these new institutions.—Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL replied to the statements of Mr Shaw on the subject of Trinity College, Dublin; and expressed an opinion that, so far as it went, this was a gracious concession to the people of Ireland on the part of Government.—Mr LEFROY would not oppose the introduction of this Bill.—Mr. HOPE had a strong repugnance to it, on account of the absence of all religious education from the institutions which it created.—Mr. ROEBUCK considered that the increased grant to Maynooth was one part of a large scheme for the conciliation of Ireland, and that another part of it was the present measure, which he should have liked better had it been of a more extensive character. As Trinity College, Dublin, had been founded for Protestant purposes with Protestant money, he could not see why the Roman Catholics should wish to make an inroad upon it. He thought that if they acted conformably to their own principles, they ought to leave it in its Protestant integrity, as we left the College of Maynooth in its Roman Catholic integrity.—Sir S. BARRON said, that the Universities of Leyden, Utrecht, and Haarlem, were founded exactly on the same principles as those which Sir J. Graham had described as the foundation of his proposed academical institutions in Ireland. He expressed his approbation of this measure, and declared his intention of giving it his most cordial support.—Mr. ACLAND also supported it.—Lord PALMERSTON expressed the great pleasure with which he had heard the scheme proposed by Sir J. Graham. It had been conceived in a good spirit and with practical good sense, for the purpose of conciliating the people of Ireland. He vindicated the principle on which the Bill was founded, and anticipated from the appearance of the House that it would not meet with any great resistance in its progress through Parliament.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE observed, that though he had opposed the Maynooth College Bill, he should cordially support the present measure, which was not restricted to one class of the community, but was open to all, and for the benefit of all.—Leave was then given to bring in the Bill. It was subsequently brought in and read a first time.—The House went into Committee of Supply, and a vote for civil contingencies was taken.—The House adjourned for the Whitsun holidays, to Thursday the 15th inst.

Thursday.—The House re-assembled this day after the Whitsuntide recess.—Mr. WAKLEY, in pursuance of his notice, brought under the consideration of the House the management of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, and also the charter granted to it in the year 1843. He thought that Sir J. Graham was now well aware that he had made a false step in granting that charter, and regretted that he would not retrace that false step by making those changes in it which the profession required. The history of the conduct of the Council of the College of Surgeons was one of continued injustice from the year 1826 down to 1843. During all that time their conduct had been incriminated by the profession, and medical associations and clubs had been formed in every part of the country to guard against its arrogant and oppressive regulations. In 1843 the profession was informed that a new charter had been granted to the College, in which new and extraordinary privileges were conferred by the Crown on that very Council whose conduct had proved so very obnoxious. He pointed out the various hardships which this new charter inflicted on more than 10,000 members of the profession. It was laughed at by every member of the profession who did not suffer by its injustice, as one of the most absurd and irrational measures that had ever been concocted by the wit of man. They felt deeply discontented at its arrangements, and they had shown their discontent by petitions to Parliament, by remonstrances to the Council, and by memorials to Sir James Graham. Nobody was satisfied with it, not even Sir James himself. The language of Mr. Guthrie, who was himself a member of the Council, was worthy of the consideration of the House. That eminent surgeon denounced several of its provisions as illiberal, exclusive, and unjust: and yet all the memorials directed against it, and sent to the Home-office, had been answered secretly there by a Minister of the Crown, who allowed himself to be deluded by some member of the Council, on whose judgment he unfortunately relied. After condemning the obnoxious power of self-appointment, which was given to the Council, he proceeded to point out at great length the different grounds on which the profession complained of this charter, and to insist that if prerogative charters were to be thus recklessly granted, it was fitting that they should be rigidly scrutinized by Parliament. He would reduce the whole question now in dispute to this issue—"the charter having been granted, ought it to be continued in force?" On the face of the charter itself he said that it was evident that inquiry must be granted, or that the Minister must say that the charter could not stand. He therefore asked Sir J. Graham whether it was his intention, first, to refuse inquiry into the management of the Royal College of Surgeons; and, secondly, if it was his intention to refuse that inquiry, whether he intended to maintain the charter in its present odious and obnoxious state? He could not believe that Sir James would voluntarily take such a course; but he had made one false step, and would perhaps endeavour to redeem it by making another. Mr Wakley then referred to the Council of the College, and accused them of having betrayed the trust reposed in them, and of having injured the interests, and of having attempted to degrade the character of the great majority of their professional brethren. He insisted that it was a matter of great importance to the nation at large, and more particularly to the poorer classes of it, that there should be dispersed over the whole surface of the country a large body of well-educated and competent medical practitioners; and enumerated several lamentable cases in which irreparable injury, and even death itself, had been inflicted by the incapacity, inexperience, and downright ignorance of individuals who had been permitted to exercise surgery, physic, and midwifery under the existing system. He pointed out several defects in the medical Bills recently introduced by Sir J. Graham, and concluded by moving two resolutions, inculpating the management of the College of Surgeons, calling for investigation into the circumstances which led to the grant of an additional charter to it in 1843, and into the effects produced by its operation on the profession at large. If those resolutions were negatived, he should propose another resolution, on which he would take the sense of the House, to this effect:—"That in any charter which the Crown might be advised to grant for the incorporation of the general practitioners, those gentlemen were fully entitled to enjoy an equality of professional station with the newly-created fellows, and that a deep and lasting injury would be inflicted on many thousands of scientific men, if a College of General Practitioners were to be founded as an institution inferior to the College of Surgeons."—Sir J. GRAHAM rose to reply, but a motion having been made that the House be counted, it was ascertained that there were not 40 members present, and the House consequently adjourned.

Friday.—The Lord Mayor of Dublin appeared at the bar in his robes of office, and presented a petition from Dublin in favour of the Mullingar Railway Bill.—The Liverpool and Manchester Railway Bill and the Aberdeen Railway Bill were read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—On the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, for going into a Committee of Supply on the navy estimates, Mr. TREFLAWNY, pursuant to notice, brought forward the case of Mr. John Seccombe, mortgagee of the ship "Velocity," which was seized and brought into Plymouth for an act of smuggling committed without the knowledge of the owner. The hon. member said the case was one which required the consideration of Government.—Mr. CARDWELL could assure the hon. gentleman that the Government had made every inquiry into the circumstance to which he alluded, and found it impossible to interfere on the subject.—Capt. BERKELEY called the attention of the House to the present system of manning Her Majesty's navy, and the difficulty that arises in procuring able seamen for her service. The hon. and gallant member entered into a long statement respecting the navy, and was left speaking.

Metropolis and its Vicinity.

The Whitsun Holidays.—The number of visitors to the British Museum on Monday amounted to 35,233, being 10,000 more than last Whit Monday. The visitors to the National Gallery were rather less than usual, but still these and all the other public exhibitions in the metropolis were very crowded. Greenwich fair and Stepney fair were, as usual, great sources of attraction to the holiday folks. Upwards of 33,000 persons passed through the Thames Tunnel from Sunday to Wednesday last, the majority of whom were children.

Visitation of the Archdeacon of Middlesex.—We lately gave some extracts from the charge of Archdeacon Hale; we now proceed to notice the charge of Archdeacon Sinclair, who held his visitation last week, in St. Paul's, Covent Garden. The charge commenced by referring to the question of national education, and detailed the progress of the negotiations between the Privy Council and the National Society respecting the visits of the Government inspector, and their satisfactory arraugement in accordance with the views of the Society. After speaking in commendation of the ruridecanal chapters recommended by the Bishop of London, the Archdeacon proceeded to the rubrical observances which have of late been so much before the public. By far the greatest danger to the Church he apprehended from undue observance of forms, ceremonies and outward symbols. Considerable importance had been attached to this subject of late, as it had become unhappily the badge of a party. Nothing therefore, should be more earnestly deprecated than the conducting of the services of the Church in a manner which would indicate the existence of party feeling. The great object the clergy ought to have in view, should be to make common usage compatible with the rubrical directions of the Prayer-book. Practices had been adopted by some clergymen which were highly censurable, curtailing some parts of the service to which they had a dislike, and interpolating others to suit their own preconceived opinions. The introduction of an extemporary prayer before the sermon, for example, might encroach upon the Liturgy, and eventually supersede it. Such practices tended only to widen the unhappy breach that existed between the statute law and the practices of the Church. On this subject he would offer a few remarks by way of calming existing differences, and healing the popular sore. There were some instances in which the rubric left either of two courses open to the clergy, in which cases established usage should be followed, as also in all doubtful points of rubrical direction. In examining, too, the phraseology of the rubrics, common usage should be allowed to interpret, as common and long prevailing practice was likely to be the right course. This might be illustrated by reference to those passages of Holy Scripture which alluded to public worship. If a doubt existed as to the propriety of liturgical or extemporaneous services, the former might be with safety adopted, as historical evidence was in its favour. The analogy was complete in that case, and disputed points in the rubric. Even where a clergyman was in a great measure certain in his own mind that certain practice was opposed to the rubric, it would be quite unnecessary for him to introduce peculiarities by which he would render himself liable to the accusation of a sectarian spirit. He was well aware that many persons, both lay and clerical, had very little sympathy with those who wished to calm the present agitation, conceiving that it must be productive of ultimate good. One looked to Parliament, another to convocation—one trusted that rubrical decisions would be strictly enforced, while others were hoping that they might be swept away altogether. It would be impossible to conceive the mischief that would accrue from bringing this subject under the notice of the legislature. Strife, exasperation, and turmoil would arise, and the only thing of which they could be certain was deep and bitter consternation, irreparably injurious to the Church. The more they looked to the state of the Church, the more forcibly they would see the necessity of peace. But for the agitation that had taken place, the Church of England might have been productive, during the last few years, of incalculable good. Churches and schools were rising up in every direction; the affection of the people for the Church was growing deeper and deeper; and her influence with colonies was daily extending. Her missionaries were cordially received by the Greek and Oriental Churches. Protestant Germany was looking to her with increasing confidence. British influence was extending and opening up fields of labour hitherto inaccessible. The only thing denied to the Church was a spirit of concord, and until that were gained, they should with one heart and voice unceasingly "pray for the peace of Jerusalem."

The Maynooth Grant.—On Saturday a meeting of the ratepayers of Kensington, called for the purpose of opposing the Maynooth grant, and taking into consideration the Jews' Disabilities Bill, was held in the vestry-room of the Old Church. Colonel Fox, M.P.; Capt. Williams, inspector of prisons; and other leading inhabitants, were present. Mr. J. Perceval, a son of the late Right Hon. Spencer Perceval, opened the proceedings by stating the reasons which induced him to oppose the measures brought in by Her Majesty's Government, which were chiefly of a religious nature, and he concluded by moving a petition to Parliament, the draft of which he read, amidst expressions of great disapprobation, mingled with cheers. Capt. Williams censured those who had got up this agitation in the parish; and moved, as an amendment, that the meeting adjourn for a week. Colonel Fox seconded the amendment, which was carried by a majority of 17 to 17. A poll of the parish was demanded; but after a very strong discussion it was arranged that both the motion and the amendment should be abandoned.

The Free Church Missions.—The friends of the Indian and Jewish Missions of the Free Church of Scotland held a meeting at Exeter Hall on Monday evening, to receive the report of the committee of the proceedings of the missionaries during the past year. The large room was quite filled, but the greater portion of the audience were ladies. Mr. P. M. Stewart, M.P. (in the absence of the Marquess of Breadalbane), presided. The secretary read a very voluminous report, which occupied upwards of an hour in reading. It stated that in addition to their former stations at Calcutta, Bombay, and Poonah, they had been enabled to establish a missionary station at Nagpoor. In South Africa, at an expense of 1200*l.* they had been enabled to occupy a station in Caffreland. Burnshill and Pirie were also African stations with missionaries. There were likewise missionaries at Malta, Gibraltar, Madeira, and Leghorn. Jewish missionaries had been sent to Pesth, Jassy, Damascus, Berlin, and Constantinople, at which stations the labours of nine missionaries were employed in the work of converting the remnant of Israel. There were also three stations formed at Madras. In Calcutta five adult Jews had been baptised into the Church. At Bombay there were 200 pupils, and upwards of 1000 children. At Poonah there were 500 natives under a course of training. At Madras the number of pupils was 500 (including 170 females), all of whom were learning English; while at Pesth there had been 40 Jew converts. The Brahmins no longer treated the efforts of the missionaries with contempt, but had felt it necessary to enter into the field of controversy with them. For this purpose they had established in the presidency of Bombay no less than three literary journals, and already had there grown up differences of opinion among the Brahmins themselves. The Free Church, in consequence of their separation from the establishment, had within these last two years, to build no less than 600 Churches in Scotland, and to provide means for supporting 700 ministers and preachers. An appeal was made to the people of Scotland and England, and the result had been that they had completely accomplished their task. The missionaries of Madras had also collected 28,000 rupees, and those of Calcutta 5,000*l.* for the support of the Free Church of Scotland. The report concluded by approving of the ordinances of the present Governor-General of India on the subject of education. The meeting was then addressed by several dissenting ministers and resolutions in favour of the missions were unanimously adopted.

Consecration of Christ Church, St. Giles's.—On Saturday the consecration of this edifice (the foundation-stone of which was laid about 12 months since), was performed by the Bishop of London. The building will afford accommodation for 1000 persons. The cost of the church, about 6,000*l.*, has been derived from voluntary contributions, aided by a small grant from the church commissioners. The whole of the sittings will be free.

Present from the East India Company to Mehemet Ali.—The friendly conduct of the Pacha of Egypt towards this country is about to be acknowledged by the Directors of the East India Company in a manner worthy of the greatest political and military power of the East. A silver fountain of extraordinary magnitude, intended as a present to Mehemet Ali, from the company has just been completed by Mr. Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields. It is upwards of 10ft. high, and contains 1,740 oz. of silver. It is richly ornamented with fruits and flowers, the likeness of beast, bird, or fish, being scrupulously avoided, in deference to the feelings of Mahometans. The fountain has an inscription on each of the four sides, simply recording the name of the giver and the receiver without any address. The language on each side varies; the languages employed are English, Latin, Arabic, and Persian.

Royal Literary Fund.—The 56th anniversary dinner of this excellent institution took place on Wednesday, in Freemasons' Hall. The Earl of Ellenborough presided, supported by Lords Brougham, Colchester, and Mahon, the Archbishop of Dublin, Chevalier Bunsen, Baron Leopold Von Buch, Mohan Lal, Major-General Pasley, Sir Percy Shelley, Bart., Mr. Milnes, M.P., Rev. Sir J. Wood, Bart., Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, Mr. Walter of Bearwood, Mr. James, and several other gentlemen distinguished in literature, amounting altogether to 110. The Archbishop of Dublin answered to the toast of the Church, Lord Colchester for the Navy, Gen. Pasley for the Army, Chevalier Bunsen for the Foreign Ministers, and Mr. Milnes for the members of both Houses of Parliament. Lord Brougham, who proposed the health of Lord Broughton in connexion with the toast of writers in science, which was received with very marked and long-continued cheers, Lord Broughton, who was evidently affected by the warmth of the reception, replied in an eloquent speech, stating, that it was just half a century since he published his first papers on Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the "Philosophical Transactions." His lordship expressed the warmest interest in the welfare of the Literary Fund; and said that he appeared before them that night as one of themselves, as a fellow-member of the corporation, and as one of its vice-presidents, and he rejoiced to be able once more to bear testimony to that fact to the previous distribution, and to the manner in which its funds were administered. His lordship concluded by a glowing eulogium on Lord Ellenborough's administration in India, declaring that neither in ancient, middle, nor modern times had there been any example of a more brilliant career, or one that should be hailed with such universal satisfaction. Lord Ellenborough, in returning thanks, said that, much as he was indebted to Lord Brougham for having proved him in his presence, he was indebted to him for much more—for having defended him in his absence. That hall was not the place for him to say one word on political matters, but he might say that the success which attended his administration in India was undertaken by one single responsible person. Every measure succeeded. He never had to complain of any evil servant of the Company with whom he came into personal communication; he had never to complain of any military officer. Every one served him with the utmost zeal and the most unbounded devotion, and he would never lose an opportunity of expressing his lasting gratitude to them for those services. Lord Mahon then answered to the toast of the Literature. Mr. Milnes then proposed the health of Baron Leopold von Buch, the Nestor of European Geologists, who returned thanks in a brief speech. Mr. Serjeant Talfourd spoke with his usual eloquence in answer to the toast of the Press. Mr. James responded to that of the Novelists; Mr. John Kemble to that of the Dramatists, when Mr. Walter of Bearwood, acknowledged a similar compliment on behalf of the Visitors. The Rev. Sir John Wood returned thanks for the Stewards and Lord Ellenborough then gave the final toast of the night, "the Ladies," saying, amidst much cheering, that it was all very well for the gentlemen to assemble there, and toast the dramatists, and the poets, and the novelists, and other great authors in the field of literature, but, after all, the ladies were the true arbiters of literary merit. If the ladies said that the last new novel was not worth reading, depend upon it, it was not worth reading; if the ladies said that a new play was not fit to be seen, depend upon it, it was not fit to be seen; and whatever literary men might say, or critics write, the ladies, on matters of literary taste as on other matters, exercised absolute power, from which there was no appeal. The dinner went off with excellent spirit, and the amount of the contributions announced by the Rev. Dr. Russell was 840*l.*

Anti-Corn Law Bazaar.—The Free Trade Bazaar, for which preparations have so long been making at Covent-garden Theatre, under the direction of the Anti-Corn Law League, was opened last week to the public. The body of the theatre has been most tastefully fitted up, and the bazaar extends from the boxes to the very end of the stage. It is of an oblong form, bounded at the sides by a series of light and elegant columns, which support a transparent cathedral roof, resembling a Gothic hall. In the spaces between the columns are stalls, with all kinds of merchandise very prettily arranged and extending almost to the boxes even with the roof. The different stalls are surmounted by cards notifying the particular places from which are contributed the articles exposed for sale, and each stall has several ladies to superintend its business. From a lady's dress to a doll's cap — from the ottoman of most elaborate manufacture to the smallest articles of the toilette—all are to be found here, and in the greatest profusion. Nor are lighter articles alone among the collection, for in the saloon are all kinds of cutlery and iron manufacture, from a drawing-room stove to a lady's needle, spas and porcelain, casts from the antique, and modern sculpture; constituting not merely a bazaar, but a museum of British manufactures. The number of visitors during the first day was computed at 7000; and the numbers who sought admission as soon as the charge became 1s. was so great, that it has been necessary to raise the admission to 2s. 6*d.*, at which price the Bazaar is daily thronged.

American Ice.—A novel article of import has recently taken place in the shape of ice from America, in the neighbourhood of the Wenham Lake, &c. The article is brought in large blocks, varying from 2 cwt. to 4 cwt., and several vessels have arrived laden almost entirely with it, having several hundred tons on board. It is deposited in the ship's hold with care, and covered and surrounded with wood-dust, and so arrives in a very perfect state, with very little loss in weight, particularly at this period of the year. The greater portion of that hitherto imported has been landed at the St. Katharine's Docks, where a shed or warehouse has been appropiated in a cool portion of the south quay, and to which it is removed on being landed, and deposited until removed to the owners' private stores.

Westminster Improvements.—The third report of the Metropolitan Improvement Commission has just been presented to Parliament. The substance of the report recommends the formation of a wide street, similar to Regent-street, between the Houses of Parliament and the district of Pimlico. This important local improvement will therefore destroy those haunts of misery which were lately the subject of complaint in the House of Lords, and will greatly improve the salubrity of Westminster by drainage and enlarged thoroughfares. A Bill is now before Parliament for carrying out the recommendations of the Commissioners, and for the execution of a new street, described in the report as most important to the health, morals, and comfort of the inhabitants of southern Westminster, and as the precursor of "future and more enlarged improvement." This district has been hitherto neglected in the plans and means of metropolitan improvements, and it has been long a disgrace as the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament and Buckingham Palace.

Offences in the Parks.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to prevent, as far as possible, the repetition of offences in the parks, either by damaging the shrubs or otherwise (as a warning to evil doers), have determined to cause a list to be placed at each of the entrances to the enclosure in St. James's and the other parks, containing the initials of the names, together with the amount of fine or imprisonment, as well as the nature of the offence, of every person convicted of any breach of the rules in the parks during the past month—the list being altered and renewed on the 1st of every succeeding month.

The late Explosion at Blackwall.—On Wednesday Mr. George Lowe, the foreman of Messrs. Samuda's works, was tried for the manslaughter of the workmen who were killed by the late explosion at Blackwall. The jury at once acquitted him, being satisfied that the occurrence was purely accidental, and Baron Alderson expressed his concurrence in the verdict.

Warmth of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending May 10:—West Districts, 123; Northern, 180; Central, 134; Eastern, 150; Southern, 207; Total, 829; males, 408; females, 421. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1191; males, 611; females, 580.

Provincial.

Cambridge.—The 15th meeting of the British Association will be held at Cambridge, commencing June 19. The time was fixed thus early in order to suit the "commencement," which brings a large concourse to the University. The great feature of the ensuing meeting will be a congress of the observers at the different magnetical observatories stationed throughout Europe. Sir J. Herschel is the president for the year.—The annual meeting of the Camden Society took place last week, the President, Archdeacon Thorpe, in the chair. On the question of the dissolution of the Society, the numbers were, for the dissolution, 109; against it, 271. Majority against it, 162. The chairman moved the appointment of a committee to revise the laws, upon which Dr. Lee moved an amendment, that the Society be dissolved, and Professor Sedgwick denounced the Society's ecclesiastical calendar and other publications as a disgrace to the academic body. A somewhat excited discussion then followed on the question of the new committee, in which Professor Sedgwick advocated the appointment of an especial 12, excluding the 6 who formed the old committee. This proposition was negatived by a large majority, and the following gentlemen were appointed:—Messrs. Witts, Webb, Stokes, Paley, Hodson, and Hope (M.P.). The Rev. Messrs Goodwin and Freeman were elected auditors.

Chelmsford.—The Bishop of Rochester, it is said, has purchased the seat of Mr. John Round, M.P., Danbury-place, Essex. The purchase-money is stated to be 26,000*l.* The timber, furniture, and fixtures to be taken at a valuation.

Great Marlow.—The local papers state that Mr. C. R. S. Murray, who lately vacated his seat as M.P. for Bucks, on embracing the Roman Catholic faith, is about to erect a Roman Catholic Church in this town, at his sole expense.

Hunstanton.—Measures have been taken for rendering the village of Hunstanton, on the coast of Norfolk, a watering-place, and there seems no doubt that the plan will find favour with those to whom an occasional residence on the coast is an object of importance. Independently of the recollections associated with it as the landing-place of St. Edmund, the King and Martyr, who founded the famous Abbey of Bury St. Edmund's, it is extremely well suited for a quiet country retreat. The scenery of Hunstanton itself, with its bold coast and high and rocky cliffs, is beautiful, and it is surrounded by charming monuments of the L'Estranges, and other old families; and the Manor-house is one of the few remains of the domestic architecture of the 15th and 16th centuries.

Norwich.—The Bishop of Norwich concluded the visitation of his diocese, at Woodbridge, last week. His lordship's charge embraced a great variety of topics connected with Church government, as well as some direct reference to those modern "innovations" which have of late attracted public attention. His lordship commenced by congratulating the clergy upon the advance made during the last seven years by the National Church—on the rapid progress made by education in the right direction—on the comparative equalisation of episcopal sees, so as to do away with the evil of translation—on the still greater evil of holding livings in commendam—and on the mischievous custom of non-residence; all of which evils, he rejoiced to say, were gradually diminishing. His lordship then adverted to the restoration and embellishment of churches, and stated that he would encourage the taste for decorations, whether internal or external:—

"Who could behold," he said, "without gratification the finest specimens of art, whether architectural or pictorial, or regard without pleasure the productions of the painter or the sculptor, and not feel that religion had patronised these sister arts? There was, he admitted, an antiquated objection to such decorations, because they had formerly been the objects of superstitious worship. In a previous age, when men's minds were under the controul of superstition, when they were enslaved by the priesthood, such an argument might have had some weight; but in the present more enlightened era there was no foundation for such apprehensions. The friends of the Protestant Church might now look without danger upon what had been once dangerous, and they should have no sympathy with the spirit which went forth as the destroyer of all that was beautiful. In fact, the restoration of churches was the restoration of Protestantism, not of Popery. Of Protestantism they might say, with Luther, that it would be well to use any external means in order the more vividly to impress spiritual truths upon the mind." He then proceeded to give his reasons for dissenting altogether from some recent "extravagances." His opinions on apostolical succession were well known. He would earnestly advise the clergy not to bring before their hearers a topic that would not bear minute inquiry, and was certainly calculated to deter rather than attract them from uniting with the church rather than attack them to it. Let him refer them for a moment to the supposed chain of apostolical succession. Its first origin had had no foundation in Scripture, and its first links were involved in obscurity and perplexity that it was impossible to disentangle. That consideration alone should make them pause before they made such a slender basis the ground of their opinions; and if they looked to the manifest corruptions that had crept into the Greek and Roman churches, it was very difficult for Christians to say how they could regard them through the dark ages as lights to guide to life. Their own experience would suggest what might be the consequence when such a doctrine was held by men covetous of power, imbued with the love of supremacy, and influenced by worldly ambition. But, beyond these considerations, he would remind them that this doctrine was not to be found in any part of the liturgy, or in any of the homilies of the established church. It was opposed not once only, but repeatedly. Indeed, the only true apostolical succession was the succession of apostolical doctrine. The laity were also bound otherwise by their ancestors and they all held their fathers the office to be their only claim to apostolical succession. This doctrine was likely to excite the contempt of that large portion of the remaining society who dissented from the church on that ground. Was it not alarming, because of neglecting the end for the sake of the means, when they saw a clergyman, with the best intentions, purchasing prints which were operating fatally against genuine piety? Surely under present circumstances, it was the object, the effort, and the Christian course, not to urge upon any the doctrine of apostolic succession, but rather seek to teach them the duty of "true sons," not to tell them "We are the clergy, and therefore you are to do as we tell you." The whole body of Christians formed the church, and the clergy had no need to fear for the maintenance of their own rights, so long as they performed the duty allotted to them with fidelity. But let the clergy deceive themselves, by misunderstanding the church's true character, and by apostolical succession, and must prevent the indifference of the laity to their claims, or God might cause to happen itself which might be its probable consequence in this country. The right rev. prelate then referred to the remarks made by many who regard baptism not as regeneration, but as a mere outward form prescribed by the church to make us members thereof. His lordship then observed, that there was another question, which, although perhaps insignificant in itself, had within the last few years

assumed so much importance that he would not be justified in passing it over in silence on that occasion. He alluded to the vehement dispute about which they had heard so much respecting the use of the surplice and the gown, the adoption of a weekly offertory, and other obsolete forms and ceremonies. In his judgment these matters were utterly worthless and indifferent, and he should not take upon himself to pronounce any authoritative opinion respecting them. It was painful to think that in an age when all men were beginning to examine for themselves, and when evils of such gigantic and really appalling nature called for immediate consideration and prompt decision; it was painful, he repeated, that, under such circumstances, the country should be disturbed and the church distracted by disputes concerning matters essentially unimportant. But their very insignificance was the reason for their agitation, and that only made the solution of the question all the more difficult; to settle men's opinions on usages which had long become obsolete was not so easy a matter as some on both sides seemed to imagine. Only look at the pages of controversy which had been written on every point in dispute. Arguments of weight, from high authority, were no sooner urged on one side, than men equally high in authority, equally distinguished for talent, and equally competent to give an opinion, came forward on the other side, and thus the questions had been tossed to and fro by the ingenuity and sophistries of the parties, until their meaning was rendered ambiguous by the very arguments which the disputants employed in order to explain their respective views. If that were unsatisfactory—and he believed it was so—the question naturally suggested itself, where was the remedy? The church itself presented too many examples of what were not remedies, but aggravations: take, for instance, the Act of Conformity, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, which punished with barbarous severity those who, from conscientious scruples, had not conformed. Again, there was the Act of Charles II.,—the Act of Uniformity,—which had been justly described as the most tyrannical, unjust, and schismatic enactment that ever was passed; not purifying or purging the temple, but banishing amidst the thousands who were expelled many of God's ministers, who could not declare their unfeigned consent and assent to the Book of Common Prayer, and comply with the provisions of the Act of Uniformity. Surely such Acts only tended to increase the evil. If the attempt failed at those distant periods, it must be evident that it was quite impossible to enforce rigid uniformity at the present time, when men's minds were more settled by reflection. Only two remedies for the existing difficulties presented themselves to his mind. The first of these consisted in attention being paid to the directions given in the Book of Common Prayer, which said, "It is but reasonable that upon weighty and important considerations, according to the various exigencies of times and occasions, such changes and alterations should be made therein as to those that are in places of authority should from time to time seem either necessary or expedient." Such a remedy, however, though naturally the most likely to prove beneficial, and the most likely to satisfy the Church, would in the present day, the question being so beset by difficulties, he apprehended, be impracticable. The other point was, whether they should consent to regard the existing laws and customs of their Church in the same light as they would regard other existing laws and customs which had prevailed for a similar length of time. Liberty and latitude were too often taken in such matters to admit of a question or a doubt; and he was persuaded that his reverend brethren would recognise, that in their own experience, as in that of others, there was no such thing as a literal observance of the rubrics or the canons. Constant uniformity in obsolete ceremonies would be altogether incompatible with the known feelings of the times in which they lived. He would therefore urge upon his clergy to treat all such subjects with moderation—not to speak of those cases where there appeared to be a contradiction of the several parts. There was a vast number of points, the observance of which depended not on the mere letter of the law, but which must be, in a great degree, governed by times and circumstances. The clergy would do well to bear in mind the length of time these laws had remained unaltered,—whatever changes had taken place were brought about by lapse of time, by means of which things found their level, without contest or confusion. He felt certain that all thinking men must doubt the propriety of strict observance being had to every jot and tittle of the ritual—it only remained for Christian charity to fix the limit of it in every particular. It was essential to the well-being of society that this rule should be as openly as tacitly acknowledged. At the same time, he freely admitted that the want of some authority was exceedingly felt in some scrupulous minds, and was the cause of rendering many truly pious men doubtful. That fact was becoming more and more acknowledged by all, and it could not fail to be seen that in the National Church there must be a revision. But there was enough for himself and the clergy to attend to with advantage to the cause of true religion. Whenever his advice, as diocesan, was required, he would be ready to give it, but he should be most reluctant to recommend a return to obsolete forms, even where they were formerly prescribed as duties. By the practice of moderation and forbearance, the clergy would be enabled to adhere to those essential rules about which there was no doubt, no controversy—where all was plain, intelligible, and unambiguous. The right rev. prelate, after condemning the too common practice of private baptism, and the curtailment of the burial service, spoke in congratulatory terms on the progress of education in his diocese. His lordship concluded by reminding the clergy that unity of spirit, not uniformity either in action or practice, was the end which they should all aim at. As there was variety in the works of nature, so was there also in the works of grace. It was their business to wait for that unity of spirit in patience and in hope, and he entreated them, in this their waiting time, to unite together as far as they could, and not to aggravate existing differences.

Portsmouth.—A court-martial was held here on Monday, Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, president, to try Lieutenant Morris, and Mr. Crane, the master of H.M.S. Skylark, for the loss of that ship on the 25th ult., near St. Alban's-head. After hearing evidence, the Court were of opinion that Lieut. Morris, being at the time ill, and on the sick-list, was exempt from all blame in the matter of getting the ship ashore; that Mr. Crane, being the chief executive officer in the absence of the Lieutenant commanding, not having steered the ship in her proper course, nor hove the lead when the fog came on, or after, was guilty of gross neglect of duty, for which he be dismissed Her Majesty's service; that the crew of the Skylark, having acted under the orders of their officers, are exempted from blame and acquitted.—Lieut. Stokes, who was lately dismissed from the Tartarus by sentence of a court-martial, has been appointed by the Lords of the Admiralty to Her Majesty's ship Siren.—Letters from Sierra Leone of the 30th March, announce the capture of the notorious slave felucca which beat off the Growler's pinnace in January last, when Lieut. Lodwick was wounded, and which had so long eluded our sailing cruisers. She was captured in the Bight of Benin, and when taken bore evident marks of the rough encounter she had sustained from the pinnace of the growler; the mizen was completely riddled, the mainsail cut to ribands, and it is believed five men were killed in the action, as their names did not appear in the felucca's papers when captured. Her crew was about 70 men. The felucca was named the Hurican, and a cargo of 700 slaves were waiting to be shipped at the Gallinas. Eight days after the capture of the Hurican the Hydra made prize of another equally famous slaver, and which had given our fleetest cruisers the slip on several occasions. This was the Pepita, captured during the night, after a most exciting and interesting chase, the felucca striving to get away; but the Hydra's 68-pounders committed havoc in her sails, crippled her speed, and shattered her hull and bulwarks. The felucca still, however, carried on, but found steam too powerful for her, when Lieut. Rooystra boarded and discovered every preparation for a most bloody resistance, with upwards of 200 rounds in her magazine. She had upwards of 300 slaves on board, and would have doubled that number in a few hours had she not been captured, as a number of canoes were pulling off to her from the shore when she descried the Hydra making towards her.

Romford.—In the Court of Bankruptcy on Saturday, Mr. Johnson, the late Alderman, and partner in the firm of Johnson and Mann, of the Romford Bank, passed his last examination. The debts owing by the Romford Bank are set forth at 40,427*l.*, as deposit balances and notes in circulation. To creditors holding property, 6661*l.*; further liabilities 7704*l.* The cash given up under the fiat was 1320*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* Good debts 9200*l.*; property 947*l.*; bills in creditors' hands between 5000*l.* and 6000*l.* From 1826 to 1844 the profits were 11,511*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.*; trade expenses 16,767*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* The bankrupt's (Mr. Johnson's) own account was, in the period, 12,735*l.* Debts to about 37,000*l.* had been proved before the present sitting; extending to as many as 700 creditors. A dividend of 5*s.* has been declared, and a further one of 2*s.* is expected. Mr. Mann has obtained his certificate, and all his private debts have been paid in full.

Yarmouth.—In consequence of the refusal of the town-council to call in the aid of a professional man to assist the jury in their investigation into the cause of the late accident, the foreman and the most influential members of the jury who were determined that the inquiry should be full and impartial, decided upon addressing a memorial to Sir J. Graham, in the hope that, as a Government engineer had been sent down in the Ashton-under-Line case, the same privilege might be conceded in this investigation. A memorial has accordingly been forwarded to Government, and the inquest has been adjourned until a reply is received.

Railways.

The Railway Committee on the West Yorkshire district decided on Friday that the preamble of the Leeds and West Riding Junction Bill has been proved, and that the preamble of the West Yorkshire Bill has not been proved.—Probably one of the boldest railway projects of the day is that suggested by Mr. Robert Stephenson, the engineer, of crossing the Menai Straits by means of a tunnel in the air. Mr. Stephenson proposes to throw an iron tube over the Straits, by means of suspension chains, using the Britannia Rock as a buttress in the middle, the tube to be 25 feet in breadth, by 15 in depth, constructed in the same way as an iron ship, composed of large plates put together in the form of a great iron tunnel. He also proposes to have two tubes, one for each line of rails, and expresses himself satisfied upon the strength and safety of the tube, having tried experiments on an iron vessel 220 feet in length, suspended by the stem and stern, with a weight of 1200 tons in her centre, without the slightest straining effect. This plan would be calculated effectually to prevent interference with the navigation, the great difficulty to be encountered in carrying the Chester and Holyhead over the Menai Straits.—It is said to be the intention of Government, in conjunction with the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company, to have the electric telegraph established on that important line, reaching from London to Holyhead, a distance of between 200 and 300 miles, and embracing in its route the commercial capitals of Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham. The success of the apparatus in the service of the South Western and the Admiralty, between London and Portsmouth, 88 miles, is said to be the cause of its proposed establishment on the Chester and Holyhead line.—At a meeting of the Grand Junction Company on Monday a dividend for the quarter, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, was declared, and the chairman said that there was no prospect of an amicable arrangement with the Birmingham Company, which was still endeavouring to obtain an independent access to the districts north of Birmingham; and, therefore, he considered the Grand Junction bound to obtain an independent opening into London by means of the line projected from Birmingham to Oxford, and thence by the Great Western.—Last week was one of the most prolific of the season in new projects, the prospectuses of no fewer than 14 lines having been issued. Amongst them were the London, Oxford, Cheltenham, and Gloucester, Tewkesbury and Hereford Direct; Nottingham and Hereford Direct; Nottingham Valley, or Belvoir and Grantham; Leicester and Bedford; Eastern Counties Junction and Southend; Western Canada, Ontario, and Huron Junction; Great Western of Italy; Lancashire and Yorkshire North Eastern Junction; Bandon and Bantry; Worcester, Tenbury, and Ludlow; Venice and Trieste; Gloucester and Oxford; Shrewsbury and Trent Union; Great Central Sarl[illegible].—On Monday week a train started from the terminus of the Southampton railway, at Nine Elms, containing the directors and their friends, and opened the branch line to Guildford, to which place eight trains will now run daily.—The Railway Chronicle observes—"That a great increase of speed has recently taken place on several of our chief lines of railway is shown by the summer arrangements which came into operation on the 1st May. On that day an express train began to run from London to Liverpool at a speed, including stoppages, of 40 miles an hour, and therefore at a travelling pace of about 50 miles an hour. This train leaves London at 4, and a passenger is at Birmingham in time for dinner at 7; or, if he choose to go on, after taking refreshments comfortably, by the Grand Junction Railway, he will find himself in Liverpool a few minutes after 10. The speed on this line is greater even than on the London and Birmingham, on account of the number of stoppages, while the time is the same. The man of business is thus enabled to have an entire day in London, and a long night's rest in Liverpool. While others dine, he travels the 200 miles. The distance from London to Exeter on the Great Western, 194 miles, is now done in five hours, being at the rate, including stoppages, of 40 miles an hour and a travelling pace of 50 miles an hour. The train leaves London every morning at half-past 9. On the South-Western at half-past 12, there is an express train, which does 78 miles in two hours, being close on 40 miles an hour, including a stoppage at Basingstoke. The distance of 303 miles is now done between London and Newcastle in 10 hours and a half. The last we shall notice is the London and Brighton express train, which leaves Brighton at a quarter before 9 in the morning and reaches London at a quarter after 10, being just one hour and a half on 50½ miles, which is performed with the greatest regularity. Indeed, we believe the London and Brighton management have the merit of setting the example of these express trains, which although just started on other lines, have been in regular work on it since the month of August last year. It will be seen that little remains to be accomplished after this in point of speed by atmospheric or other means of conveyance, since part even of the Brighton line rises 1 in 100."

Ireland.

Dublin.—It is stated that the Lords of the Treasury have resolved to carry out a geological survey of Ireland in conjunction with that of Great Britain, and that Professor Kane has been appointed to assist in the chemical department of the work. It is also stated that the Repeal members of Parliament, in Conciliation-hall, have determined to resist any attempt to compel their attendance in the House of Commons, even though there be a call of the House, and the Serjeant-at-Arms be sent over with the Speaker's warrant. The Repeal paper says upon this point:—"If duty should call them to Westminster, they are as prepared to labour there as they are now to labour here. But they, and not the British Parliament, are the judges of the time and the circumstances under which their presence in the English House of Commons may become a duty; and should the Parliament attempt to coerce them to attend its sittings at any time, other than they themselves may select, they are resolved to give the Sergeant-at-Arms an oppor-

...tary of making an arrest, and afterwards to test, by due process, the legality of that arrest, and thus try the right of the British Parliament to enforce the attendance of an Irish representative. This resolution was unanimously come to yesterday by an influential committee, and we lose not an hour in giving the assembled senators the benefit to be derived from an early knowledge of the fact." It is added that some of the Repeal lawyers have discovered that as no provision was made in the acts incorporating the two Parliaments whereby the Speaker would be empowered to arrest members not residing in England, Mr. O'Connell and his associates are quite safe in adopting the policy of "passive resistance."—The anniversary of the imprisonment of the "Repeal Martyrs" is to be celebrated in the metropolis, and under the very eyes of the Executive, by a monster demonstration, the precise details of which are as yet in embryo.—Colonel Shelton, the distinguished officer who was second in command throughout the disastrous operations in Cabul under General Elphinstone, died on Wednesday, of the injuries he sustained on Saturday, when his horse ran away with him, and fell on rushing into the barrack yard, with the Colonel under him. The jury, at the inquest, returned a verdict of accidental death.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday. Mr. W. GRAY, having been called to the chair, addressed the meeting, congratulating it on the concessions lately made to this country by the Ministry. Every wrong redressed was a limb unbound for Ireland and Repeal.—Mr. O'CONNELL commenced by alluding to a menace held out for the purpose of intimidating the Irish members, who had been given to understand that there was about to be a call of the House, and that it was intended that the Speaker's warrant should issue to compel them to attend in London. Now, he considered it right to apprise the Association and the country that having given the question due consideration, he arrived at the conclusion that the Speaker had no constitutional authority whatever to issue any such warrant. He had spent many years of his life as a practising lawyer. When he offered himself as a candidate for the county Clare, previous to the granting of Catholic Emancipation, he told the people of that county that if they got justice from the Imperial Parliament, he was entitled, as a matter of right, to take his seat without taking those preliminary oaths which no Catholic could conscientiously subscribe to. That assertion had been combatted by a very eminent English lawyer, Sir Edward Sugden, but he was subsequently obliged to admit that he had taken a wrong view of the case, as he discovered, on reference to the Act of Union, that no provision was made by that statute for the continuance of those oaths. He (Mr. O'Connell) had analysed the Act of Union, and he did not hesitate to pronounce it to be a piece of the most bungling legislation that ever disgraced the statute-book. He had no hesitation in saying that, notwithstanding the Act of Union, the Act of 1782 remained to that hour unrepealed—that Act of the Irish Parliament, which declared that the English Parliament had no right or authority to legislate for the Irish people. He repeated the assertion most distinctly and emphatically, and maintained that that Act of the Irish Parliament, declaring that there was no power on earth that had constitutional authority to make laws for this country excepting only the Sovereign of Great Britain and the Irish Houses of Lords and Commons is not repealed by the Act of Union, but on the contrary, remained to the present hour upon the statute book. The English Legislature did not take the trouble to repeal that Act by the Union statute, and it followed, therefore, that the new legislative body created by that statute had no power or authority over Ireland except that which it acquired by the express words of the statute. He took it for granted that it could not be disputed that the British Parliament had no power, prerogative, or authority, for legislative purposes, over this country, other than that conferred by the Act of Union. Therefore it was that he denied that the English Parliament had any power whatever to compel the attendance of the Irish members. The Speaker had certainly authority over the English members, but he had no authority whatever to issue any warrant affecting the Irish members. After the most mature consideration he had arrived at the determination to resist any such warrant. In one event only should he yield obedience to it, and that was if any member would attempt to resist it by force. If such a contingency as that should happen, he would at once bow with submission, and proceed to London. If arrested, he would move to the Court of Exchequer, and sue out a writ of habeas corpus. He confessed frankly that he had no confidence in the Court of Queen's Bench, and he would not hesitate to say that the Chief Justice of that court was as ignorant of constitutional law as proved by his conduct in the State Trials, as he was of Greek. He would not, therefore, bring his case before that personage; he would prefer the Common Pleas or Exchequer. They would treat the Serjeant-at-Arms to an action at law, and he had no doubt but they would succeed. He would not attend in his place in Parliament till this question was determined: unless, indeed, the affairs of Ireland rendered his presence necessary. Amongst the Irish members there was but one opinion on the matter; and he would read for the meeting a letter from Mr. Smith O'Brien, stating his determination not to obey the Speaker's warrant, if served with it. Mr. O'Connell then said he wished to offer a few observations on the subject of academical education in Ireland, as introduced by Sir J. Graham. The plan was not so accurately developed as to render it perfectly intelligible, and, therefore, it would be better to avoid any premature discussion on the subject till the matter was fairly and truly before them. He considered it most advisable that the Catholic hierarchy should meet and decide upon the merits of the scheme as far as it was developed, and not leave the people of Ireland in a state of uncertainty and doubt. For his part he would be bound by such decision. He then went into the details of the plan, and in doing so, denied that there was any analogy between the College of Maynooth and Trinity College. Maynooth was established exclusively for the education of the Catholic clergy, whilst the University of Dublin was devoted to the indiscriminate education of the lay gentry of Ireland. If he were asked what plan he would propose, he would say, let a college be founded at Cork, and another in Galway, and let these institutions be placed under the guidance of the Catholic bishops, and let the appointment of professors be vested in their hands. It was to be regretted that the plan proposed made no provision for the maintenance or moral government of the students, but left them exposed to all the danger of unrestrained liberty, and that at a period of life when they most needed control. Sir Robert Inglis had pronounced the proposed system of education as a "gigantic system of no education." He seldom coincided with that honourable member, but he quite agreed with him in his denunciation of the present plan. He considered the present scheme as the most absurd and foolish ever proposed, and he felt confident it would not meet with the approval of the Irish people. It appeared as if the Government were acting in accordance with the plan of the King of the French, who, having first destroyed the civil liberties of his subjects, was now seeking to annihilate their religious freedom. In conclusion, Mr. O'Connell said that he would avoid giving any notice of motion on the subject, as he would await the decision of the bishops, and his opinion would be based on that decision. The ministry, he felt confident, meant well, but they were badly advised. Mr. R. D. BROWN, M.P., addressed the meeting at considerable length, and emphatically condemned the ministerial plan of academical education, and argued that the same disposing power which dictated the Bequests Act likewise promoted the present measure. Mr. O'CONNELL moved the suspension of the standing orders, for the purpose of enabling him to propose a petition to Parliament in favour of an amended Municipal Reform Bill. The declarations of the minister gave them hopes that their wishes in this respect would be acceded to, and they had the hearty concurrence of the Conservative members of the corporation to the proposition. He claimed for the corporation the right of appointing the sheriff, and he confessed he was under the apprehension that his motion would have been opposed, but to his delight and surprise he was disappointed, and was supported by those on whose opposition he had calculated. Dr. Maunsell, a conservative member, even went farther than he did, and denounced the policy of giving a corporation bill to Ireland inferior to that conferred upon England, and he claimed for the corporate bodies the appointment of the borough magistrates. Such conduct gave him the greatest pleasure, and augured well for the future. In conclusion he moved the adoption of a petition to the legislature for the purpose of placing the Irish corporations on an equality with those in England. Mr. DAVIS, a member of the "Young Ireland" party in the Association, expressed dissent to some extent from Mr. O'Connell on the subject of the proposed plan of extended education for Ireland. He approved of the bill because it did not endow any form of sectarianism, and because the endowment conferred on it was very liberal, but he disapproved of Government interference with the situations in the college, and of the absence of any form of theological instruction. He likewise declared himself in favour of a mixed system of education such as was proposed by the plan.—The rent for the week was 420*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*

Limerick.—The Court of Queen's Bench pronounced judgment last week in the important case of "The Queen in error v. Conway and Lynch." The prisoners were found guilty at last summer assizes of the murder, in 1836, of the Rev. Mr. Dawson, but in consequence of their counsel suing out a writ of error, their execution was respited, and the case argued several times during the last and present terms. They were first tried in October, 1843, and on the second day's proceedings, before the evidence closed, one of the jurors was pronounced by a medical man to be in active fever, and the judge discharged the panel, but expressed his determination to commence the trial de novo, with another jury next day. Accordingly the trial was resumed, and after two days more the jury were locked up, and not agreeing, being 11 to one for conviction, judge Jackson discharged them, as they all declared there was no likelihood of a verdict, and the prisoners remained in custody. At the Spring Assizes, 1844, they were again brought to trial, for the third and last time, before Judge Jackson, found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged on the 8th May following. Before that final day, they were respited on points saved by their counsel, at the preceding trial, against the legality of discharging the Jury; and, after hearing arguments for the Crown and the prisoners in successive terms, these professional points last week were ruled in their favour, and the prisoners thus escaped by what is notoriously mere fiction of law; for as to their moral guilt the finding of the Jury was conclusive on the last trial. Some time prior to his death the Rev. Mr. Dawson had evicted some tenants solely with a view of placing them in new holdings, and was actually murdered in the very field which, but a few minutes before his death, he had selected as a site for the erection of cottages for the persons he had dispossessed.

Belfast.—The dinner to Sir H. Pottinger at Belfast, his native town, came off on Wednesday fortnight. Upwards of 200 of the principal merchants and gentry were present.

Edinburgh.—Dr. Chalmers has announced in a pamphlet he has just published, that he intends to retire from the public business of the Free Church. He says:—"In announcing my determination now to retire from the public business of the Free Church, I feel confident that it will not be ascribed to any decay of affection for its cause. It is not a matter of choice, but of physical necessity. I have neither the vigour nor the alertness of former days, and the strength no longer remains with me either for the debates of the Assembly, or for the details of committees and their correspondence."

Law.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—[Sittings in Banco.]—Howard v. Gossett, Knt.—Judgment.—This important case, involving the privileges of the House of Commons, was an action of trespass and false imprisonment. The declaration stated that defendant, on the 6th February, 1840, assaulted the plaintiff and laid hold of him, and forced and compelled him, to go along a certain passage to a certain room, and afterwards along a certain other passage, to a certain other room, and then imprisoned him for a certain time, and then forced him to return through the first mentioned passage into the first mentioned room, and there detained him for a further space of time without any reasonable or probable cause, contrary to law, and against the will of the plaintiff, whereby he was injured in his credit and circumstances. Defendant pleaded, in the first place, that before and at the period in question there was a Parliament sitting at Westminster, and that shortly before the arrest in question i. e., on the 27th Jan., 1840, certain matters were under discussion in the House of Commons, in respect of which it was considered by the House to be necessary that the plaintiff should be questioned and examined at the bar of the House, and that for the purpose of procuring the attendance of plaintiff to be examined at the bar of the House touching the matters aforesaid, it was ordered by the House in pursuance of and according to the ancient usages and privileges of the said House and the law and custom of Parliament, that plaintiff should attend the said house forthwith, of which order plaintiff had notice, that plaintiff, however, did not nor would attend in obedience to the said order, but wilfully and contemptuously without any reasonable or probable cause or excuse, wholly neglected and refused to do so, and concealed and absented himself for the purpose of avoiding the attending the House; that thereupon it was ordered and resolved by the House, in pursuance of, and according to the ancient usages and privileges of the House and the law and custom of Parliament, that plaintiff should be sent for and brought before the said House in the custody of the Serjeant-at-arms, and that the Speaker should issue his warrant accordingly; thereupon the Speaker, in pursuance of the order and resolution, and in pursuance of and according to the ancient usages and privileges of the House and the law and custom of Parliament, by his warrant in that behalf duly made, which warrant recited the order of the House, did require and authorise the Serjeant-at-arms to take into custody the body of the plaintiff; which warrant was delivered by the Speaker to the Serjeant to be by him executed in due form of law; in virtue and execution of which warrant defendant, as such Serjeant, did arrest the plaintiff, and did necessarily compel him to go into the rooms and passages already mentioned, using no unnecessary violence, and imprison him until he could bring him before the House. The second plea was the same as the first, except that it averred that plaintiff when arrested was within that part of the ancient palace of Her Majesty at Westminster which was appropriated to and used by the House of Commons. The third plea described the first order of the House as an order to attend to answer a charge of having committed a breach of privilege, and alleged that plaintiff having wilfully disobeyed that order, another order was made to bring him in custody to the bar. The fourth plea alleged the first order to be for attending the House of Commons forthwith, and all the pleas justified the arrest under the warrant alone. To these pleas plaintiff demurred upon the following grounds, and which constituted of course the principal topics in the proceedings had. The demurrer alleged that it did not appear by the plea that defendant in making the arrest was acting under any authority or process recognised by the law, nor why plaintiff ought to have attended the House of Commons, nor that the plea did not show the nature of the things with respect to which he was to be examined, so as to enable this court to judge of the necessity of his appearance and examination, nor did they show what he had done which rendered it obligatory upon him to attend the House, or which gave the House any dominion over him, nor did they state that the warrant contained any charge whatever against him, nor show why he was to be so prohibited, nor how, in such circumstances, the House possessed any legal power to pass the resolution, or make the order already mentioned. The demurrer contained some other points of less importance, which it is unnecessary to mention more particularly, the question having been already fully argued. The court took time to consider its judgment, which was delivered on Thursday at great length, each Judge stating his judgment in succession. Mr. Justice Williams differed from his learned brethren, and gave his judgment for defendant. The judgment of Mr. Justice Wightman rested chiefly on the highly technical point that the warrant only directed the taking of the plaintiff into custody, and not the keeping him and carrying him about, and in this particular he showed that it fell short of the warrants issued in the case of Sir F. Burdett, and the later case of the Stockdales. Mr. Justice Coleridge took a much wider and more comprehensive range, whilst Lord Denman agreed with both, and said that it was perfectly clear that a bad warrant could not be cured by other things. The warrant before the court showed no conclusion whatever as to the time of the imprisonment, and it would on other grounds, which was conceded, by demurrer, not justify the detention of the plaintiff. He judged of this warrant without reference to the power of the body from which it proceeded. However dignified that body, its proceedings ought to be regular. He showed no disrespect to the assembly which issued the warrant in applying to that warrant the same rules of legal construction which would be applicable if the warrant had issued from an ordinary justice of the peace in the lawful exercise of his magisterial functions. A justice of the peace was as absolute, within his jurisdiction, as any other authority whatever. The objections to the warrant here were not met by the plea, for the rules which governed the forms of warrants must be rigidly observed, and could not be dispensed with, nor their non-observance compensated for by allegations in pleading. The warrant was bad in form. Of course the House could not claim the privilege of issuing a bad warrant, and the only question for this court was, whether the warrant under which the officer had acted afforded him, in law, a justification for what he had done. In his opinion, it did not; and though the question proceeded on a matter of form alone, it should be remembered that matters of form often involved the most important liberties of the subject. The plaintiff must have the judgment of the court. Judgment accordingly for the plaintiff.—Exparte W. G. Ward. Mr. Kelly with whom was Mr. Luddlow moved for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue directed to the chancellor, masters and scholars of the University of Oxford, to command them to restore the Rev. W. G. Ward, late a fellow of Balliol College, to the degree of bachelor of arts and master of arts in the said University, of which degree he had been deprived by the House of Convocation of that University. The affidavits on which the motion was made stated that the applicant was matriculated in 1830, that he proceeded in 1834 to the degree of bachelor of arts, and in 1837 to that of master of arts, and subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and three articles in the 36th Canon, and continued to enjoy the said degrees until the month of February, 1845. In 1844 he published a book, called "The Ideal of a Christian Church Considered," to which the attention of the University was called, and the authorities there, after certain preliminary proceedings had been adopted, held a convocation upon the 13th of February last, and then, by two several resolutions, degraded the applicant from his degrees. He had since applied to the University to be allowed to exercise the rights which the degree of master of arts conferred upon him, and had been refused. He was, therefore, compelled to apply for this mandamus. The first ground on which this application rested was, that the applicant had not committed any offence which could lawfully justify the loss of his degree, according either to the laws of England or the statutes of the University. The next ground was, that even if it should appear that the publication of the book referred to was a violation of the statutes of the University, it was submitted that he was not punishable in the manner in which punishment had now been inflicted. But, thirdly, even if the publication of the book was punishable at the University, and if that punishment was degradation, still the applicant was not liable to that punishment until after he had been tried in the University, according to the proper forms in the court of the chancellor of the University. In this instance he had not had an opportunity of making his defence in any judicial proceeding, as the chancellor's court was the only place in the University where such proceedings could be held. By the arbitrary act of the convocation he had been, without any trial whatever, degraded from his degree, and deprived of all the rights and benefits thereto attached. In the first place, it was clear that the publication of this book was not any offence, and if it was, then it was cognizable as such in the chancellor's court. The proceeding by the convocation alone, without such preliminary trial, was illegal and void, and yet by such a proceeding the applicant had been deprived of a freehold interest—of a freehold interest of such a nature, that he was entitled to a mandamus to restore him to his rights. The University of Oxford was a corporation by prescription, and was confirmed as such by the authority of several statutes. The jurisdiction of the chancellor's court extended over matters of complaint arising within the University, and that jurisdiction was generally exercised by the vice-chancellor, and the offences over which the court had jurisdiction were defined by several statutes of the University. Among other things it was the duty of the judicial officers of the University to prevent heresy. Supposing the proceedings to take place in the regular and proper manner, and a sentence to be pronounced, that sentence might be carried into execution by the House of Convocation. But the sentence must first be legally pronounced. Here it had not been so pronounced, for the publication of this book was no offence at all within any of the University statutes. There were but three or four offences, in respect of which the offending party could be tried and punished: but with respect to all these, he must first be tried and convicted in the vice-chancellor's court, and from that court he might appeal to the House of Convocation; and if the sentence in each of these proceedings should be confirmed, the party might still go to the delegates: or, as the law now stood, to the Queen in council. In order to obtain the degree of bachelor of arts, the candidate must subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles, and three articles of the 36th Canon: and this was done under the authority of the Act of 1652. It was for inconsistency with these articles that the deprivation had passed against him. That statute, however, contained nothing like a definition of such a charge as had been made the cause of these proceedings. The four classes of offences which under the statutes were the subject of criminal proceedings, were—first, the refusal to be examiner, when lawfully called on; secondly, the having taken an oath as inceptor, to perform certain exercises, and then the refusing to obey the order to perform them: thirdly, the attempt to escape from an officer of the University; and, fourthly, the violation of the order to be observed in appealing from the vice-chancellor's court to a higher tribunal. The statutes showed that all that might be done by the chancellor in his court might also be done in the vice-chancellor's court, but, in order at all to justify the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court, the offence proceeded against must clearly be shown to be within that jurisdiction. Among the general powers of the vice-chancellor was that of preventing heresy. Now, here the applicant had subscribed the Articles of the Church when he first received his degrees, and, as he stated in his affidavit, he had not done anything in violation of that subscription. If a person was not consistent in maintaining the Thirty-nine Articles, he might be called upon again to subscribe them, and if, after being three times required to do so, he still refused, and was found so to have refused, he might be punished, but his punishment would be by exile, by banishment from the University, and not by degradation. In 1834 and 1837, the applicant subscribed these Articles; he might have changed his opinion since then, but if he had, or if he had done anything which was inconsistent with the Articles, he ought to have been called on again to subscribe the Articles, and had he then refused to do so, he might have been tried for the offence of refusal, and, on conviction, might have been banished from the University, but could not be degraded from his degree. As the case now stood, no offence had been committed which could be the subject of trial and punishment in the University, and the proceedings taken were not warranted by the statutes of the University. The learned counsel here referred to the statute de judiciis, and went at considerable length through the regulations made by that statute as to the mode of proceeding. With respect to proceedings for reformation of manners, the vice-chancellor was at liberty to proceed not only in the public court of the University, but at his private lodgings; but the statutes provided "that if any person should be convicted of any grave offence, the registrar or his deputy should be called in to reduce the charge, the evidence thereupon, and the defence and judgment into a formal act. This was for the purpose of appealing to the convocation. All this showed most distinctly that the House of Convocation, like the House of Lords, had not any jurisdiction, but was only a court of appeal to supervise the decision of the inferior tribunals of the University. The convocation was a deliberative assembly: it might make laws, or pass declaratory acts to explain them; or finally, as upon appeal from other tribunals, put an interpretation on those which already existed, but could not originally adjudicate on any case. It certainly had no right to decree privation of degrees on a charge for the first time brought before itself. The last head of explanation in the statute, on the powers of convocation, related to privation of degrees, and showed in the clearest and most distinct manner that such was the fact. It appeared that on the publication of Mr. Ward's book, a committee called the hebdomadal board, had been appointed. The proceedings of that committee were secret at first, or, at all events, they were exparte. On the 13th of December, 1844, a resolution was adopted, to the effect that the publication of Mr. Ward did not appear to the hebdomadal board to be consistent with the Thirty-nine Articles, and the three articles of the 36th Canon, or with Mr. Ward's signature to the same. A meeting of convocation was summoned; it did not appear that any notice or summons were served upon the applicant, but he attended the meeting of convocation, and a resolution was then proposed that his writings were inconsistent with his signature to the articles, and "with the good faith" of the applicant. Dr. Grant, a member of convocation, objected to this resolution, and proposed an amendment to avoid the effect of it, but it was rejected and the original resolution carried. That resolution amounted to a sentence of degradation. The convocation had no authority to do this. The publication of the applicant's book was not a violation of the University statutes, nor of the law of England. It was purely a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance. But, even supposing it to be an offence against these statutes, the only proper course would have been to send Mr. Ward before the vice-chancellor's court, and to subject him to a regular trial. After that he might, upon conviction, have been sentenced to whatever punishment the statutes allowed. But even the statutes would not have allowed the punishment now inflicted, for that punishment was only capable of being applied to a particular class of offences, of which this was not one. The act of convocation was illegal, and, therefore, void. The only remaining question was, whether this was a case in which the court would interfere by way of mandamus. There was no doubt it would do so. The rights belonging to the degree of master of arts were those of a freehold interest. The degree was necessary to qualify its possessor to take holy orders, to obtain certain advantages in the University, and to vote for the members sent to Parliament to represent the University. The case of the King v. The Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Cambridge, in Lord Raymond's reports, Dr. Bentley's case, showed that a mandamus would lie to restore a man to any academical degree to which temporal advantages were attached. The same principle was recognised in Dr. Frend's case. Lord Denman asked whether anything was said in the affidavits of the visitatorial power? Mr. Kelly answered in the affirmative. The existence of that power was denied in a case of this kind. Lord Denman: You may take a rule.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—The Murder in St. Giles's.—On Thursday Joseph Connor was tried for the murder of Mary Brothers, alias Tape, in George-street, St. Giles's, on the 31st March. The particulars of this case have been already given, and it is therefore sufficient to state that the jury, after nearly four hours' deliberation, found the prisoner Guilty, and Baron Alderson pronounced sentence of death, holding out no hope of mercy.—The Child Murder at Greenwich.—Martha Brixey, aged 18, was tried yesterday for the wilful murder of Robert Ffinch, infant son of Mr. J. R. Ffinch, solicitor, of Greenwich, and found Not Guilty, on the ground of insanity. The court intimated its concurrence in the propriety of the verdict. The prisoner was then removed from the bar, and will be imprisoned in some lunatic asylum during her Majesty's pleasure.

News of the Week.

THE MAYNOOTH BILL has been the chief topic of discussion in the House of Commons during the past week. On Monday, on the question for the third reading of the Bill, Mr. Ewart brought forward his amendment, declaring the inexpediency of extending the principle of state endowments of any religious denominations. The amendment was seconded by Mr. Marsland, but as no other member rose to speak upon it, Mr Ewart declined to go to a division, and withdrew the amendment. Mr. Bankes then moved his amendment, that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. Sir R. Inglis seconded it, and another debate ensued, during which the measure was argued at great length, both as regards the religious question which one party considers that it involves, and also as regards the question of state policy, which others consider as its most important feature. The debate lasted throughout the greater part of the sittings of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and at two o'clock on Thursday morning, after a remarkable speech from Sir R. Peel, in which he admitted, that in the present state of Ireland, even trial by jury could not be depended on, the House divided, and carried the third reading by 317 to 184. Mr. T. Duncombe then moved the addition of a clause limiting the operation of the Bill to three years; but this was negatived by 243 to 145, and the Bill was then read a third time and passed. On Monday, the Solicitor-General called attention to the recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench respecting the privileges of Parliament, and after some discussion on the position in which the House is placed by that judgment, a select committee was appointed to deliberate on the course to be adopted. On Tuesday Mr. B. Osborne brought forward a motion for inquiry into the revenues and management of Trinity College, Dublin, in connection with the question of academical education in Ireland; but it was opposed by Ministers, and negatived, on a division, by 82 to 53. In the House of Lords, on Monday, Lord Brougham brought forward nine Bills, for the purpose of remedying certain difficulties in the system of our civil and criminal jurisprudence, including important changes in the law of evidence, the law of marriage, and the law of debtor and creditor.—The new Government measure for establishing collegiate education in Ireland has not met with the cordial welcome from the Roman Catholic clergy which was given to the Maynooth Bill. Mr. O'Connell's disapproval of it is already known to our readers, and the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland, at their meeting on Wednesday, are understood to have resolved unanimously to give their unqualified opposition to the measure, as containing no provision for the religious instruction of the pupils, while, at the same time, they expressed their belief that it was proposed with the best intentions by the Government.

From France we learn, what has indeed been intimated almost officially by our own journals, that the Ministry has received the news of the conclusion of the negotiations between the Duke de Broglie and Dr. Washington. The principal stipulations of the convention that have been agreed to, are said to substitute for the right of search in its present form, the creation of two squadrons of English and French ships on the coast of Africa, to exercise an active and combined surveillance over the vessels of their respective nations, and the slave-markets held by the negro kings on different points of the coast. It is also said that M. Guizot is to present a Bill on this subject to the Chamber in a few days.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the infant royal family, left town for Claremont on Thursday. In the previous part of the week Her Majesty remained at Buckingham Palace, taking her usual daily airings in the Palace-gardens, and an occasional drive in an open carriage. Her Majesty visited the Italian Opera on Saturday and on Tuesday; and on Monday gave a state ball at Buckingham Palace, which was more numerously attended than any former ball given by Her Majesty, nearly 2000 invitations having been issued. The ball was opened by a quadrille, in which Her Majesty danced with Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar; Prince Albert and the Countess of Dietrichstein, the Austrian ambassadress, formed the opposite couple. On Wednesday the Queen held a Court at Buckingham Palace, for the reception of an Address on the throne from the corporation of Dublin, to which we have referred at length in our Irish news. Her Majesty will hold a drawing-room, at St. James's, on Tuesday the 27th inst. Rumours are current that Her Majesty will visit Paris and the North of Germany this summer, and letters from St. Petersburgh, under date 30th ult., state that Prince Albert is expected in that capital in the course of the summer, to return the visit of the Emperor to Her Majesty last year. The Prince, it is said, will be accompanied by Prince George of Cambridge, ostensibly to be present with him at the series of reviews to take place according to annual custom; but also, it was said at Court, with a regard to the possibility of a matrimonial alliance with the Imperial Grand Duchess Olga.—Prince Albert presided at a meeting of the Fine Arts Commission on Friday; dined at Goldsmiths'-hall on Saturday, and at Fishmongers'-hall on Wednesday.—The Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz left town on Monday for the Continent.—The Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden proceeded last week to Alton Towers, on a visit to the Earl of Shrewsbury, and returned to town on Monday.—The Countess of Mount Edgecumbe has succeeded the Marchioness of Douro as Lady in Waiting, and Lord Byron has succeeded Viscount Sydney as the Lord in Waiting to Her Majesty.

Penny Postage.—The finance accounts just published show a large increase in the revenue of the Post-office. The gross revenue for the year 1844 was 1,705,067*l.*, giving an increase of more than 84,000*l.* as compared with 1843; the net revenue was 719,957*l.*, giving an increase of nearly 80,000*l.* as compared with 1843. The apparent increase in 1844, taking the Post-office returns for 1843 as the standard of comparison, is, in each case, more than double the amount here given; but as was stated at the time, those returns gave the revenue both gross and net too low by about 85,000*l.* The actual increase of net revenue in 1844 is greater than for any year since the war, except 1825, when it was 92,000*l.*; and 1836, when it was 81,000*l.* From 1840 (the first year of penny postage) to 1844, the increase of net revenue is nearly 50 per cent.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The protracted debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the Northern Railroad Bill is the chief topic in the Paris papers, and it is interesting to the English reader on account of the importance of this line to communication with this country. The Chamber on Thursday decided that the line from Lille towards Hazebruck should pass by Armentiéres, and as close as possible to Bailleul. This line was proposed by the committee, as an amendment on the article of the Bill which allowed the Government the faculty of deciding, at a later period, on the direction to be taken. A somewhat similar point was discussed on the course to be adopted for the Creil and St. Quentin line, between the latter town and Noyon. The Bill also set forth that the Government should hereafter decide on the course to be taken between these two places; but the committee proposed to take the line by the town of Ham. The Chamber decided differently in this case, and rejected the amendment by a very large majority. On Monday M. Roger developed the amendment, in which he and his colleagues of the Departments of the North and the Pas de Calais, had recommended the establishment of an embranchment between Fampoux, near Arras, and Hazebruck, which would place the harbours of Calais and Dunkirk in direct communication with Paris and the centre of France. M. Muret de Bord contended, in the name of the committee, that the branch in question would be of little use, and might injure the main road. M. Billault supported the amendment, on the ground that it would be of the greatest utility in accelerating the communication between Paris and Dunkirk, in the event of a war with England. The Minister of Public Works, who spoke next, proposed the adjournment of the question, and maintained that if the embranchment was imposed on the company, or conceded to another, it would render the adjudication on the northern line very difficult. The Chamber, however, after hearing Messrs. Berryer and Vivien in defence of the amendment, voted the embranchment by a very large majority. M. Garnier Pagès next rose, and addressed some questions to Ministers respecting a proposition made to Government by a Parisian banker, relative to the construction of three of the principal railroad lines. He understood, he said, that M. Ganneron had offered to lend the State, at a yearly interest of 3½ per cent., a sum of 700,000,000f. to enable it to construct, 1st, the railroads from Paris to Lyons, and from Lyons to Avignon; 2d, that from Paris to Strasburg; and 3d, the line from Paris to the Belgian frontier. Those propositions, in his opinion, were extremely advantageous, inasmuch as they permitted the Government to retain possession of those important lines, and he strongly recommended their adoption. The Minister of Finance said that he considered the terms enormous, and that he had too good an opinion of the credit of France to think it necessary to accept a loan on such terms. He had, therefore, no hesitation, on the part of the Goverment, in declining the proposition. The further discussion of the Bill was then adjourned to Tuesday, when the discussion on the duration of the concession was commenced, and after several divisions on amendments, the period of 41 years was adopted for the main line, and that of 75 years for branches.—The Bill for arming the fortifications of Paris, and several other Bills which have already passed the Chamber of Deputies, have been presented in the Chamber of Peers.—The Débats occupies several columns with a letter from M. Charles Dunoyer, against the conversion of the Five per Cents. The subject has, however, lost much of its interest; for notwithstanding the resolution of the Chamber of Deputies in favour of the conversion, it is known that the Ministry is determined not to proceed with that measure during the present session; and the committee appointed by the Chamber of Peers to consider the question has already come to a resolution that the present is not a proper time to proceed with the measure. Count Roy has been appointed to draw up the report of the committee of the Chamber of Peers, and it was expected it would be laid before the House on Wednesday.—The Constitutionnel mentions as a report that "the Government is preparing a bill for presentation to the Chambers, at the opening of the next session, on the subject of postal reform. A uniform rate of postage of 25c. will be fixed for the whole kingdom."—It is rumoured in Paris that the Ministry have received from the Duc de Broglie accounts of the negotiations respecting the right of search, with which it expresses itself entirely satisfied. The English Cabinet is understood to have acceded to everything proposed by the French diplomatist. The right of search is to be abolished, and a fleet composed of English and French ships of war, and some Government steamers, is to cruise continually on the coast of Africa, to prevent the trade in slaves. The cases for condemnation which may arise are to be decided conjointly by the commanders of both fleets. It is also stated that a Cabinet Council has already been held upon this question, at which it was resolved that a bill should be presented during the present session demanding a grant of money for the establishment of the fleet on the coast of Africa, in pursuance of the convention. M. Guizot, it is said, will endeavour to present the bill, as he is anxious to have his full share of credit in the success of the negotiation. The King and royal family were in perfect health. M. Guizot was expected to be able to return to business in a few days. It was still rumoured, and rather generally expected, that her Majesty Queen Victoria will visit the King and Queen of the French at St. Cloud in the course of the present summer. The Prince de Montfort, youngest son of Jerome Bonaparte, had arrived at Paris, and was lodging at the hotel of Count Demidoff, his brother-in-law. The Prince de Montfort is a handsome young man, bearing the strongest resemblance to the Napoleon family. He has been permitted to reside three months in Paris. Vice-Admiral Count Willaumez, one of the most distinguished officers of the empire, and the senior Admiral of the French navy, died at Suresnes, near Paris, on the 17th inst.

SPAIN.—We have accounts from Madrid of the 13th instant. The business before the Chambers is drawing rapidly to a close, and it was thought the Congress would only meet once more for the despatch of business before the royal sitting for the prorogation of the Chambers. On the 13th both Chambers met, and several bills were advanced a stage in the Senate. The business in the Congress was merely routine. The Government has received the ratification of a treaty of commerce between Spain and Morocco. The Government papers at length announce the arrival of despatches from M. Castello y Ayenze, dated Rome, 28th April, announcing that the concordat was signed on the 27th. The concordat acknowledges the title of Isabella II. as legitimate Queen of Spain, and the validity of the sale of the national property. The Castellano says that it is probable Prussia and Austria, and perhaps Russia, will follow the example of the Pope, and give a formal recognition to the throne of Isabella II. It founds this opinion simply on some articles which have appeared in the French and German newspapers, and upon the fact of the Queen of Portugal having been recognised by Russia. The Intendant of the Royal Household has left Madrid to make the necessary preparations on the road for the Queen's journey to Barcelona. It is said that from Barcelona Her Majesty will visit the Basque Provinces, and especially the cities of Saragossa and Pampeluna. A flight of locusts, which have created so much destruction in Morocco and part of the Algerine territory as to create some apprehensions of a famine, have shown themselves in the neighbourhood of Ciudad Real, where they are committing great ravages.

GERMANY.—A letter from Coburg, dated May 11, in the Manheim Journal, states that an English courier had just arrived with the intelligence that Queen Victoria was to arrive on a visit to Prince Albert's august relatives in the course of the month of June. The letter added that preparations had already been commenced at the Court for Her Majesty's reception Letters from East Germany speak of political disturbances of a somewhat alarming character having occurred in that part of Europe. It appears that in one or two of the principal towns conspiracies have been hatched against the existing authorities of Prussia, a result, it may be supposed, of the general distress produced by the extreme severity and long-continuance of the winter. Insane cries of "Down with the King," "Down with the Government," amidst other disloyal ebullitions of popular clamour, were lately raised, the infatuated multitudes raising them fancying that the deposition of the Sovereign and the Ministry, and an extension of political liberty, might prove an antidote to the calamities caused by the vicissitudes of the seasons. Konigsberg is said to have been the city more particularly subject to the prevalence of this spirit of disaffection.—The Presse announces the death, on the 12th inst., at Bonn, of M. von Schlegel, the founder of what is called the romantic school of German literature, a school which includes amongst its members Werner and Novalis, and of whom the only representative who now remains is Ludwig Tieck. The dramatic criticism of M. Schlegel will ever be highly estimated; and he rendered real service to German literature by familiarising it with Shakspeare.—We learn from Munich that the order of 1844 of some of the German States, declaring that Protestant soldiers should be no longer compelled to do military honours on the occasion of the passing of the host, has been put in force in Bavaria.

SWITZERLAND.—The Zurich papers state that the case of Dr. Steiger was heard by the Superior Tribunal at Lucerne on the 17th. Dr. Steiger made an eloquent defence, but the tribunal confirmed the sentence of death that had been pronounced upon him by a majority of 7 judges to 3. A letter of previous date states that the Lucerne Government has intimated to the Vorort that it is disposed to deal mercifully with the prisoners condemned for their share in the late events, and especially to spare the life of Dr. Steiger, on condition that he shall be transported from Europe to America. The Vorort has addressed a note to the French Government upon the subject, and has proposed that it should undertake the office of conveying the prisoners to the new world, as the only means by which the lives of the unhappy prisoners can be saved. The French cabinet has just sent an answer to this request It expresses its regret at the disturbances which have recently taken place in Switzerland, and strongly recommends that a merciful course should be taken by the Lucerne Government; but it declines constituting France the gens d'arme of Switzerland, for the purpose of sending its convicts into transportation. Nevertheless, the French Government is willing, should Dr. Steiger and the other convicts themselves request to be transported to America, to allow them a passage on board a French man-of-war, where they will be treated, however, not as prisoners, but as guests. The Government of the Canton of the Valais has just sentenced Dr. Barmann, who took a leading part in the disturbances there, to deprivation of civil rights for two years, a fine of 150f., and the costs of the prosecution. A similar sentence has been pronounced upon M. Torrent.

TURKEY.—Letters from Constantinople, of the 30th ult, state that the Greek Government, or those acting under its authority, have wantonly invaded a portion of the Turkish dominions, and that the consequence has been a collision between the troops of the two countries, in which several men were killed on both sides, and that the Porte had immediately addressed a strong note on the subject to the Cabinet of Athens. They also state that the Greek Patriarch at Constantinople has resigned, to avoid a threatened dismissal. He was accused by some of his countrymen of being a partizan of, and under the influence of Russia, an accusation which is contradicted by his friends.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The Times of yesterday, in a second edition, published the following intelligence from Bombay to the 5th April; Calcutta, 7th; and Madras, the 14th:—Sir C. Napier's expedition against the Pindarees has been crowned with complete success. Bejar Khan, their leader, and a considerable part of his followers, have been captured. The Punjaub remains in a very unsettled state. The Khalsa troops have come to an arrangement with Goolab Singh, who is to pay them 36 lacs of rupees. Phond Savant and his confederates continue to find sanctuary in the Goa territories. The Portuguese Governor still refuses to allow our troops to follow the rebels within his frontier, and is unable, even if he were willing, to drive out the fugitives. The measures for concentrating a body of troops on the north-west frontier of the Sutlej are nearly completed. Sir H. Hardinge will visit the Upper Provinces during the year. Cholera is prevalent in Calcutta, but is not of a nature to create more than customary alarm.—From China there is no news of interest. A report is current that Aden has been surprised and captured, but no reliance can be placed on a report which has become proverbial by its frequency.—The court-martial on Colonel Wallace had not commenced sitting when the last accounts were received from Belgaum. Colonel Mosely has submitted a memorial to the Court of Directors, praying for restoration to the service, which will most likely be granted when the important fact made known by the Englishman, that the native witnesses examined at his court-martial were not sworn, comes to the knowledge of the Court.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—After the business noticed in our last, Lord BROUGHAM gave notice that he should, on Monday, present several Bills to the House, which had been most carefully prepared, for the purpose of remedying many great difficulties in the system of our civil and criminal jurisprudence.—Lord LILFORD gave notice of his intention to introduce a Bill to remedy the defects of the Arbitration Acts.—On the motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, the High Constables Bill, and the Turnpike Act (Scotland) Bill, were read a second time.

Monday.—The Public Museums Bill passed through committee.—Earl FITZWILLIAM gave notice that on Friday he should move for a select committee for the purpose of considering whether some further means should not be taken for the protection of those landowners whose land might be intersected by railway companies.—A great many petitions were presented against the proposed grant to Maynooth.—Lord BROUGHAM brought forward his Bills for the amendment of the jurisprudence of the country. In the early part of his speech his lordship paid a high compliment to the members of the two Law Commissions, which, 17 years back, had taken the lead in promoting law reform, and to those who had followed in their steps. But though much had been done, much still remained to do; and he proceeded to state a few cases in which the law was still defective. The noble Lord began by commenting at great length on the state of the law of real property, and proposed a bill for facilitating its conveyance, one for facilitating the granting of leases, and one to render the assignment of satisfied terms unnecessary. His Lordship next passed to the law of evidence, in which great and salutary reforms might be made; and proposed a bill to enable parties to be examined on the trial of civil actions, and another to facilitate the admission in evidence of certain official and other documents. The noble Lord also proposed a bill to give a remedy by way of declaratory suits, and one to further the administration of criminal justice. His Lordship proceeded to point out that the law of marriage was in a most confused state: that an act consisting of three lines, passed last session, only rendered this confusion worse confounded; and proposed to bring in a bill for amending and declaring this part of the law. His Lordship concluded by calling the attention of the House to the state of the law of debtor and creditor. Now that imprisonment for debt was abolished, he thought the Houses of Parliament should give up the privilege of not paying their debts. Why should Members of Parliament be the only persons in the empire exempted from satisfying the just demands of their creditors? He should bring in a bill making them liable to pay their debts out of their property, and subjecting them to punishment if they fraudulently made away with it. He should call this bill an act for securing the real independence of Parliament. He trusted he should see these measures pass, along with the General Registry Act, that for amending the criminal, and that for digesting the civil code. Could he see all this effected, he should rest happy and contented from his labours.—After a few remarks from Lord CAMPBELL, the bills, nine in number, were laid on the table and read a first time.

Tuesday.—The royal assent was given by commission to the Exchequer Bills Bill, and some private Bills.—A petition, presented by Lord CAMPBELL, complaining of the operation of the Game Laws, gave rise to a conversation on the subject, in the course of which Lord DACRE announced that he had a Bill prepared, with the object of mitigating some of the evils arising from those laws, but until the decision of the committee of the House of Commons, now sitting, should be made known, he hesitated, as a matter of courtesy, to lay the Bill on their lordships' table.—Lord HATHERTON suggested that hares should be put on the same footing as rabbits, and that the law relative to pheasants and partridges should remain as at present.—The Earl of STRADBROKE said, if this suggestion were acted on, hares would soon be extirpated out of the country.—The Marquis of NORMANDY presented a petition from the churchwardens of Wokingham, complaining of the conduct of the Dean of Salisbury and his lessee in not providing for the necessary repairs of the church of that parish, of which the Dean was rector, patron, and ordinary. After commenting at some length on the hardship of the case, his lordship moved that the petition should lie on the table.—The Duke of RICHMOND presented 127 petitions from parishes in Devonshire, complaining of agricultural distress. His Grace expressed his regret, in presenting these petitions, that there did not appear to be any prospect of the petitioners' just claims being attended to.

Thursday.—Lord BEAUMONT moved for certain papers connected with the state of affairs in Greece. He complained that the real interests of the country were lost sight of in party quarrels, and that not content with internal strife, the Government had allowed its troops to make incursions across the Turkish frontier. The noble Lord then proceeded to describe the position of the three parties into which Greece was divided, and quoted passages from Lord Aberdeen's despatches to Sir E. Lyons, from which he tried to prove, that from the principles there laid down the British Government was bound to interfere in the affairs of Greece. He concluded by moving for a continuation of all the correspondence between Lord Aberdeen, Sir S. Canning, and Sir E. Lyons, on the subject.—Lord ABERDEEN said, that from the notice given by Lord Beaumont, it was hard to say what object he had in view. He begged to assure him that he was quite in error in supposing the marauders on the Turkish borders to be Greek troops; they were, in fact, a band of two dozen robbers, who had crossed the frontier, robbed a house, and killed two people. This was the invasion which the noble lord called on the three Powers to unite in repressing. It was true that the Turkish Government was incensed at incendiary proclamations printed in Greek newspapers, but, as the press in Greece was free, the Government could not prevent such publications. In regard to the sketch drawn by the noble lord of the internal affairs of that country, the state of things might be lamentable, but if King Otho chose to have a bad Minister, the British Government could not be expected to interfere in the matter. The noble lord went on to deny that British interests were sacrificed in Greece, and concluded by refusing to produce papers which in fact did not exist, for a short account of the robberies he had mentioned was the only document in his possession which at all answered to the information demanded by Lord Beaumont. The motion was then withdrawn.—The LORD CHANCELLOR then moved the second reading of the Charitable Bequests Bill. In 1818 a commission had been appointed to inquire into the charitable trusts in England and Wales, which had been renewed at various times till the year 1837. It had discharged its duties with the utmost ability, and its reports contained a digest of all information that could be brought to bear on the subject; but, having only powers of inquiry, no practical result had as yet followed from its labours. The present measure was intended to remedy the abuses which had been detected in the superintendence over charitable trusts. At present the Court of Chancery was the only tribunal which took cognizance of breaches of trust, but, though eminently fitted for fulfilling this office in the case of large endowments, the machinery of the court was inapplicable to small charities. There were, he said, not less than 21,000 charities in this country possessed of incomes of under 20*l.* a year, and above 25,000 possessed of incomes under 50*l.*; and to these the cost of Chancery proceedings amounted to extinction of the funds. He proposed, therefore, the constitution of a court of three commissioners to whom the control of charities under 20*l.* a year, at least, should be given, although he was strongly inclined to recommend that their jurisdiction should be extended over charities of 50*l.* a year. He proposed that this jurisdiction should be a summary one, otherwise little benefit would accrue to the [illegible] power which he proposed to give to the [illegible] call to account the trustees of these charities—to correct any abuses they detected in them, and to [illegible] cation of funds; likewise, to appoint new trustees—to order the sale of the property—to order an exchange of property—to grant leases—building leases and [illegible] in fact to perform all those administrative duties which fell within the power of the Court of Chancery. He proposed that the jurisdiction of the commissioners should not be entirely confined to the small charities that it should also be extended to the large charities; but, as to the large charities, that its jurisdiction should be very limited. He recommended that they should have the power to call for an account of the expenditure and revenue of the large charities, not that they should have the power to correct them, but that if any abuse existed the Attorney General should be applied to by motion, and the Court of Chancery applied to. He proposed that the commissioners should have the power to appoint the trustees of municipal charities. The first three commissioners he proposed to name in the Bill at a fixed salary, and that their successors should be appointed by the Crown during good behaviour. The expense of the new tribunal he proposed to be provided for by a tax of one per cent. on the charitable funds, and, should that prove insufficient, to obtain any deficiency from the consolidated fund.—Lord [illegible] agreed with the general plan proposed, and should give his support to the second reading; but at the same time he suggested that the Bill should be referred to a select committee for consideration in all its details.—Lord COTTENHAM also recommended a reference of the Bill to a select committee.—Lord [illegible] objected to the power proposed to be given to the Crown of nominating the trustees of municipal charities.—The Bill was read a second time, and was ordered to be referred to a select committee.

Friday.—The Earl of RODEN gave notice that on the motion for reading the Maynooth Bill a second time he should move an amendment that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the tenets and books taught at the College of Maynooth, and that the Bill be referred to that committee.—The Duke of WELLINGTON then rose and moved that the Bill be read a first time, which was agreed to. His Grace then gave notice that he should move the second reading of the Bill on Monday the 2d of June.—Lord BROUGHAM said that the Debtor and Creditor Committee had come to an unanimous opinion upon the important subject which had been referred to them, and had requested him to bring their report, together with the evidence, before the House. They desired him to report a Bill for remedying the evils complained of, and he had now great pleasure in laying on the table a Bill for better securing the payment of small debts. The Bill was then read a first time.—The Earl of CHARLEVILLE complained of the short interval which was to elapse before the second reading of the Maynooth Bill, and trusted that at least it would be postponed till the 9th.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said the Bill had now been more than a month under the consideration of Parliament, and he should not be doing his duty if he did not persist in proposing the second reading on the 2d of June.—[Left sitting.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—After the business reported in our last, Capt. BERKELEY called the attention of the House to the present system of manning Her Majesty's Navy, and the difficulty of obtaining able seamen for her service. This he did in a speech of considerable length, entering copiously into professional details, in order to show that by the present system there was no opportunity for the training of able seamen in such a way as to secure their services for any emergency that might arise, and that the navy was gradually deteriorating [illegible] characteristics as the main defence and power of this country.—Sir G. COCKBURN briefly defended the Admiralty. During the war there were many ships very indifferently manned, yet the results were almost invariably favourable to the character of the naval service, and he saw no reason now to apprehend that otherwise, though, in a time of profound peace, we did not maintain a large and powerful fleet. The character of the navy was rising; the seamen were less under the power and [illegible] "crimps;" and the supply, through the medium of the merchant service, was adequate to any demand that might arise. Mr. SOMES said we had 172,786 seamen in 1814, and at least two-thirds of that number were able seamen. At present we had 214,750 seamen, being an increase of about 42,000.—Capt. PECHELL believed our navy was overmanned.—Capt. BERKELEY contended to be quite the reverse, and Sir C. NAPIER criticised the system of naval armaments, and in answer to a charge that he was often fond of finding fault, he said that if he had not been so ready to find fault he might now be the commander of the Channel squadron. It had been almost directly offered to him, and had even been asked what ship he would wish to take. At the same time it was said to him that he was too much of a party man.—Lord PALMERSTON then rose, and after recapitulating the various treaties which had been effected by the late Government with a view to the suppression of the slave-trade, criticised the conduct of the present administration, which since its accession to office, had not concluded even one. On the contrary its indecision and supineness was the main cause of the refusal of France to sign the last treaty with that country, which had been brought to the point of formal termination: and they had lost the opportunity of obtaining the adhesion of Belgium, Hanover, and Greece to that great international law for the suppression of the slave-trade, the creation of which had been one of the chief objects of the foreign policy of this country. He presumed that they would be early informed of the result of the labours of the two commissioners, now engaged in devising a substitute for the right of search: but if rumour were correct, they were going to recommend a course similar to that adopted by the late Government, destroying the barracoons and [illegible] which the present Government had been so eager to disavow and condemn. By the treaty, or "capitulation" as it was called, the Government had undone what had previously been done. Their negotiations with the Brazils had resulted in failure because in order to maintain the sugar monopoly they had made inadmissable propositions: and if we abandoned the right of search with France, on what principle could we maintain it with other countries? He urged on the Government the importance of devoting more attention to the great question which he had brought under their attention.—Sir R. PEEL regretted these repeated speeches, not raised on any definite motion on which the House could come to a decision. The noble lord had done now what he had done on former occasions—he had given a warm and merited eulogium on himself. He admired Lord Palmerston's merits, on the ground of his [illegible] ertions to effect the suppression of the slave trade. The noble lord seemed to think that they were not recognised by the House and the country, and it was [illegible] down about once a month to proclaim them. If papers had been laid on the table of the House it would be seen that the present Government had not been supine on the subject of the slave trade. He [illegible] tion in which the Brazilian negotiations now stood [illegible] refusal of France to ratify the treaty of 1831 [illegible] which was excited by the Syrian war; and [illegible] that the Palmerstons of Congress were in the habit [illegible] the treaty of Washington a "capitulation," and, like [illegible] lord, of censuring the Government of their country [illegible] made it. This country was bound in duty to [illegible] for the suppression of the slave trade, disgraceful [illegible]

...ly civilised country engaged in it; but the best mode of effecting it was not by an assumption of authority on our part, unrestrained by engagements, or at variance with the law of nations.—After a few remarks from Mr. P. HOWARD, the House went into committee of supply, and several votes of the navy estimates were agreed to. The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland No. 2) Bill was read a third time.

Monday.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL called attention to the present state of the action at law of Howard against the Serjeant-at-Arms, as resulting from the recent decision of the judges in the case, and moved for a select committee (following the precedent of 1839) to which shall be referred copies of the short-hand writer's notes of the judges' decisions, the arguments, &c., with a view to their arriving speedily at some deliberate determination as to the course which should be adopted.—Lord HOWICK could not help expressing his deep regret that so soon should be realised Sir T. Wilde's predictions as to the weak and pusillanimous course which they had been induced to adopt. Step by step they would find that they held their privileges at the mercy of the courts of law.—Sir R. INGLIS protested against this language. The House had manifested a becoming deference to the courts of law. If they were to enter into a struggle with them, let them show their courage by bringing the Lord Chief Justice to the bar, instead of trying their power on mere Ministerial officers, as sheriffs.—The motion was then agreed to.—On the question for the third reading of the Maynooth Endowment Bill, Mr. EWART brought forward, as an amendment, "That while it is expedient to open all the public educational establishments of Ireland to the Catholics, to reduce to its due dimensions the Irish Church, and to establish civil and religious equality between Great Britain and Ireland, it is not advisable to extend the principle of making any religious denomination endowed by and dependant on the state."—Mr. MARSLAND seconded the amendment, protesting against the increase of religious establishments, while such an anomaly existed as the wealthy Protestant Church of Ireland in the midst of a Catholic and impoverished population, to whom he was desirous of seeing ample justice done. No other member rising to speak to the amendment, a division was called for; but Mr. EWART declined to go to a division, and the amendment was therefore withdrawn.—Mr. BANKES then moved that the Bill be read this day six months. He took a review of the decisions to which the House had come upon all the previous stages of this Bill, for the purpose of showing that the majority of its members was not a fair representation of the wishes of the majority of their constituents upon this subject. He complained of the manner in which the Home Secretary had introduced the name of Her Majesty into this discussion, and said that he knew of but one other case in which the name of the Sovereign had been similarly introduced by a Minister of the Crown to influence the debates of the House of Commons. In that case it was introduced to forward the wishes of the people; in the present it was introduced to counteract them. He considered the introduction of the Sovereign's name in the former case to have been most injurious to the constitution; but he apprehended that the introduction of it into the present case would prove most injurious to the Crown. He then animadverted with some smartness on Mr. Ward's tactics in postponing his motion for taking the funds for defraying the increased grant to the College of Maynooth out of the property of the Irish Church until after the second reading of the Bill, and observed, that if Mr. Ward had not run away from the "sham fight" which he then threatened, in pursuance of the advice of that Nestor of the House, Mr. Hume, whom everybody consulted when in difficulty, he would have thrown his Ministerial friends into inextricable confusion, and would have totally defeated their Bill almost at its very outset. In reply to Sir R. Peel's observation, that he had sent this Bill as a messenger of peace to Ireland, he asked—How had the messenger returned? Had he returned with the olive-branch of peace in his mouth, or with the letters of Bishop Higgins and John of Tuam under his wing, filled with invectives against England which he would not disgust the House by reading? He regretted the manner in which this measure had been received in Ireland; for if it should unfortunately be passed, the pain which he should feel would be aggravated by the certainty that it would not give to Ireland that peace which was hoped for from this most dangerous concession—a concession inevitably leading to angry annual discussions for another still more important one, which would never be discontinued until the appropriation of the property of the Irish Protestant Church was settled in a way which he was certain that that House would never sanction. He read a long extract from a pamphlet written in 1799 by Dr. Duigenan, for the purpose of showing that the College of Maynooth was originally instituted to remove a disability which then pressed upon the Roman Catholics, who could not hold land for educational purposes without incurring the liability of its forfeiture, and that no idea was then entertained of instituting it as a preliminary step to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. He regretted that such an idea was now entertained, as it was inconsistent with the safety of our free Protestant constitution. He then attacked the principles on which the College of Maynooth had been originally founded, and was even now governed, and impugned the system of keeping it up as a seminary for the exclusive education of the Roman Catholic priesthood. Mr. Gladstone had said that we could not resist the increase of this grant upon religious grounds. If that were so, how could we resist upon religious grounds the succession of a Roman Catholic successor to the throne of these realms? In conclusion he told the Ministers that though they might beat the opponents of this measure in Parliament, they would find it impossible to beat them upon it in the country. He parodied the language of the Irish to the English soldiers after the battle of the Boyne, and announced to Ministers his readiness to fight this battle over again if they would only consent to change the Parliament. Ministers had now got both the red king and the white king on their side; but if he had a new Parliament, he would venture to say that with his pawns he would be able to give check to their kings in the very first week of its first session. He repeated, that the voice of the people of England was against Sir R. Peel and his measures; and since to beseech him was useless, he now, in the name of that people, defied him to dissolve the Parliament.—Sir R. INGLIS seconded the amendment.—Mr. M'GEACHY declared his intention of voting in favour of the third reading of this Bill, because he considered it, not as an act of concession or conciliation—words which he could wish to banish from the English language, if with them he could banish the policy which they denoted—but as an act of full and spontaneous justice towards Ireland, founded on humane and truly Christian principles. He contended that Mr. Bankes had greatly overrated the hostility of the people of England against this Bill. The agitation against it was not spontaneous, if it were true that 10,000 circulars had been issued by the Anti-Maynooth Committee in one week in order to procure petitions against it. He commented with great indignation on another circular, issued by the Executive Council of the same body for the purpose of influencing the votes of Members of Parliament—a document in which the writers spoke with great uncharitableness of the Roman Catholic religion and its professors, and in which there was a great assumption of honesty for themselves, and a still greater imputation of dishonesty cast upon their opponents. He showed that the Dissenters who were parties to that circular had spoken, only a year ago, when the Education Bill was before Parliament, with quite as much acrimony of the bishops of the Church of England, as they now spoke of the clergy of the Church of Rome. The successor of the celebrated Robert Peal, of Leicester, had said that he would as soon intrust his children to the care of a Polish bear or to the protection of a lioness as to the tender mercies of the English bishops: and one of his colleagues had declared that the cause of religious freedom and education had no bitterer foes than the clergy of the Church of England. The hon. member then entered into a general defence of the measure, contending that the regeneration of the people of Ireland must be accomplished through the agency of ministers of their own faith, rather than under the auspices of any general or district boards of education. He called upon Irish members to recollect themselves, and to impress it upon their fellow-countrymen that it was not English tyranny but Irish agitation that was the main impediment at present to the improvement of Ireland.—Mr. MANGLES and Mr. ESCOTT followed, in support of the Bill.—Mr. SPOONER, reiterating his former argument, that it was not a question of money, but of principle, quoted the words of the 31st article of the English Church, designating some of the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church as "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits." He argued the question as a religious one, and cited passages from the Maynooth text-books, to prove their questionable morality.—Mr. C. BULLER had, on a former occasion, advised Mr. Wyse not to quote Luther, as he was sure to bring down a whole library of theology on his head. He regretted that Mr. Spooner should have now, for the second time, flung in the face of his Roman Catholic brethren the words "awful delusion," and should have picked out the most offensive passages from the Thirty-nine Articles, and other works, in order to wound their feelings. If there were any "awful delusion" in the case, it appeared to him to be on the part of Mr. Spooner. He viewed the present Bill not as an isolated measure, but, in connection with the Bill for academical education, as one which should receive the support of every friend to the union between the two countries. While all the more intelligent portion of the country were acknowledging their obligations to Sir R. Peel for his attempts to pacify Ireland, he hoped that their gratitude would not forget those who had sacrificed office to their principles, and now felt it their duty to support a Government which had supplanted them, when they found it pursuing the course which they considered to be right. The policy of the Melbourne Government had extinguished the Repeal agitation, because the Irish people felt confidence in it; a similar result would follow a similar course, framed not as acts of conciliation, but of justice. It was true, that in advocating the Bill on its introduction, Sir R. Peel had introduced certain awkward metaphors; but the Nemesis who presided over their debates had amply avenged the insult. The newly-elected member for Peebleshire had taken up the "small black cloud, no bigger than a man's hand;" and the first Lord of the Treasury had been punished in the last. They all knew, however, that the Maynooth Bill had nothing more than a metaphorical connection with the "black cloud;" and he trusted that the Government would persevere in measures calculated to improve the material condition of Ireland, and to render it the glory and security of this country, instead of being its weakness and shame.—Sir V. BLAKE spoke from the Ministerial side of the House, in support of the Bill.—Lord INGESTRE said he had always voted against the Maynooth grant, because he thought it too small; but he was now ready to vote for the increased grant, because he thought it enough. He had no hesitation, however, in saying that had the increased grant been proposed by gentlemen opposite, he should have voted against it. But he was desirous that the grant should be limited to five or seven years, and that a more effectual supervision over Maynooth should be established.—The adjournment of the debate was here moved, which, after some discussion, was agreed to.—The Banking (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.—Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he should move the second reading of the Irish Colleges Bill on Friday next.—Sir T. FREMANTLE obtained leave to bring in a Bill for establishing a central asylum for criminal lunatics, and to amend the Acts relating to lunatic asylums in Ireland.

Tuesday.—Some Railway Bills were advanced, and the Grand Junction Railway Bill was thrown out by 206 against 72.—Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE gave notice that, upon going into committee on the Irish Colleges Bill, he would move, in order to give more efficiency to university education in Ireland, that the professors and teachers in such colleges should not have any immediate connection with endowed ecclesiastical colleges.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD gave notice that, on the motion for continuing the vote of money for the Protestant professors of the Presbyterian College of Belfast, or a grant to professors of theology of any other denomination, he would move that such motion be rejected.—Mr. FERRAND questioned Government as to their intentions with respect to the intended monster-meeting on Tara-hill.—Sir J. GRAHAM replied that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had received directions that the peace of Ireland should be preserved according to the existing laws.—The select committee on the privilege question, arising out of the case of Howard v. Gossett, was nominated after a short discussion.—Mr. B. OSBORNE moved for a return of all moneys derived from rents of college lands, endowments, bequests, fees on matriculations, and taking of degrees, specifying the amount of income paid therefrom to the senior and junior fellows, professors, scholars, and other officers of Trinity College, Dublin.—The motion was opposed by Sir T. FREMANTLE, Sir R. INGLIS, and Mr. SHAW, on the ground that, as Oxford and Cambridge Universities had been specially exempted from inquiry by Parliament, Trinity College, Dublin, should also be unmolested. The property of the College being, in a great measure, private property, it would not be expedient for the House to investigate it.—Mr. SHEIL said that the property of Trinity College consisted of a certain endowment by Bishop Thomas Baldwin, and a grant made by Elizabeth of the lands of the Earl of Desmond, which had been confiscated to the Crown. These lands lay principally in the county of Kerry, and they amounted to some hundred thousand acres. There were seven senior fellows, whose offices were nearly sinecures, in possession of 14,000*l.* a year between them. That much was known; but they did not know how the rest of the funds were disposed of.—Sir R. PEEL said the House was not prepared for discussing the question, and he had not expected it would have been brought forward. However, he was ready to vote against the motion.—Lord J. RUSSELL said he should vote for the motion. They were called on to vote away the taxes for the purposes of promoting education in Ireland, and it was stated by a member of that House that seven professors of Trinity College, Dublin, enjoyed between them no less than 14,000*l.* a year. He did think that these were circumstances under which the House should call for information, and if it did appear that the grant made by the Crown was applied as it was not originally intended to be, the House might take that fact into consideration, in connection with the question of academical education in Ireland. The House having divided, there were—For the return, 53; against it, 82; Majority against it, 29.—The adjourned debate on the third reading of the Maynooth College Bill was resumed by Sir H. W. BARRON, who spoke in favour of the measure. He had, however, scarcely commenced his speech when notice was taken that there were not sufficient members present to constitute a House. The usual process of "counting" took place, when a rush of members from the lobbies took place, and the debate was saved from being brought to a premature end. The hon. baronet then continued his speech, in which he enforced the right of the Roman Catholics of Ireland to restitutive justice.—Mr. LAW supported Mr. Bankes's amendment that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. He had, he said, always voted against the smaller grant to Maynooth, and he could not reconcile his conscience, as others did, to vote for the larger. If Maynooth were an open college he might perhaps be inclined to give it more liberal assistance.—Mr. CHRISTOPHER had heard nothing in the course of the present debate to shake his original intention of voting in favour of the third reading of this bill. In supporting it he thought that he was supporting a measure which would not extend but diminish error. He thought that the debates on this subject had been conducted in that House in a very becoming and charitable spirit, but out-of-doors language had been used by Protestants respecting their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, which it was impossible to read without mixed feelings of shame and regret. He agreed with the late Dr. Arnold that we ought to sink into nothing the differences which existed between Christians, and to see no difference except between Christians and anti-Christians. He then eulogised the conduct of Ministers in bringing in this law, which, he said, would, like charity, be twice blessed—blessing both those who gave and those who received it.—Mr. FIELLDEN announced his intention of opposing the third reading of this bill. He considered it fraught with the utmost danger to the country, as it took away from it the character of Protestantism, to which under God it owed all its power and greatness.—Sir D. NORREYS expressed his warmest approbation of this measure, for which he returned his sincere thanks as an Irishman to her Majesty's Government. He expected that it would lead to the speedy settlement of the Church question in Ireland, and the settlement of that question would lead to the permanent tranquillity of Ireland.—Mr. GOLDNEY explained the reasons why he must support this Bill, although he had presented several petitions from his constituents against it. His constituents opposed it on religious grounds. Upon such grounds he could not oppose it, as he had been accustomed for many years past, as a Jamaica proprietor, to pay the Roman Catholic clergy for their religious services in that country. He then proceeded to show that in our colonial establishments in the West Indies we appropriated 14,700*l.* a-year to the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy; and as the Roman Catholic population in those colonies was to the Roman Catholic population in Ireland as hundreds to thousands, he asked how any man who paid such a sum to the Roman Catholic clergy in the colonies could refuse to them in Ireland such a paltry endowment as was provided for them in this Bill?—Colonel RAWDON urged that the amount of opposition to this measure evinced a degree of hostility on the part of England towards Ireland which awakened desponding feelings. The moment a British Minister was disposed to do justice to Ireland, he was weakened. While thanking Sir R. Peel for bringing this this measure forward, he could not forget what was due to Lord J. Russell, as the leader of the party with which he usually acted.—Mr. SHAW, in opposing the Bill, took the high ground of principle, which he would never abandon, namely, that to permanently endow the Roman Catholic religion, in connection with the State, was a violation of the duty due to the Crown and the constitution. The great evil of the Bill was, that it unsettled the minds of all men in Ireland. Since Catholic emancipation there was a general acquiescence in the policy which recognised no distinctions of religious opinions in civil appointments. But it was now announced that we were entering on a new system, and it was desirable to know its meaning and extent. Just as their political antipathies were subsiding, and they were beginning to enjoy something like repose, a new element of discord was thrown in, which, by raising the question of religious equality, would prove a fiercer and more dangerous source of agitation than had ever been the political one.—Mr. M. GASKELL warmly supported the Bill, and urged the Ministers to persevere with their measure, in spite of any outcry by which they might be assailed. He deprecated the language which had been used by Mr. Macaulay, and said he believed the present measure was the reverse of the proceedings of the late Ministry, which had strengthened the democracy.—Mr. BELLEW said he wished to guard himself hereafter from the taunt that he had concealed his views on the church question in Ireland, whilst this question was under discussion. He considered that spoliation had been committed in the first instance in taking the church property from the Roman Catholics of Ireland. He considered that spoliation would also be committed in taking it now from the Protestants of that country. He could not, however, refrain from telling the House that many years would not elapse before it must come to a decision upon the territorial relations existing between the Protestant church of Ireland and the Roman Catholic occupiers of the soil, for they might take his word for it, that the Protestant church establishment was at the bottom of all the grievances of Ireland.—Sir R. INGLIS rose, and said that he believed that during the hundred hours' debate on the present measure, no topic had been left untouched. He retained his opinion that the Bill would not content the Roman Catholics, while it dissatisfied the Protestants. He defined Protestantism to be those truths of the Gospel which were revived and restored three centuries ago; and these truths, to which the great bulk of the nation was attached, were enshrined in the constitution of England, as embodied in the Established Church. Sir R. Peel, who held as great, if not greater, power than any previous Minister had, either by proposition or co-operation, identified himself with, and rendered himself responsible for, all the great changes of recent times; and at the present time he and his colleagues were affording every encouragement to Popery both at home and in the colonies, accompanied by corresponding discouragement of the Established Church. Though the present Bill was hailed as the first of a series of similar measures, he clung to the hope that it was insulated, and trusted that during the lifetime of the present generation no Minister would venture to propose the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. He should continue to give, at this final stage, as determined an opposition as at first.—Colonel VERNER then moved the adjournment of the debate, which was met by loud cries of "No." A division was taken, when the adjournment was resisted by 180 to 106.—Colonel VERNER then moved that the House do now adjourn; but after some debate, it was withdrawn, and the adjournment of the debate was agreed to.

Wednesday.—The Lord Mayor of Dublin appeared at the bar, and presented a petition from the corporation of that city, praying that the Hibernian and certain other joint-stock banks in Ireland might be included in the proposed banking measures.—In reply to Mr. MANGLES, Sir R. PEEL said that it was with the full concurrence of Government that Scinde remained under the control of the secret committee of the Court of Directors of the East India Company. Considering the state of affairs in the Punjaub, and the necessity there existed for continued military precaution, he thought it would be unwise as yet to take the recently acquired provinces from the control of the secret committee.—The adjourned debate on the Maynooth Bill was resumed by Colonel VERNER, who opposed the Bill. He said the Irish Protestants were unanimous against the grant, but they did not petition the House because they saw that the Government were resolved to carry it with a strong hand, and because they were unwilling to expose themselves to persecution from their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.—Lord H. VANE supported the measure, because its importance had expanded very largely since the commencement of the debate; for it was now undeniable that it could not be considered as a final and conclusive measure. He could not understand how Ireland was to be governed if no provision were to be made by the state for the spiritual education of 6,500,000 out of the 8,000,000 of souls who inhabited that country. If the time should ever arrive when England should be compelled to consent to Repeal, the establishment of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland would immediately follow; and the best mode of weaning the inhabitants of Ireland from the cause of Repeal would be to adopt a wiser and a better policy towards them. He observed the commencement of that policy in the present Bill, and, as he had no religious scruples on the point, he should give it his most cordial and unhesitating support.—Mr. COLQUHOUN observed that Sir R. Inglis had so completely exhausted the religious part of this question that he would not say one word upon it, on the contrary he would arraign the measure on grounds of state policy alone. He then contended, at great length, that, as a measure of state policy, the proposal of the grant was defective, and that it could not contribute to the peace and good order of Ireland. The hon. member read a great many extracts from the speeches and declarations of Irish agitators, journalists, and Roman Catholic prelates, to show that the attempts made by Government to conciliate Ireland had been treated with scorn and derision. The hon. member also condemned in unmeasured terms the doctrines taught at Maynooth, of whose fruits the country had now had 50 years' experience, and said those doctrines had produced a priesthood the most illiterate in Europe, the most inimical to the Government and institutions in Great Britain. This Bill gave you no control over the College at Maynooth, and yet you were preparing to stereotype it among the permanent institutions of the country. Another blunder was, that Government had taken up this College, which it sought to endow, and from which the people of England wished to withdraw all endowment, and was endeavouring to thrust it down the throats of that Protestant people. A third blunder was that Sir Robert Peel, who at the commencement of this session was the powerful Minister of a powerful party, which tendered him a disinterested support, had riven his party in twain by introducing this unlucky measure. He believed that the consequence of such misalliance would be, that while Government would have all the responsibility and odium attaching to the measures introduced under the expectation of such support, they would also have the scorn of those who seduced them to adopt such a line of policy. He regretted that the right hon. baronet had left his independent but honest friends to rely, for a brief but very inglorious season, on the forbearance of his foes.—Mr. MACKENZIE denied that he had sacrificed principle to place, and appealed to Sir R. Peel for confirmation of his denial. The hon. member likewise denied the accuracy of the report of the speech which he had delivered at the last election for Peebleshire. What he had said was, that he had voted against the small grant to Maynooth because he thought it had done mischief, and that he was prepared to vote in favour of the increased grant, because he thought that it would correct that mischief.—Mr. WYSE denounced the cry which had been raised against Catholic endowments as the repetition of that which in the the time of Lord G. Gordon had led to outbreak and violence; and expressed his regret that in the present day the Roman Catholic religion should have been designated as the great apostacy and as the religion of anti-Christ.—Mr. DARBY spoke in favour of the amendment.—Sir J. GRAHAM having replied to some personal reflections cast on his administrative conduct by Mr. Shaw, said that he had been reminded by Mr. Spooner that he was the Protestant Minister of a Protestant Crown. He admitted it. No man was more deeply and firmly convinced that on grounds moral, political, and religious, the maintenance of a religious establishment was a great and inalienable duty of Parliament. But he was a firm believer in the great principle laid down by Mr. Burke, that whenever, in matters of State, questions of religion arose, those questions should be decided on political and not on theological grounds. True, the Government were Ministers of a Protestant Sovereign, but they were also the Ministers of a Sovereign who reigned over eight millions of Roman Catholic subjects, who loved their priesthood, were led by, and were dependant on them. To treat with contempt or disregard such a priesthood would be a policy pregnant with danger to the United Kingdom. He then referred to a resolution passed at Exeter Hall, lately, to the effect that a "steady abhorence of the Roman Catholic religion should be the bond of union," between these several persons there congregated, and then exclaimed that that might be the fundamental bond of union between Wesleyans and Presbyterians, and it might be the bond of union between some parties in that House, but it was his duty to say that there was one union which could not rest on such grounds, and that was the union between Great Britain and Ireland. He had been asked what would be the direction of the future proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. The objects which the Government desired were well expressed by the late Lord Grenville, when a similar question was put to him soon after the passing of the Union. Their objects would be to conciliate the warm affections of the Irish people by consulting the interests of every class among them, and by treating them all with benevolence and kindness. He considered it not impossible to maintain the Protestant Government and the Protestant Crown of this great empire under a system of the utmost benevolence and kindness to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. They did not ask for, and they would not receive, endowment for their Church; but they asked for this boon, and would accept it with gratitude, and their gratitude would be productive of incalculable benefit to the country. The boon, too, had not been extorted by fear; for if it had, it would not be a benefit, but a curse to all parties.—Mr. SHEIL asserted that, in spite of all that might be said to the contrary, the Bill gave entire satisfaction to the Roman Catholic hierarchy and people of Ireland. He declared that the class-books quoted by Mr. Colquhoun were not class-books at Maynooth at all, and offered, if a select committee were moved for, to inquire into the nature of the class-books used there, to second the motion.—Mr. PLUMPTRE hoped the Government would accept this offer, and would appoint a select committee accordingly. On the final stage of the Bill, he would himself be ready to make such a motion.—Mr. Serjeant MURPHY denied that any violence had been exercised in Ireland against Protestant converts from the Roman Catholic religion, and created considerable merriment by reading extracts from a report of a trial at Tralee, to which Mr. Colquhoun had alluded, for the purpose of showing that the parties in whose behalf he had spoken so strongly were converted, not by the force of reasoning, but by force of arguments addressed to their stomachs, and to their craving appetites for pecuniary remuneration.—Mr. FERRAND recalled to the recollection of the House the advice which Sir R. Peel had given to Her Majesty's late Ministers on a celebrated occasion, when they had found themselves in a majority on one of their Irish measures. He had told them that though they might find themselves in a majority in that House, they would still have to fight the battle of the constitution in the registration courts. The battle had been fought there, and the electors of the empire had in consequence returned to Parliament at the last election a Conservative majority which had enabled Sir R. Peel to drive the Whigs from office. That majority had selected Sir R. Peel for their commander, and had placed him in office. Since that time he had betrayed them—he had led them into the midst of the enemy's camp, and by so doing had earned for himself the unenviable title of the Maroto of Conservatism. But as at the last election the battle had been fought to drive the Whigs from power, so at the next it would be to expel the Conservatives from the offices which they now so unworthily filled. Yes, so sure as there was a dissolution of Parliament, the traitors now in power would be driven from it, and be deprived of the fruits of their treachery.—Capt. LAYARD spoke amid great impatience in favour of the measure.—Lord F. EGERTON said the voice of England was not unanimously opposed to the Bill. He thought that if Great Britain was bound to act towards the people of Ireland as if they were idolators, it would be better to abandon Ireland altogether. He expressed the strong disapprobation with which he had listened to some portions of Mr. Colquhoun's speech, which he considered to be tinctured with an uncharitable spirit towards his Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. He should avoid treating the subject in the religious point of view expressly because he did not wish to "rush in where angels fear to tread." Much had been said of auricular confession, and he had a great objection to making a confessional of the Speaker's chair. He would say that no Scotch Calvanist on his hill adhered more tenaciously than he did to that book which he believed to be the source of all light. He read it as he might—not under the dictation of Pope or of human authority. If the Roman Catholic bowed to that human authority, and believed in its infallibility, he respectfully said that he thought he was in error, but he could not rectify that error without assuming to himself a similar infallibility. He felt that he had but a glimmering and feeble light, but such as it was it led him on. The days of inspiration were gone by—our young men did not now see visions, nor our old men dream dreams. There were no miracles now performed, so far as he heard, at the doors of Exeter-hall. He was conscious that the cloud did not march before him by day, nor did the pillar of flame irradiate his path by night. He believed, indeed, there was a light for his guidance, but he did not walk with sufficient confidence to say that others who pursued different, parallel, or possibly widely divergent paths, were under a sad delusion, or were rushing to their ruin; our goal was a common one. He hoped, he prayed, he believed, that many of us might reach it in common.—Mr. MACLEAN supported the amendment.—Sir R. PEEL had no intention of entering into the merits or demerits of the measure, which had been completely exhausted in this protracted discussion. He had nothing to add either respecting the motives or the grounds on which he had introduced it; but he was unwilling to let the debate close without making a few remarks on the speeches of Mr. Bankes and Mr. Colquhoun. He then proceeded to vindicate his account of the original foundation of Maynooth against the attack made on it by Mr. Bankes on the authority of Dr. Duigenau, and to show that that piece of cotemporary history on which Mr. Bankes placed great reliance, was not deserving of much consideration. He then adverted to the speech of Mr. Colquhoun, and observed that, able as it was, the impressions which it had created in the mind of Lord F. Egerton were exactly the same which had occurred to him during its delivery. Mr. Colquhoun knew that during the dangers of the year 1843 we had 30,000 soldiers and 10,000 police in Ireland, and a large naval armament on the coast, and had told the House that the exhibition of that force and the institution of the state prosecution had been so far successful that the Repeal rent had daily diminished, and that the prestige of the Repeal leaders had been destroyed. He had then censured the Government for introducing, at such a time, their present Bill, as if that was not precisely the moment for measures of conciliation. Mr. Colquhoun had said that it was their duty to enforce the law; but how was it to be enforced? By the trial by jury? But even after agitation was suppressed, the trial by jury was not an available instrument in a country where the great majority of the population had arrayed itself in hostility to the law. Ministers had, therefore, addressed themselves to the consideration of remedial measures, and had taken their present course after full deliberation upon all the consequences which it might entail upon them. He deeply regretted the severance to which it had led from those political friends, who now declared their intention to withhold from him all political confidence; but nevertheless he must claim for the executive Government, which was responsible for the result, the absolute right, without reference to past events, or to party considerations, to risk the confidence of their supporters rather than abandon the conviction of what they deemed to be right. He would not notice the expressions which had fallen from Mr. Ferrand. He never would admit that a Minister of the Crown owed any personal obligation to those who had placed him in office; and, without reference to this man or that, he claimed the right of giving to the Crown on all occasions that advice which the interests of the country required. He would not hold office on the servile tenure which Mr. Ferrand seemed inclined to recommend; for he could not conciliate his good opinion without risking the loss of that which he valued far more highly, the good opinion of honourable men like Lord Francis Egerton. He now repeated, not in arrogant defiance of public opinion, which he respected highly, that there were circumstances within his knowledge which induced him to adhere, with still greater force than ever, to the course which he had taken. If he thought that the principles of the opposition to which this measure had been exposed would prevail in the country, he should indeed despair of maintaining amicable relations between Great Britain and Ireland. It was therefore of the utmost importance that public men should show to the people of Ireland that they would not lightly abandon the course upon which they had entered, but that they were prepared to make every sacrifice for the principles which they had placed on record. He expressed the deep sense of gratitude which he felt towards those public men, who, though opposed to him in public life, had yet given him their cordial support on this occasion. They had been influenced by a sense of public duty alone; that had been their motive, and must be their reward. Ministers were aware that this measure would alienate from them the support of many of their former friends. They had knowingly incurred the risk of it, but their compensation would be complete, if they should succeed in engendering a more kindly feeling between Great Britain and Ireland, and in increasing the chances of maintaining amicable relations between the component parts of this great empire.—Lord J. RUSSELL briefly explained the motives which had induced him to take the course he had adopted in reference to this measure, and proceeded to justify the expectations of the Irish people that it would be followed by others of the same character, until perfect equality with the people of this country was attained. He referred to Lord Ingestre's declaration, that he would have opposed this Bill had it been brought in by the Whigs, as an instance of the injustice with which that Government had been treated, and urged the present Ministry, as it was in no danger of similar treatment, to persevere in its present course.—Mr. G. PALMER made some observations on the unmerited insinuations which Sir R. Peel had cast upon the friends who had so long supported him, and who now separated from him on conscientious scruples.—After an exculpatory remark from Sir R. PEEL, the House divided, when there appeared—For the amendment, 184; Against it, 317; Majority, 133. The Bill was then read a third time.—On the question that it do now pass, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE moved the following clause as a rider to it: "And be it enacted, that the powers and provisions of this Act shall not continue and be in force longer than the 1st day of August, 1848, and thence to the end of the then next session of Parliament."—After a few remarks from Sir R. PEEL, the House divided, when the numbers were—For the clause, 145; Against it, 243; Majority against it, 98. The clause was accordingly lost, and the Bill was then passed.

Thursday.—The Commons did not make a House, 40 members not having assembled when the Speaker took the chair. By this accident Mr. Hume's motion for "a call of the House," which stood on the paper, has fallen to the ground.

Metropolis and its Vicinity.

The Duke of Newcastle on the State of the Country.—We gave some weeks back some extracts from a letter published by the Duke of Newcastle, in reference to the Hafod debate in the House of Commons, in which his Grace adverted also to the position of public men and measures at the present crisis. The Duke has this week published another letter of great length, which has attracted a great deal of interest. It is addressed to his "fellow-countrymen," and is occasioned, his Grace says, by the "unexpected, but most kind and almost affectionate expressions of good-will, attachment, and much more," which his Grace received in answer to his former letter from all quarters of the country. Our space will allow us to insert but a very small portion of this letter, but the following extracts contain the leading points of public interest upon which it touches:—

"Of the Prime Minister's talent in debate, of his dexterity in parliamentary management, his knowledge of his audience, his extensive information, his long experience in public affairs, and of his parliamentary omnipotence, there can be no question; but of his right use of these mighty advantages there may be, and is, very great question indeed. I have elsewhere stated, some time ago, how that, by loosening one stone in the building, we have endangered the whole fabric; so repealing the Combination Laws brought about the repeal of the Corporation and Test Act, as a consequence; the emancipation of the Roman Catholics followed; then reform in Parliament; then arose a cry against the Church; to appease this cry the ecclesiastical commission was devised. The revenues or resources of the Church establishment were to be drained and exhausted, bishoprics and various other dignities abolished, everything done to abuse, humiliate and impoverish the Church which an improvident meddling could devise, and only stopping where shame forbade to proceed further. Next the old corporations were destroyed. The Education Bill passed, and these acts followed one upon the other; one in consequence of another, and one after the other, were recommended to the Legislature, and the reason why was apparently because the preceding acts had become law. I will not enumerate any other bad measures, such as the New Poor-law, Rural Police Act, &c., enacted, no doubt, to restrain that very poverty and crime which confusion and uncertainty had created. My object is to show that one bad precedent begets another, and that this stratagem has been systematically pursued as a sure, though unperceived mode of stealing a march, of sapping our morality, undermining our civil and religious institutions, and, in fact, of revolutionising the state. As far as my recollection serves me not one good measure has passed since the entrance into office of the present administration; the amor patriæ appears to me to have been lamentably disregarded, and the amor sui cherished as a more expedient and more suitable substitute. Whatever misdeeds were committed by the former government, and they were many and glaring, they were forced out of office by the expectation that the new government would set all to rights; but to our astonishment we soon perceived that the very measures to enforce which unseated the former were adopted by the new administration, with an utter disregard of its own credit, and of our private feelings and national interests. I ask you whether your expectations have been fulfilled; whether you are satisfied with the honesty, good faith and gratitude of your rulers, or whether bitter disappointment and distrust do not prevail? But you must be already weary of following me through this (from memory) imperfect enumeration of bad, and as I think, dangerous measures, because uncalled for—empirical and tending to alter the nature of minds and things. I will merely touch upon the late Jews Bill and the Maynooth endowment, and then proceed to remedies. The Bill to remove the disabilities of the Jews is one of the most remarkable features of the day, exhibiting the laxity of principle which has crept in, and the mawkish sentimentality that liberalism, as it is called, which distinguishes too many of our public men, and lead to the very verge of indifference as to the prevalence of any particular religion, too often to the forgetfulness of any religion as a necessary ingredient in all Christian legislation. Towards the Jews individually I profess to entertain a very strong and deep interest, and it may be that I am impressed with a persuasion approaching to conviction that their redemption is nigh at hand. I should glory in their conversion, and gladly behold their exaltation to the first rank of nations; but is any Christian legislator justified in raising to political honour or authority one who, whilst he continues a Jew, must continue to deny our Saviour, and must, de facto, be incompetent to exercise any political authority over a Christian community. Show him every kindness and consideration—extend to him the fullest toleration—but without grave offence you cannot confer upon him any administrative functions. Here, again, is shown the danger of the new doctrine of legislation—so and so has been done for the Moravians and others, it will be injustice not to do the same for the Jews, as if it were possible to palliate the commission of one crime by alleging that another had passed unpunished. We are now arrived at the Maynooth Bill, and a more daring attempt to take a nation by storm, and force upon it a measure repugnant to all faithful Protestants, conscientiously regarded by them as a criminal deed, an artful decoy to a feared apostacy, a jesuitical entrapment of a deluded few to accomplish by small means a revolution the most formidable and most guilty ever perpetrated by any rulers of a free country. Many conjectures may be hazarded to account for this extraordinary attempt: surmise alone can account for it; but this we know, that although might may be applied to overpower right, the exercise of such power is intolerable and odious, and submission to it is rendered as impossible as it would be culpable; and here I arrive at our remedy. It is short and simple. In the case of constituents and representatives, I venture to recommend you to petition; but, if petitioning should fail, you may follow it up by calling upon your representatives to resign their trusts. Suppose that they decline, follow this up by strong declaratory resolutions, persist in this course, and by its effects, if unavailing, which I can hardly believe to be possible, still continue a steady and resolute determination. So situated, the minister may resign: he will calculate no other administration can be formed, and that he must be recalled and reinstated; but in this calculation, if it should be your pleasure to defeat it, you will do well to act thus:—Whenever the time arrives, unanimously resolve to elect such members only as you know to be well affected to the preservation and maintenance of our purely Protestant constitution in Church and State, to the entire exclusion of all noxious measures. If you cannot find them among those who have usually represented you, search elsewhere for others—look for worth, wherever and in whomsoever it be—look for devotion to his country's cause, for sound sense, for a loyal subject, a faithful citizen, a good man, and a good churchman; the highest talents unless combined with these are more than worthless. Care not for wealth, if you can find integrity. Refrain from all sordid considerations. Banish the very idea of bribery, or payment for votes, or spending of money. Such proceeding would do you unfaded honour and it would immortalise you. Success must await it, and you will be invincible whilst you act wisely and well. I confidently call upon all good men to act thus, and show themselves to be true patriots of a new school. To Dissenters I would say, what form of religious faith can equal or surpass the pure, the simple, yet sublime and earnest doctrine of the Established Church of England? Join her if you can, and make one of an united brotherhood: but if you cannot, still give all your support to a Church and State which tolerate all. To those who entertain party views I will say, throw aside party and act upon principle: you are Britons, you love your country and your Queen, let us all unite for their welfare, they pressingly require your manful aid and pious defence; they are in difficulty and danger, and demand your honest and strenuous support. Party has done but little for you of late years; where has it promoted any good end but a competition of change and destruction? One side when in power scarcely differing in a shade from the other. Reform has proved to be a delusion, political economy a mischievous conceit; but of all the subtle contrivances for misgovernment planned by the great corrupter of souls, political expediency has been the bane of modern times; rejoicing in crookedness and deformity, it miscalls good evil, and transposes vice for virtue: itself degenerated in a total abandonment of all principle, it corrupts, demoralises, and degrades all who give in to its practices, engendering perfidy, deceit, treacherous dereliction, and every nameable political wickedness; most unworthy of every great—of every noble mind; let it be shunned, disgraced, and relinquished. Lay the foundation of a new school, and henceforth let the school of political virtue be the basis of England's grandeur, as it would be of her settled happiness. It may be said this is an Utopian vision, but I reply, why so? Is it impossible for a nation to be good and great? If we may be nationally good, if we habituate ourselves to the practice of virtue, assuredly our virtue will bind us together by ties of mutual respect and mutual confidence; suspicion and discord will cease, and something more approaching to one mind will appease our contentions, curb our evil passions; idem velle atque idem nolle vera est amicitia. United thus, and acting in faithful unison for our country's welfare, must we not be as powerfully great as we shall have found ourselves nationally good?"

The Maynooth Bill.—On Saturday a deputation from Newry, composed of the following noblemen and gentlemen, being of different political and religious opinions—Lords Downshire, Castlereagh, Newry, and Morne; John Boyd, Esq. (Seneschal of Newry), Hill Irvine, Esq., Charles Jennings, Esq., Dennis Maguire, Esq., J. Lyle, Esq., Peter Quinn, Esq., and George Scott, Esq.—presented the following address to Sir R. Peel:—"We, the gentry, merchants, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of the town of Newry, specially convened by public requisition, respectfully present our acknowledgments and gratefully record our hearty and entire approval of the enlightened and comprehensive policy which Her Majesty's present Government have adopted for the development of the national resources of Ireland, the amelioration of the condition of the people, and the encouragement given to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interest of the country. Believing that the measures recently introduced by you in the House of Commons for the regulation, amendment, and extension of the banking system in Ireland, are formed in wisdom and justice, we specially hail them as peculiarly demanding our warmest thanks and approbation; such wise and salutary measures being in our opinion decidedly calculated to advance the prosperity and promote the welfare of the community—to give an impulse to trade and commerce, revive and stimulate the industrial resources of Ireland, and afford facilities and advantages to its manufacturing and mercantile interests of vital importance and lasting utility." The address having been read, Sir R. Peel made the following reply:—"My Lords and Gentlemen: I have derived the greatest satisfaction from the assurances contained in this address, which I will not fail to communicate to my colleagues in the service of her Majesty. In devising measures calculated to improve the social condition and to promote the general prosperity of Ireland, we are acting in unison with the benevolent desires and intentions of a gracious Sovereign, who has ever taken the deepest interest in the welfare of that part of her dominions. We feel confident of ultimate success if we shall receive that cordial co-operation and support of which the inhabitants of Newry have set an example so honourable to their character and beneficial to the interests of their country." The subjoined protest was presented on Monday to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at his official residence, Downing-street, by the following members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge:—G. R. Clarke, Esq., G. J. Philip Smith, Esq., C. J. Tindal, Esq, J. B. Hyndman, Esq., the Rev. Daniel Moore, the Rev. C. Levingston, and the Rev. J. Sandys. "We, the undersigned members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge, have the greatest repugnance to, and firmly protest against, the proposed endowment of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth." This protest was signed by more than 530 members of the Senate, and by a number of the fellows and late fellows of the various Colleges, amounting in all to about 90, besides clergymen in all parts of the kingdom. Among the members of the Senate who signed the protest are, Dr. Ollivant, Regius Professor of Divinity; Dr. Lee, Regius Professor of Hebrew; Mr. Scholefield, Regius Professor of Greek; Dr. Wordsworth, formerly Master of Trinity; Mr. Benson, late Master of the Temple; Mr. Carus, Fellow and Senior Dean of Trinity; Mr. H. J. Rose, B.D., late Hulsean Lecturer; the Archdeacons of Dorset, Ely, Montgomery, &c. A similar protest, by the same members of the Senate, was also presented to the other member for the University, the Hon. C. E. Law.—The annual meeting of the Protestant Association was held last week at Exeter-hall, the Earl of Winchilsea in the chair. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. R. J. M'Ghee, the Rev. Dr. O'Sullivan, and other gentlemen; and resolutions denouncing the principles taught in the College of Maynooth as anti-social, intolerant, immoral, and persecuting in their character, and subversive of religion and loyalty, and pledging the meeting to oppose the Bill as contrary to the coronation oath, were unanimously adopted.—It appears by the 24th report of the Parliamentary committee on public petitions, that there are now 8,758 petitions before Parliament praying that the House will not sanction the proposed grant to Maynooth, signed by an aggregate number of 1,106,772 persons, several thousands having appended their names within the last few days. It is also stated that these 1,106,772 persons exceed the aggregate number of electors on the registries of all the counties, cities, and boroughs in Great Britain; and that they represent in numerical force more than 1-18th part of the population of England, Wales, and Scotland.

The Goldsmith's Company's Banquet to Prince Albert.—On Saturday evening, the Prime Warden, Masters, and Court of Assistants of the Goldsmiths' Company, gave a magnificent entertainment to Prince Albert, her Majesty's Ministers, &c., at their hall, in Foster-lane. At the north end of the banquetting-room, in a recess, were arranged the rich and matchless services of gold plate, belonging to the company; and the tables were laid out in a style to correspond with their wealth and magnificence. The hall, ante-rooms, landing-places, and stairs were ornamented with the choicest exotics. Whatever taste, wealth, and influence could desire, was called into action to make the banquet worthy the presence of the Prince. The guests began to arrive about six o'clock, amongst whom were the Marquess of Exeter, Lord Stanley, the Lord Chancellor, and Sir R. Peel, who was loudly cheered. Prince George of Cambridge, Prince Albert, and his suite, arrived in five carriages; and were also loudly cheered. After the cloth was removed, the business of the evening commenced, the principal toasts being, "Her Majesty and Prince Albert," to which his Royal Highness responded. "The Queen Dowager and the rest of the Royal family," which was acknowledged by Prince George of Cambridge; "Her Majesty's Ministers;" "The Houses of Lords and Commons," &c.

Dinner at Fishmongers' Hall.—On Wednesday an entertainment was given by the Company of Fishmongers, at Fishmongers'-hall, to a numerous and distinguished assemblage of guests, on the occasion of presenting the freedom of the company to Lord Cottenham, Viscount Melbourne, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Fortescue. His Royal Highness Prince Albert was also present, being a member of the company. Among the guests were—the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Exeter, Earl Fortescue, Viscount Palmerston, the Earl of Lovelace, Lord Cottenham, Lord J. Russell, the Bishop of Norwich, Lord Bingham, Lord Howick, the Bishop of Worcester, Lord Camoys, Baron Rolfe, Mr. Anson, Sir G. Grey, Sir R. Ferguson, Mr. Hume, M.P., Mr. M. J. O'Connell, Mr. Macaulay, M.P. In the course of the evening the different toasts were responded to by Prince Albert, Lord Lansdowne, Lords Palmerston and Brougham, the Bishop of Norwich, and other visitors.

Sir William Follett.—The daily papers state that the health of the Attorney-General, Sir Wm. Follett, continues in a very precarious state, and that he has been confined to his bed-room for the last fortnight. Lady Follett seldom leaves him, and Dr. Bright attends him twice and sometimes three times a day.

British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.—The annual meeting of this Society was held on Saturday in the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street, Joseph Gurney, Esq., in the chair. The hall was nearly filled, the larger number of those present being ladies, of whom a considerable portion were of the Society of Friends. The meeting was addressed by several of the missionaries who attended from the different islands in the West Indies—Mr. Nibbs, of Jamaica, being the principal speaker. The annual report was unanimously adopted, together with resolutions in favour of the objects of the Society.

The New Houses of Parliament.—A writer in the Art Union has drawn attention to a number of asserted heraldic blunders which appear on the exterior of the new Houses of Parliament. He states that many of the shields are charged with devices copied from coins of various Sovereigns, which were never intended to represent arms, and that it would be as reasonable to take St. George and the Dragon for the arms of George IV. as to adopt those devices for the arms of the monarch on whose coinage they appear. He points out, too, amongst other objections, that supporters have been assigned to every Sovereign, beginning with the Conqueror, though it is known that supporters were not used by the Kings of England till the reign of Richard II., 300 years after the conquest.

The Arctic Expedition.—The Erebus, Captain Sir John Franklin, and the Terror, Captain Crozier, discovery vessels, left Greenhithe on Monday for their destination. Each ship has been supplied with 200 tin cylinders for the purpose of holding papers which are to be thrown overboard, with the statement of the longitude and other particulars worthy of record, written in six different languages, and the parties finding them are requested to forward the information to the Admiralty.

Cab Statistics.—According to a late return there are in the metropolis 130 cab-stands, and 8592 cabmen, conductors, and watermen, being an increase of 244 beyond those similarly engaged last year. It appears that during the past two years a decided reformation has taken place amongst these hardworking men, many of whom are regular attendants at a place of worship on Sundays, while others attend a school opened especially for them. Some have even given up driving cabs on Sundays, in order that they may observe the Sabbath.

The Tower.—Upwards of 100 military are daily employed, in addition to the ordinary labourers, in proceeding with the works of this ancient fortress. The site of the old armoury has been nearly excavated, and concrete laid for the foundations of the new barracks. The earth taken out of the latter has been thrown over the Tower into the moat to fill it up, and it is not now intended to make it into a plantation, but into an exercise ground for the military, and a promenade for the inhabitants of the fortress.

Baths and Washhouses for the Poor.—A meeting in favour of the establishment of baths, &c., for the poor, was held on Thursday, at Willis's Rooms. The Duke of Cambridge presided; and Lord Sandon, Lord Fortescue, Lord Eldon, Lord John Manners, Lord Ranelagh, the Rev. Mr. Angus, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and Mr. Byng, M.P., moved and seconded the resolutions, which were carried unanimously. A liberal subscription was entered into at the close of the meeting.

Supposed Murder at Hampstead.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at Hampstead, to investigate the death of T. W. Cunningham, a tailor, residing in Holywell-street, Strand, who was found dead in a ditch in the Finchley-road, near the Swiss-cottage, on the morning of Saturday last, under circumstances which gave rise to a suspicion that he had come by his death unfairly. There was, however, no evidence in support of such a supposition; whilst the medical man who performed a post mortem examination of the body, gave a decided opinion that he had died of apoplexy produced by natural causes, and not by violence. The jury returned a verdict of Natural Death, the coroner observing with some severity on the mischief caused by newspaper paragraphs. Every death at Hampstead, he said, some ingenious newspaper gentleman wishes to make a murder of, so that nurses and children are instructed in town, when they go out for exercise, to be sure not to go near Hampstead.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending May 17:—West Districts, 132; Northern, 142; Central, 164; Eastern, 185; Southern, 212; Total, 835; males, 413; females, 422. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1218; males, 619; females, 599.

Provincial.

Chatham.—The Janus steam-sloop, which was built on the design of the Earl of Dundonald, and fitted with rotatory engines of his lordship's construction, has unfortunately proved a failure. Several efforts have been made with the engines to make them work, without success. On the 8th inst. the Ruby steam vessel took her in tow, and pulled her against a strong tide, which had the effect on her rotatory engines of making the wheels turn round two or three times. The Earl of Dundonald came down from London last week to witness the experiments, and we regret to state that on Wednesday week, his Lordship, who was staying at the house of the Captain Superintendent, was seized with a very severe attack of spasms, and has been for some days in imminent danger. On Saturday another experiment was made in the presence of Captain Shirreff, and after many hours' trial, without making any revolutions, it was given up. The Janus has already cost 33,000*l.*, out of which sum 9000*l.* is for the engine. Since the estimate of the expenses of this untoward vessel has been given in, there has been a considerable outlay incurred in alteration, fuel, &c., amounting, it is supposed, to upwards of 1000*l.*

Chelmsford.—We learn from the Chelmsford Chronicle that the Essex constabulary are in possession of important information in connexion with a number of the late incendiary fires in this county, and that several suspected parties are in custody. The force have been privately engaged in tracing the parties, and have at last succeeded in obtaining information which will convince all that, however secretly such acts are effected, as the parties concerned may imagine, the perpetrators will, sooner or later, be brought to justice.

Ely.—About three or four weeks since, the Bury Post gave an account of the extraordinary ages of Mr. and Mrs. Plaisance, then living in Redmoor Fen, in the Isle of Ely, the husband of the age of 107, the wife 105—a case said to be without parallel, perhaps, in England, or in the world. On Wednesday week, after a short illness, both expired on the same day; their united ages 212. The greater part of their lives were passed when agues were so prevalent in the Fens that very few escaped the disorder, yet their lives were prolonged to this extraordinary period, and even in death they were not divided. They have left one daughter, who lived with them, of the age of 84.

Liverpool.—The first sale of United States' sugar ever held in Liverpool took place last week. The quantity exposed for sale was small, but it sold very well. There are two other lots in the port; but, as prices have risen greatly in America, owing to the smallness of the Cuba sugar crop, and have become much more moderate than they were in England some time since, owing to the abundant supplies from the West Indies, the Mauritius, and the East Indies, it is not likely that much more will be imported from the United States at present.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—The regulations so long established by the coalowners of the north of England in respect to the supply of coal to the London market, are now at an end, and henceforth the inhabitants of the metropolis may expect to be supplied with that indispensable article of domestic use on more reasonable terms than formerly. The circumstances out of which this state of things has arisen are confined chiefly to the trade itself. Many of the large coalowners had refused to bind themselves to the proposed conditions, which have been some time under revisal by the coal trade committee, and after several meetings and much discussion, the committee determined last week to leave the trade open.

Portsmouth.—It has been determined by the Admiralty that the experimental squadron, intended to cruise this summer under the orders of Rear-Admiral Parker, shall rendezvous at Spithead, and sail from that anchorage. The squadron will consist of the St. Vincent, Trafalgar, and Queen, three-deckers; and the Albion, Vanguard, Rodney, Superb, and Canopus, two-deckers. It is probable that the Vulture, first-class steamer, will accompany them. The recent trial of speed between the Rattler steam-ship, propelled by the screw, and the Vesuvius, propelled by the paddle-wheels, has terminated in favour of the Rattler.—A duel was fought on Tuesday night at Stokes Bay, on the Gosport shore, between Mr. Seton, late of the 11th Hussars, and Lieut. Hawkey, of the Royal Marines. It appears that at a soirée held at the King's-rooms, on Southsea-beach, on Monday evening, Mr. Seton paid somewhat marked attention to the wife of Lieut. Hawkey, and was afterwards, in the public room, insulted by Mr. Hawkey, who told him if he would not fight him, he would horsewhip him down the High-street of Portsmouth. At the time these words were used Mr. Seton was endeavouring to leave the ball-room, when Lieut. Hawkey, who was sitting upon a sofa, rose, and attempted to kick him as he passed. The consequence may be anticipated. A meeting was arranged, and at 5 o'clock on Tuesday evening the combatants met at Stokes Bay, near Fort Monckton. Lieut. Byron G. Rowles, R N., acting as second to Mr. Seton; and Lieut. Edward L. Pym, of the marines, as second to Lieut. Hawkey. The ground (15 paces) was measured, when Mr. Seton fired and missed his antagonist. The pistol of Lt. Hawkey was placed in his hand by his second at half-cock, and consequently Lieut. Hawkey did not have his shot. Other pistols were, however, supplied to the combatants, the word was again given, and both fired. Mr. Seton immediately fell. Lieut. Hawkey, without waiting to see the result of his fire, or going up to his antagonist, immediately fled with his second, saying, "I'm off to France." Mr. Seton was conveyed on a shutter on board a yacht in waiting, and brought about half-past nine at night to the Quebec Hotel, on the water's edge. Surgical assistance was called in, and it was discovered that he had been wounded dangerously on the right side of the abdomen, the ball passing through and coming out on the left side. Mr. Seton has a wife and one child, and is 28 years of age. Lieut. Hawkey is about 26. The last accounts state that Mr. Seton is not worse, but is not out of danger. Neither Lieut. Hawkey nor the seconds have been heard of since the night of the duel.

Ramsgate.—An occurrence which has excited great interest in Ramsgate, took place on Friday last. M. Blondell, the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires, was going out to Mexico in the Santa Maria, which was obliged to put into Ramsgate for repairs. M. Blondell went to London, and on returning and getting out of a Margate omnibus, he was asked by an Irish gentleman, named Lloyd, if his name was Blondell? Having replied that it was, he immediately received a severe horsewhipping from Mr. Lloyd. The matter came before the magistrates on the next day, when Mr. Lloyd stated, in defence, the particulars of a quarrel he had last winter in Brussels with M. Blondell, when not being able to obtain satisfaction from him by other means, he had threatened that if ever he caught M. Blondell in England, he would horsewhip him. He had so caught him, and he kept his word. If the magistrate would send the case to the sessions, he would undertake to get witnesses from Belgium to prove the provocation he had received from M. Blondell. He knew that he had no right to take the law into his own hands, but he had not done so till every other means of procuring justice had failed. The Bench said that nothing which had been stated by Mr. Lloyd was a justification for the breach of the peace he had committed, and fined him 5*l.*, at the same time calling on him to find sureties to keep the peace, himself in 100*l.*, and two sureties in 50*l.* each. The money was paid, and the sureties entered into. M. Blondell has since sailed for Mexico.

Ware.—The Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge, have appointed the Rev. J. W. Blakesley, M A., Fellow and Tutor of that Society, to the vicarage of Ware. The new incumbent is opposed to the innovations which have kept this parish in a ferment during the last two years.

Yarmouth.—At the request of the coroner and jury, Sir J. Graham has sent down Mr. James Walker, President of the Institute of Civil Engineers, to inquire into the causes connected with the falling of the suspension-bridge over the Bure. Mr. Walker, on his arrival, applied to the coroner for any plans or information with which he might be able to furnish him, and at the adjourned inquest on Saturday the coroner said, that as he had no plans, he had called on Mr. Cory (the owner of the bridge), who offered the engineer and jury every plan and specification in his possession from the very commencement of the bridge. He was bound to say that no man had behaved better than Mr. Cory in the matter, or could have facilitated the inquiry as to the cause of the accident more than that gentleman had done. —At the adjourned inquest on Wednesday Mr. Walker stated the results of his investigation at great length, and concluded by embodying the facts of the case in the following general conclusions:—"1. I consider the immediate cause of the accident to have been a defect in the joining or welding of the bar which first gave way. 2. That the quality of the iron and the workmanship, as far as I have been able to examine them, are defective; and I believe that the accident would not have happened had the work been properly examined at the time of construction. 3. That the widening appears to have been made without sufficient reference to the original strength of the bridge, and the weight which it had to support, and therefore that it acted as an aggravation of the evil. 4. That in the original construction of the bridge, the casualty of a great load all on one side does not appear to have been contemplated; if it had been I think that the links on that side would have consisted of more than the two bars, any one of which was unequal to the load which the bridge was likely to carry." The jury returned, on the same day, the following special verdict:—"That deceased came by her death by the falling of the suspension bridge across the River Bure, on the 2d May. That the falling of the bridge was attributable immediately to the defect in the joint or welding of the bar which first gave way, and to the quality of part of the iron and workmanship being inferior to the requirements of the original contract, which provided that such should be of the first quality. Although the jury do not wish to add more to their verdict, they wish to express the fullest concurrence in what had fallen from the coroner as to the facilities which had been afforded by the Messrs. Cory in the prosecution of this inquiry, which had been so scientifically conducted by Mr. Walker, who had been deputed by Sir J. Graham to come down and examine into the cause of the accident. They are of opinion that every possible precaution has been taken by the original proprietor of the bridge, and that had the clerk of the works performed his duty in the proper examination of the work, the calamity which they now deplore would have been prevented. They beg also to express their sympathy with the present proprietors of the bridge, whose entire conduct has reflected the greatest credit upon them, in the kindness they had shown to the survivors of those who had been lost by the sad event."

The Standing Orders Committee have decided that the standing orders have not been complied with in the case of the following lines:—Dorking branch of the London and Brighton; Diss and Beccles; Staines and Richmond; Newport and Pontypool; Birkenhead, Manchester, and Cheshire Junction; Guildford, Chichester, and Portsmouth (for additional provision). The Brighton and Hastings (Hastings, Rye, and Ashford); the Shrewsbury and Grand Junction, and the Harwich lines. They have also decided that the standing orders ought to be dispensed with in the West London, the Goole and Doncaster, the Diss, Beccles, and Yarmouth. The Committee on Irish Bills, it is understood, have come to a decision unfavourable to the abrogation of the standing orders in such cases.—The Grand Junction, Birmingham, and Midland Counties Companies, severally held special meetings last week, for taking the opinion of their shareholders on the draughts of the bills they have before Parliament for extending their traffic either by branches or continuous routes. The resolutions at the whole of these meetings were adopted unanimously, as in fact they were merely pro formâ proceedings.—It is proposed, by a metropolitan central terminus, to provide means whereby the passenger carriages from every line in conjunction with the metropolis may be conveyed across the Thames, by a line of rails adjoining Hungerford-bridge, to a general station at Charing-cross, for all the lines that radiate from London. The project embraces the construction of an embankment, in connection with the scheme of Government for embanking the Thames, for the distance lying between Waterloo and Hungerford bridges, and in the area thus obtained from the river, to erect a station for every line along the frontage of the Adelphi-terrace, which it is considered will be well adapted for a series of hotels. —Another catalogue of 14 new railway schemes was published week, embracing, amongst others, the Galway and Belfast Junction; Aberdeen, Banff, and Elgin; Bideford and Tavistock; Ulverstone, Furness, and Lancaster and Carlisle; Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction; London Central Terminus; Manchester and Birmingham Continuation and Welsh Junction; Great Eastern and Western; Isle of Wight; East Indian; Great Peninsular; Great West of England; Lancaster and Carlisle (Branch to the West of Yorkshire); Dumblane, Downe, and Callander.

Ireland.

Dublin.—The Lord Mayor and a deputation from the Corporation of Dublin had an interview with Sir James Graham last week, in reference to the rumoured visit of the Queen to Ireland. Sir James Graham said that although rumours had long been current on the subject, he was not aware of her Majesty having ever expressed an intention, as yet, of visiting Ireland. He asked, however, how it could be expected that he would advise her Majesty to proceed to Ireland, after it had been announced that the horses in the royal carriage were to be affrighted in the streets of Dublin with shouts of Repeal; that the sound was to force like a shot into the royal councils; that certain gentlemen were to appear in their Repeal uniform of the Eighty-two club at her Majesty's levee? Alderman O'Brien observed that it was hard—he might say unjust—to decide against the people of the entire country, because an article of a certain nature had appeared in a newspaper. Sir J. Graham replied: True, but that was not all. The newspaper publication had been followed up by speeches at the Council-ation-hall and resolutions; and there were the monster meetings commencing again. If Her Majesty went to Ireland, and were to be met in this way, did they imagine she could give any assurance on the question but the one

Her Majesty had already communicated through her Minister to Parliament? The Town Clerk here observed that he remembered the visit of George IV.; that he believed the right to address the Sovereign from the throne in Ireland was confined to the Church, the University, and the Corporation, and he was certain that neither of those bodies, or, indeed, any of the Irish people, would do any act whatever that could, in the least degree, offend a Sovereign so much beloved in Ireland. He expressed his thorough conviction that the Irish character, for loyalty and courtesy, would not be lessened by the reception they would give their Queen. Sir J. Graham said the Corporation of Dublin certainly had done everything that could be desired in the matter. Alderman O'Brien remarked that the immediate object of their interview was to ascertain when it would be Her Majesty's pleasure to receive the deputation, and Sir James Graham promised to ascertain Her Majesty's pleasure upon this point, and to communicate the result to the Lord Mayor. It was accordingly announced to the deputation a few days afterwards that the Queen had appointed Wednesday, on which day her Majesty held a court, for the purpose of receiving the deputation on the throne. The court was attended by all the great Officers of State, and by several of the Ministers. The Lord Chamberlain received the Lord Mayor at the entrance of the throne-room, and conducted his Lordship and the deputation to her Majesty. The Lord Mayor read the address from the corporation, humbly praying her Majesty to visit Ireland. His Lordship then presented the address. The Queen returned the following answer:—"I receive with cordial satisfaction this loyal address from the corporation of Dublin. I have ever been most anxious to consult the feelings and promote the happiness of my Irish subjects. The wish which you express in gratifying terms that I should visit Ireland, is an acceptable proof of the warm attachment of the citizens of Dublin to my person and government. Whenever I may be enabled to receive in Ireland the promised welcome, I shall rely with confidence on the loyalty and affection of my faithful subjects." The Lord Mayor received from the Queen a copy of the address, and had the honour to kiss hands. Alderman O'Brien (late Lord Mayor), and Town Councillor Patrick O'Brien, had also the honour to kiss hands, and the deputation retired.—A Cabinet Minister, the Right Honourable Sidney Herbert, has commenced the endowment of Roman Catholic clergymen, in accordance with the earnest recommendation of Sir Robert Peel when introducing the Maynooth Bill in the House of Commons. Mr. Herbert, who is the owner of a vast property in Dublin and its vicinity, has settled 100*l.* per annum on the parish priest of Irishtown, and a like sum on the parish priest of Booterstown, in both of which parishes he is the principal proprietor. The endowment is perpetual for the clergyman of these parishes, and it is vested in the Commissioners of Donations and Bequests under the act of last session.—A meeting of the Irish Roman Catholic bishops, to consider the new Education Bill, took place on Wednesday, at the Presbytery attached to the Cathedral in Marlborough-street. The attendance was numerous, including all the prelates who were not incapacitated by illness from travelling. Amongst those present were the Most Rev. Archbishop Crolly, primate; Most Rev. Archbishops Murray, Slattery, and M'Hale; Right Rev. Drs. Denvir, Kinsella, Blake, Cantwell, M'Nally, Feeny, Ryan, Browne, Crotty, Murphy, M'Gettigan, Haly, Kennedy, Foran, Ffrench, &c. The prelates after a long sitting adjourned to Friday, and delayed their final decision until that day; but it is understood that, with scarcely an exception, they are decidedly opposed to the measure of Government, as propounded by Sir James Graham. Although disposed to look favourably upon any measure emanating from the Government which proposed the Maynooth Bill, they are strenuously opposed to the education project, on the ground that it contains the germs of positive evil, as regards the religion of the Roman Catholic youth of the country, who, separated from their parents in the new colleges, and without any direct religious influence or control, would be exposed to all the dangers of immoral habits and associations. They admit the great difficulties of the question, and give the Government full credit for the best intentions; but, in consequence of the want of any provision for religious instruction or moral control of the pupils, they intend to withhold any approval of the measure.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday, Mr. R. D. Browne, M.P. in the Chair. Mr. O'Connell commenced the proceedings by moving that a war-song which had been sent to the Association by Mr. O'Callaghan, the author should be forthwith returned to him, with a strong expression of indignation at his so grossly mistaking the principles of Repealers. Mr. O'Connell then said that it had been complained that the levee which was to be held on the 30th May was interfering with the royal prerogative. There were no grounds for any such complaint. The levee proposed to be held on the 30th instant was not a mark of respect to be paid to an individual, but to seven of them, a heptarchy of kings of Brentford. He then recommended that an instruction should be issued to the repeal wardens of Navan and Drogheda directing them to prevent the distribution or circulation of all placards, songs, and documents, of every description; and further, to apprehend any person who should be heard uttering any sentiments of a seditious or disloyal character, and hand him over to the authorities. Mr. O'Connell again rose and said, it was not his intention on this day to say one word on the education question. The Catholic bishops would assemble in synod on Wednesday, for the purpose of considering the question, and, as he had previously stated, he would abide by that decision. But there was a portion of the Bill which claimed their especial attention—he alluded to the 10th clause, which vested in the Crown the government of the colleges and the visitorial power; and the 14th section, which had reference to the delivery of religious instruction. On that day week he would move that the two clauses he had adverted to be referred to the committee of the Association for consideration. He had to give notice of motion for the next day of meeting, having reference to the future conduct of the Association. During the last year, they had not progressed as far towards the accomplishment of the Repeal as they ought to have done. A combination of circumstances had prevented them. They were occupied with the deplorable discussion on the Bequest Act, and then that on the Maynooth Bill succeeded. He could not advert to the Maynooth Bill without again bearing testimony to the admirable character of that measure. On the next day of meeting he would move first that the Association should pledge itself to the extension of the Repeal reading-rooms; secondly, to discourage by every possible means the circulation at public meetings of any kind of documents or language of an inflammatory character; thirdly, that an arrangement be entered into for the effective registration of Repealers in every county town and borough in Ireland; and fourthly, that means be taken by which petitions from every county, town, village, and hamlet in favour of a Repeal of the Union should be prepared. By the adoption of the latter proposition they would be enabled to have two millions of signatures to petitions against the commencement of the next session, and every day during its sitting from three to five should be presented. The British Legislature should be kept constantly alive to the determination of the people of Ireland never to desist till they obtained the object for which they were contending. He regarded the Oregon question as anything but settled, and believed the period might not be far distant when they would be exposed to all the horrors of a destructive war. If England enlisted the people of Ireland in her cause, she might set America and the world at defiance. The conciliation of Ireland was now acknowledged by British statesmen to be a principle, and he trusted they would carry it out with liberality. Mr. O'Connell then adverted to the interview between Sir J. Graham and the Lord Mayor of Dublin on the subject of the Queen's visit to Ireland. He regarded the conduct of Sir J. Graham on that occasion as perfectly ridiculous. Sir J. Graham declared that Her Majesty never had the slightest intention of going to Ireland, whilst on the other hand they had the explicit declaration of the Lord Mayor, made at a recent civic dinner, that Her Majesty had resolved on visiting her Irish subjects. He felt it difficult to account for these contradictory statements. A newspaper paragraph had been quoted against them. What had they to do with any newspaper? There was not a member of the press in the Association. Speeches made in that hall had also been referred to, and a statement founded upon them that we had altered our intentions with regard to the visit of the Queen. Any sentiments uttered in that hall would not be disavowed. What they originally proposed was not to postpone the agitation during the visit of Her Majesty, but to mitigate it. Subsequently came the declaration of Mr. Macaulay, which he regarded as a declaration of war against Ireland: and if their sentiments had undergone any alteration, it was in consequence of that declaration. They would obey the law, and set Mr. Macaulay at defiance. If Her Majesty should come to Ireland she would be received with all the loyalty and affection due to her as a queen and a woman. Mr. O'Connell brought forward the report of the committee of the Association on the subject of land in Ireland, and then proceeded at considerable length to enumerate the grievances of the present system, and the privations under which the agricultural population of Ireland laboured. He was anxious to know what measures Government proposed introducing with regard to this question, and urged upon them the necessity there existed for immediate relief. If the Government propositions were of a beneficial character, they would be acknowledged with gratitude by the people of Ireland. After some further business had been disposed of, Mr. O'Connell announced the rent for the week to be 432*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*

(Signed) Beaufort; Normanby." Anti-Repealer.—Mr. Moore, the breeder of this horse, has announced that he was named for the Derby by Capt. Miscellaneous.

The Agricultural Mind (from the "Paris Charivari.")—There is at this moment an Agricultural Congress sitting in the Luxembourg. M. Decazes is the President, because M. Decazes is an owner of iron works. It has been said that agriculture is a calm and tranquil profession, the friend of repose, not wishing to be talked of. There are many academicians who invariably say, when speaking of people devoted to tillage—"The peaceful agriculturists." It is high time to reduce this pastoral paradox to its true value. I know nothing less calm, less tranquil, less the friend of repose, than a farmer. If the Government were to charge me with the execution of a statue of Agriculture for the Luxembourg Gardens, I would represent her with a head-dress of serpents, like Tisiphone of yore. No poet has ever thought of saying, "the peaceful locksmiths, the peaceful masons, the peaceful blacksmiths," and yet what a difference between these and farmers! Did you ever hear a locksmith complain! See with what placidity the mason eats his morsel of cheese, and drinks his wine at noon! And the blacksmith!—did you ever set your foot into his forge without hearing his merry song amidst the crash of his hammer! Those are what I call peaceful people. The farmer, on the contrary, is a Vesuvius, an Etna, a Chimborazo, ever in eruption. He has always somebody or something to abuse: now it is the rain, now the wind, and now the sun. What one sells him he always pays too dear for, and what he sells is always too cheap. I shall end by believing that Beans and Barley infect men with hydrophobia. If a man becomes connected in any way with the country, he grows instantly fierce and monomaniac. The butcher, who lives up to the elbows in blood, has a jolly rosy face, and a smile full of goodness; the labourer is sombre, morose, taciturn, a man who never laughs. If the farmer is captious, discontented, and jealous, what shall we say of Agriculture herself! The history of this science, which Virgil celebrated in soft strains in the Georgics, is nothing but a long string of faults and mistakes—we will not say crimes, if we did, our peaceful agriculturists would tilt at us with pitchforks. Agriculture, as represented by agricultural congresses, has always tried to hamper all advances in the science. When Tobacco appeared, an agricultural congress decided the plant was poison! Coffee was poison, Potatoes were poison. The congress now sitting has not had the face to declare Sesame a poison, but it has proclaimed that it will ruin the land—a new theory of poison. As a general rule, then, Agriculture is always grumbling. If the King of the French were to go and sow the plain of St Denis every spring after the Chinese fashion, Agriculture would still find out that honours enough were not paid her. This year Agriculture demands the creation of a Ministry for herself. She could not think of being contented with half a Ministry. In its two last sittings the congress has decided on submitting the following propositions to the Government:—"1. No third melodramatic theatre, for that would hurt Agriculture. "2. No treaty against Belgian pirated editions, for that would hamper Agriculture. "3. No completion of the Place du Carrousel, for that would retard the progress of Agriculture." It is only against the fortifications, which have snatched such a large space from Agriculture, that MM. Decazes and Darblay have nothing to protest. As medals do not seem to these gentlemen a sufficient recompense, they have demanded that crosses of honour and gold snuff-boxes be awarded to prize oxen and fatted calves. We, in our turn, demand that a civic crown of guano be decreed to the two chiefs of the agricultural congress."

CORNS AND BUNIONS.

Patronised by the Royal Family, Nobility, Clergy, &c.

PAUL'S EVERY MAN'S FRIEND is a sure and speedy cure for those severe annoyances without causing the least pain or inconvenience.

Unlike all other remedies for corns, its operation is such as to render the cutting of the corns altogether unnecessary (indeed, we may say, the practice of cutting corns is at all times highly dangerous, and has been frequently attended with lamentable consequences, besides its liability to increase their growth); it adheres with the most gentle pressure, producing an instant and delightful relief from torture, and, with perseverance in its application, entirely eradicates the most inveterate corns and bunions.

Testimonials have been received from upwards of one hundred Physicians and Surgeons of the greatest eminence.

Prepared by JOHN FOX, in boxes, at 1*s.* 1½*d.*, or three in one for 2*s.* 9*d.*, and to be had of C. KING, Napier-street, near the Albert Saloon, Hoxton, London; and all wholesale and retail medicine venders in town and country. The genuine has the name of JOHN FOX on the stamp.

A 2*s.* 9*d.* box cures the most obdurate corns.

FOR THE HAIR.—Admirably efficacious and unerringly certain in its operation, highly approved in the leading circles of fashion, and extensively demanded by all who cultivate the graces of the toilette, is

C. & A. OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA.

Sold by the Proprietors, 1, Wellington-street, Strand, (two doors from the corner), and by most respectable Perfumers and Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom.

IT STRENGTHENS AND NOURISHES, exerting a healthy influence, and occasioning an ample and luxuriant growth of hair:

PRESERVES,

where the hair is already full, the conservative properties of the Balm maintain it in strength and luxuriance;

RESTORES,

when weak or falling off the Balm completely restores. In the event of partial or entire baldness, its renovating influences, except with the extremely old, produce an entirely new growth, unlike the action of ordinary stimulants, which spoil the hair, inducing an elegant wave or curl, and a rich beautiful appearance, AND CLEANSES THE HAIR.

BEAUTIFIES,

The Balm is peculiarly valuable as a detergent, cleansing in the most complete and agreeable manner; and for young people superseding, as the most respectable heads of schools can testify, the use of the fine comb.

THE NURSERY.

The peculiar mildness of the Balm, the action of which can be regulated at discretion, specially suits infancy and childhood. No well-regulated Nursery can dispense with it again. Price 3*s.* 6*d.*, 6*s.*, and 11*s.* per bottle. No other prices are genuine.

OLDRIDGE'S BALM, 1, WELLINGTON-STREET (the second house from the Strand).

THE ATRAPILATORY, OR LIQUID HAIR DYE; the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-doing, but as the hair grows it never fades or acquires that unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence, recommend the above dye as infallible, if done at their establishment; and ladies or gentlemen requiring it, are requested to bring a friend or servant with them to see how it is used, which will enable them to do it afterwards without the chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and some of their establishment having used it, the effect produced can be at once seen. They think it necessary to add, that by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.

Address ROSS and SONS, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, the celebrated Perruquiers, Perfumers, Hair-cutters, and Hair-dyers. N.B. Parties attended at their own residence, whatever the distance.

HORTICULTURAL IMPROVEMENTS.—J. READ begs leave to inform Ladies, Amateurs, and Practical Gardeners, that—after 31 years' experience in Practical Gardening in all its departments of vegetation, and mechanical cultivation of trees, plants, &c. &c., from the Apple to the Grape, Peach, and Pine; and 25 years' practice in manufacturing of Syringes, Machines, and Engines for destroying those Animalculæ which make such deadly havoc on all choice fruit trees and plants at this season of the year—he has just taken out a NEW PATENT for certain Improvements in the above Machines, which surpass anything of the kind he ever made before, and without any increase of price. J. R. will warrant the Valves to be kept in repair during the term of the Patent. They may be seen and proved at 35, Regent Circus, Piccadilly.

N.B. None are genuine except Stamped with the Patentee's name.

NEW ENVELOPE.—In consequence of the great variety of counterfeit Envelopes of ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, and other disreputable means resorted to by unprincipled individuals for imposing on the public their highly pernicious compounds under the title of "KALYDOR," the Proprietors and sole Preparers of the Original and Genuine Preparation acting under a sense of duty, and regardless of expense in the attainment of their object—THE PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC FROM FRAUD AND IMPOSITION, have employed those celebrated artists, Messrs. Perkins, Bacon, and Co., who have succeeded, at a great cost, in producing from a steel plate a NEW ENVELOPE of exquisite beauty.

It comprises a highly-finished engraving of the GRECIAN GRACES standing on a classic pedestal, on each side of which is a rich profusion of flowers springing from an elegant cornucopia; these tastefully blending with Arabesque scrolls and wreaths, encircle the royal arms of Great Britain, surmounting the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," &c. &c. &c., whilst a plinth at the foot displays the Signature of the Proprietors, in red, thus—

20, Hatton Garden, A. ROWLAND & SON.

MEEN FUN, the celebrated Chinese Cosmetic, Patronised by the Queen and the Royal Family.—The great value of this Cosmetic is, that the ingredients being solely herbaceous the most delicate complexion can apply it without injury, while rough, red, and moist skins speedily experience beneficial results. Another most important feature is that of repressing, without detriment to the sanatory condition of the user, the truly unpleasant sensation accompanying too copious perspiration. Travellers and residents in warm climates, subject to the enervating influence of tropical heat, will, when the skin becomes moist and heated, experience inconceivable comfort by resorting to this Cosmetic, as it will both allay and avert discoloration and coarseness. Sold retail by all respectable perfumers, chemists, &c., in boxes price 3*s.* 6*d.* and 7*s.* 6*d.* each, and wholesale by the Proprietors, FABIAN and Co., late Watson, Fabian, and Co., 24, Mark-lane, London. Country agents required.

At the last investigation, ending 31st December, 1844, a Bonus of £1 10*s.* per cent. on the sums assured was declared for every annual Premium paid during the septennial period. News of the Week.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S resolutions on the condition of the labouring classes, which he submitted to the House of Commons on Monday night, have supplied the chief topic of interest during the past week. His lordship in a series of nine general resolutions expounded the principles which he esteemed beneficial to the present state of the country. The first subject to which he called attention was the national debt and currency, which he considered one of the most influential causes of the depression of the labouring classes. He then proceeded to the questions of free trade and monopoly, advocated the abandonment of protective duties altogether, and contended that the sliding-scale had proved a total failure to all classes. His lordship said that as an abstract proposition he would recommend no duty on corn at all, but if he were called upon to make any other proposal, he would not again suggest a fixed duty of 8*s.* but one of 6*s.*, or even one as low as 4*s.*, being convinced that the labourers had always been losers by the high price of corn, and gainers by the low price. His Lordship then adverted to the New Poor-law, which he praised for having improved wages; but at the same time he thought that it should be modified in order to give a right of settlement to an industrious residence of five years, and also to give a temporary settlement to residence for shorter periods. After describing what he believed to be the proper principles of emigration, his Lordship arrived at the question of education, and showed by statistical returns, that while missionaries are sent out to preach the gospel in foreign parts, there are districts of England in which the duties, and even the name of Christianity, are scarcely understood. He implored the House not to allow religious differences to delay the remedy for this state of moral and spiritual darkness; but at once, and with a liberal hand, to establish schools for all who would apply for them, and to ask Parliament for an increased grant for the purpose. His lordship contended that no measures of education would avail, unless the physical condition of the people were at the same time considered; and on the other hand he expressed his firm conviction that no measures of free-trade would effectually relieve industry, unless they be accompanied by other measures for securing to the people a moral and religious education. At the close of Lord J. Russell's speech, Mr. Sharman Crawford moved, as an amendment, the addition of a paragraph in favour of an extension of the suffrage. The debate which followed presented no feature of particular interest—Ministers contenting themselves with opposing the resolutions, on the general ground that their adoption would lead to no practical result; and that the example of the Maynooth Bill proved how much easier it was to propound measures than to carry them. Sir R. Peel gave his cordial assent to Lord J. Russell's proposition, that protection was, in itself, an evil; and said he had endeavoured to reduce its amount so far as it could be safely done with a view to the mighty interests it involved. The House, after two nights' debate, negatived Mr. Crawford's amendment by 253 to 33, and then negatived Lord J. Russell's resolutions by 182 to 104. In the House of Lords on Monday, Lord Cottenham's Bill for the consolidation of the Ecclesiastical Courts was read a second time. This measure is substantially the same as that introduced by Government unsuccessfully in 1843. Its principal feature is the establishment of a central Court in London, so that in future every will and testamentary document may be found in the metropolis. In regard to church-rates, the Bill proposes an appeal to Quarter Sessions when the rate has been illegally levied, and in regard to tithes, it proposes that the power of the Ecclesiastical Courts be abolished altogether, and pending suits transferred to the Court of Chancery.

From France, we learn that the Emperor of Morocco has refused to ratify the treaty concluded with the French Commissioner, on the ground that Gen. Delarue bribed the Emperor's Commissioners, and thereby obtained the cession of territory to which France has no kind of title. It is said that the French Government do not attempt to justify their commissioner, and that he will forthwith be disavowed.—From Spain we have the important intelligence that Don Carlos has abdicated all pretensions to the throne of Spain in favour of his son, the Prince of Asturias. This measure is said to have been adopted with the concurrence of the French Government, and it is believed to be the precursor of a renewed attempt to effect a marriage between the young Prince and his cousin Queen Isabella.

COURT.—The Queen, Prince Albert, and the royal family, continue at Buckingham Palace, having arrived in town on Monday from Claremont. Her Majesty's birth-day, on Saturday, was celebrated at Claremont by a serenade from the band of the Grenadier Guards. On Monday morning the Queen attended the rehearsal of the Concert of Ancient Music, and in the evening accompanied Prince Albert to the Haymarket Theatre, to witness the performance of the American actor, Mr. Hackett. On Tuesday, the day appointed for the official observance of the Queen's birth-day, Her Majesty held a drawing-room at St. James's Palace, which was attended by an unusual number of the nobility and gentry; and in the evening the Cabinet Ministers and the great officers of State gave State entertainments in honour of the day. On Wednesday Her Majesty gave a dinner to the directors of the Concerts of Ancient Music, and afterwards attended the performance of the evening's concert, of which Prince Albert was the director, on behalf of the King of Hanover. On Thursday the Queen and Prince Albert took their usual walks in the royal gardens of Buckingham Palace, and Prince Albert afterwards transacted business at the office of the Duchy of Cornwall.

Dwelling-house and Window-tax.—By a return to an Order of the House of Commons, dated 18th February, 1845, it appears that the total number of dwelling-houses in the United Kingdom at the census of 1841, was as follows:—In England, 3,144,641; in Ireland, 1,384,360; and in Scotland, 529,524; being a total of 5,058,525. The number of houses assessed to the window-duty during the same year was, in England, 414,395; and in Scotland, 33,025; total, 447,420. Whilst the amount of duty was, in England, 1,716,331*l.* for the year 1841, and 1,618,932*l.* for the year 1844; in Scotland, 114,126*l.* for 1841, and 121,468*l.* for 1844; making together a total of 1,830,457*l.* for 1841, and 1,743,400*l.* for 1844.

Fire Insurances.—From a return obtained by Colonel Sibthorp, M.P., relative to fire-insurances, it appears that during the year 1844 the gross total amount of the sums insured by all the fire-offices, in town and country, on farming stock, exempt from duty, was 54,927,572*l.*, namely, 16,375,817*l.* in the quarter ending the 25th of March, 1844; 5,080,772*l.* in the quarter ending the 24th of June, 1844; 8,199,208*l.* in the quarter ending the 29th of September, 1844; and 25,271,775*l.* in the quarter ending Christmas-day, 1844.

Glass.—Mr. Ord, M.P., has obtained, by order of the House of Commons, returns of the amount of duties charged, and drawbacks paid, on glass, and of the quantities imported and exported, retained for home consumption, and remaining in bond, for the year ending 5th January, 1845. It appears from this paper that the following were the quantities of glass charged and the amount of duty respectively imposed on the different descriptions of glass in England during the year 1844-5, viz. :—Flint-glass, 9,529,294lb., and 55,271*l.*; plate-glass, 29,765 cwt., and 93,759*l.*; crown-glass, 99,180 cwt., and 382,710*l.*; German sheet-glass, 31,560 cwt., and 121,782*l.*; common bottle-glass, 345,810 cwt., and 127,084*l.* The quantities exported upon which drawback was allowed, were of flint-glass, 11,277 cwt.; of plate glass, 116,955 feet; of crown-glass in tables, 1,527 cwt.; of crown glass in panes, 6,661 cwt.; of German sheet-glass, 7,656 cwt.; and of common bottle-glass, 213,056 cwt. It further appears, that the quantities of glass retained for home consumption in the United Kingdom for the year 1844-45 were, of flint-glass, 83,712 cwt.; of plate-glass, 24,405 cwt.; of crown-glass, 93,347 cwt.; of German sheet-glass, 23,175 cwt.; and of common bottle-glass, 193,108 cwt. The net amount of duty received thereon amounted to the sum of 645,715*l.* The amount of drawback or allowance on glass for the use of churches during the year 1844-45 was 1,343*l.* The quantities imported into the United Kingdom during the same period, from various countries of Europe, &c., were,—of crown or any window-glass not exceeding one-ninth of an inch in thickness, 6,680 cwt.; of German sheet-glass, white or coloured, 1,280 cwt.; of all glass one-ninth of an inch in thickness—all silvered or polished glass, of whatever thickness—and plate glass, however small each pane, plate, or sheet, 18,915 square feet (superficial measure); and of flint and cut glass 2,883 cwt. The quantities exported from the united kingdom of the same description of glass as those which we have already enumerated above were respectively, 6,241 cwt.; 906 cwt.; 16,971 square feet; and 1,448 cwt. The quantities of British glass exported from England in 1844-45 were,—of flint, 11,277 cwt.; of plate, 116,955 feet; of crown, in tables, 1,526 cwt.; of crown, in panes, 6,661 cwt.; of German sheet glass, 17,695 cwt.; and of common bottle glass, 213,056 cwt.

The New Slave-Trade Treaty.—The new slave-trade treaty has been signed this week, and the Duke de Broglie will probably leave England in a day or two. He is expected to reach Paris by Monday or Tuesday; Prince Charles, his son, and secretary to the mission, left on Saturday. The preamble of the new treaty sets forth that the Queen of England and King of France (the parties most deeply bound to the execution of this duty from their superior naval resources) deeming that the treaties of 1831 and 1833 have produced all the effect they were capable of, are desirous of forming another compact suited to the present emergency, in order more effectually to repress the slave-trade. They have accordingly drawn up the present treaty, which will consist of 10 articles, and be limited in its duration to 10 years, subject to revocation at the expiration of five years, if its operation is found to be unsatisfactory to the interests of either of the parties. It is therefore arranged that France shall keep on the western coast of Africa a fleet consisting half of steamers and half of sailing ships, the number amounting to not less than 26; and that the naval force employed by England will be of the same character, calibre, and amount, exercising simultaneously the vigilance on the flags of their respective nations. Perfect amity between the two nations being the great object in view, it is hoped that all jealousies and complaints will be obviated by the ships of war of each nation visiting the vessels under their own flags. They will, however, possess the power of stopping all vessels they meet, and ascertaining by their papers whether they belong to the country whose flag they bear. By the number and simultaneous presence of the ships of the two nations, it is believed that any ill consequences from this new arrangement will be avoided. As soon as the articles of the treaty were agreed upon, their tenour was communicated to the representatives of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, at this Court.

East Indian Pensions.—The Directors of the East India Company have granted to Lady Nott, widow of the late Major-General Sir William Nott, an annuity, during widowhood, of 200*l.*; and to the daughters of the deceased, Letitia and Charlotte Nott, whilst unmarried, annuities of 100*l.* each. It is also announced that Mohan Lal, the distinguished moonshee, whose name is so honourably known to the English public in connection with our disasters in Affghanistan, in which country he not only rendered our countrymen signal service, but was mainly instrumental in rescuing the captives of Akbar Khan, has been rewarded by the East India Directors with a pension of 1000*l.* a year.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The news of the refusal of the Emperor of Morocco to ratify the treaty concluded between his commissioners and General Delarue, the French commissioner of which a rumour was current in Paris last week, is confirmed by later accounts, received from Tangier. The Opposition papers take credit to themselves on this occasion for the foresight with which they predicted the difficulty of concluding any treaty that would be respected by the Emperor, but none of them blame or even allude to the conduct of General Delarue in the transaction. It is not denied that the reason given by the Emperor for not ratifying the treaty is that his commissioners exceeded the powers entrusted to them, and instead of making a treaty of limitation made a treaty of commerce, and actually ceded territory to France to which it has no pretence of a title. Neither is there any attempt made to deny that General Delarue bribed the Emperor's commissioners, and by these means obtained the cession of the territory in question, although it never belonged to the Algerine territory. For yielding to such practices the Emperor has imprisoned his commissioners; but the Paris Opposition papers do not see anything in the conduct of General Delarue that calls for reprobation or even blame. It is said, however, that the Government, finding it discreditable to be considered privy to such a transaction, is glad to escape the odium and responsibility of it, by disavowing the negotiator. The following are the remarks of the Opposition paper, Constitutionnel:—

"A council of Ministers was held on Saturday relative to the affairs of Morocco. It is stated that the resolution come to was such as might be expected from the Cabinet which signed the treaty of Tangiers, disavowed MM. Dupetit Thouars and d'Aubigny, and indemnified Mr. Pritchard. The convention negotiated by M. Delarue had a double object—to regulate the question of limits, and to assure to our commerce certain commercial advantages. It was the execution of two articles of the treaty of Tangiers. The convention has just been ratified by France, but the Emperor Abderrahman, disavowing his plenipotentiaries, refuses the ratification. What course will be taken? The matter is perfectly simple. General Delarue will be disavowed without noise, and a new negotiation commenced. It will be stated, it is already said, that M. Delarue has gone beyond his instructions, and that he was too exacting with regard to that Moorish Government which has given us so many proofs of good feeling and deference. . . . The convention relative to the limits will be annulled, and a portion of the territory claimed by Abderrahman will be restored to him; and, as to the commercial question, it will be abandoned or its consideration indefinitely postponed, to please the Emperor of Morocco as well as another Power." These are the political exploits by which our Ministry intends to inspire the tribes of Morocco with respect for France, and to perpetuate the recollection of the victory of Isly! We shall afterwards behold M. Guizot or M. Duchatel endeavouring to demonstrate that their condescension has impressed the Moors with a high opinion of France. Thus have the evacuation of Mogador and the treaty of Tangier consolidated the Emperor and weakened Abd-el-Kader."

The Ministerial Débats confirms the statement of the Emperor's refusal to ratify the treaty for fixing the boundaries of Morocco and Algeria, and gives the subjoined extract from a letter dated Tangiers, the 5th May:—"It appears certain that the Emperor has ordered his plenipotentiary, Sid-Ahmed-el-Khadir, to be thrown into prison on his arrival at Fez. That envoy is said to have exceeded his powers in negociating a treaty of commerce which he had no instructions to enter into; it is also said that a portion of territory belonging to Morocco has been ceded which never formed part of the Algiers regency. Be this as it may, the circumstance of the imprisonment of El-Khadir gives rise to the apprehension that the convention will not be ratified by the Emperor. It is likewise said that the Emperor has sent a party of soldiers to seize the Kaid of Ouschda, Sid-Hamida, who acted with El-Khadir as plenipotentiary." All the published accounts attribute the Emperor's refusal to the question of the boundary, but in Paris it is currently reported and believed that it was on a representation or protest of Great Britain that the treaty, which was all but concluded, had been abandoned. By that treaty, it is said, merchandise, the growth or manufacture of France and Morocco respectively, was to be admitted into either country duty free, while goods the produce of, or conveyed from England, were upon importation into Morocco to be subject to duty.—Queen Pomare has again the honour of attracting the attention of the whole Paris press. Her epistle to the King of the French, published in the Sandwich Island's print, the Polynesian, and the last tidings from her dominions, also received through this country, supply the journals of Tuesday with their leading themes. The Ministerial papers insert the letter at length, one of them begging leave to question the habitual veracity of the "correspondance anglaises," and a second suspecting that the letter has been "elaborated in the office of an English newspaper." The Presse says, in regard to this letter:—"It is a long memoir addressed by Queen Pomare to the King of the French. In this memoir the Queen, or rather the missionary who hold her pen, relates in his manner the facts which have passed since the year 1838, and with which every one is acquainted. It follows, of course, that accusations of violence, of bad faith, and of rapine, are lavished on our officers, particularly on Admiral Dupetit Thouars and Captain Laplace. The hatred of the missionaries to the Catholic religion, and to the French name, betrays itself in every line of this long address. What is most striking and most characteristic is, that the Queen has sent a copy of her letter to Kamehameha, third King of the Sandwich Islands, with a request that he would insert it in the Polynesian, an English journal published in Honolulu. How probable that this recourse to the press should be the act of a poor ignorant woman! Moreover, her letter is countersigned by a certain George Platt, and its contents breathe from one end to the other the perfume of the doctrines preached at Exeter hall. 'Beware of the Roman Catholics, and of all the friends of the Roman Catholics,' Queen Pomare is made to say, by way of greeting, to King Kamehameha." The Republican National observes that "Queen Pomare demands the pure and simple abolition of the French protectorate. She wishes to resume the sovereignty, and wishes to govern according to her pleasure, without the intervention of the French authorities. We foresaw this conclusion, which was inevitable. In the same manner as the protectorate conduced so fatally to the occupation of Tahiti, so the abandonment of the occupation led necessarily to the abandonment of the protectorate; and this last solution became inevitable from the moment that, at the instigation of the English, Pomare placed herself, with her own free will, in a position which rendered it impossible for her to live in good intelligence with us. By what expedient will our Government endeavour to extricate itself from its present position; Will it retain possession of Tahiti? It cannot. The motives which compelled it to disavow Admiral Dupetit Thouars still subsist. What England would not consent to a year since she will not agree to at present. Will our Government re-establish the protectorate? How can it, since Pomare and the chiefs who have remained faithful to her will not consent on any terms? One only resource remains,—to abandon Tahiti! This is the most disgraceful, and consequently the most easy solution. In presence of these grave events the Chambers will perhaps recollect that they are invested with a political capacity. We trust that they will not suffer the opportunity afforded by the debate on the Algerian budget to pass without demanding from the Government precise information on the foreign relations of France."—The Chamber of Peers adopted on Monday the Customs' Bill by a majority of 83 to 17. Before the division, a motion brought forward by the Baron de Daunant, to the effect that India and China silks should be entirely prohibited, instead of being subjected, as at present, to a duty of 20 francs per kilogramme, was rejected. On Friday Count Roy presented the report of the committee upon the Bill which lately passed the other Chamber for reducing the Five per Cent. stock. The committee pronounce the measure most unlawful, and unanimously propose rejecting the Bill. The Chamber of Deputies voted on Thursday the Northern Railroad Bill by a majority of 253 against 10. The 5th article, amended by the Committee, and adopted by the Assembly, prohibited the negotiation of the receipts or promises of shares, and declared the subscribers answerable for four-tenths of the amount of the shares for which they might have subscribed. The report of the committee on the Paris and Lyons, and Lyons and Avignon Railways Bill is entirely favourable to the bill as introduced by the Government. It is opposed to the establishment of a common terminus for that line and the Orleans one, but it recommends the Minister of Public Works to concede to the latter company the extension line from Corbeil to Melun. It has placed at the charge of the Lyons to Avignon Company the branch line to Grenoble, without however designating the course to be taken; and lastly it has maintained the term of 45 years for the Lyons line, and 55 for that of Avignon. The committee on M. Remusat's proposal for declaring various offices incompatible with the functions of a member of the Chamber, have reported against the measure. The Chamber has also rejected M. de Saint Priest's motion for increasing the effective force of the gendarmerie, and the Minister of Finance has presented a bill for enabling the Bank of France to establish a branch bank at Algiers.—The papers state that independently of the ships of the line and those of a smaller force appointed to cruise in the Mediterranean for practice, there is to be a division formed of steam-frigates. Admiral Parceval Deschenes will continue to command the first, and the Prince de Joinville the second, who will probably have the chief command, if the two squadrons act together.—The Courrier Français says that the Prince de Joinville received, as part of the dowry of the Princess, vast uncultivated domains in the province of St. Catherine. European colonists have been invited to go out there, and it would appear with success. A few days back a large envoy from Germany passed through Liege on its way to Dunkirk. Other emigrants are waiting at Antwerp for vessels sailing for New York. Their number amounts to between 800 and 900.—Prince Jerome Buonaparte visited, on Friday, the Hotel of the Invalides. His resemblance to Napoleon caused an immense excitement amongst the old soldiers, who crowded round the Emperor's nephew.—M. Guizot, whose health is rapidly recovering, comes every day from Passy to his office, but remains only a short time. The health of the wife of Don Carlos has improved.—The Presse announces that the apartments of Henry IV. in the Louvre, which are situate between the Egyptian Museum and the Spanish gallery, are being prepared for the reception of a visitor of distinction. It is said the Queen of England will be lodged in those apartments in case she should carry into execution her plan of a visit to Paris. She could in that case proceed to the Tuileries through a suite of apartments and of galleries of a greater extent than any which probably exist in the world.—Madame Ida St. Elme, who made a conspicuous figure in public life during the Consulate and the Empire, and has since, as "La Contemporaine," been notorious for her pretended exposures of Louis-Philippe, died in a hospital at Brussels on the 24th instant, in her 78th year.

SPAIN.—We learn, both from Paris and Madrid, that there is no longer any reason to doubt the truth of the rumour which has been for some time abroad with respect to Don Carlos's intention to abdicate in favour of his eldest son. The abdication is said to have been formally completed within the last few weeks. It is said that the French Government, being more and more convinced of the difficulty which the marriage of the Count de Trapani with the young Queen would encounter in Spain itself, has counselled this act as likely to lead to a marriage with the Prince of the Asturias, and as the only means of arriving at a settlement of the affairs of that country.—A telegraphic despatch was received in Paris on Monday announcing that the Queen of Spain closed the session of the Cortes in person on the 23d inst., and that the new constitution was promulgated the same day. Madrid journals of the 20th inst. state that in the sitting of the Senate on that day, several bills and the budget of receipts and expenses for the present year had been passed, and the President had informed the Chamber that it was the Queen's intention to prorogue the Cortes on the 23d. Her Majesty was to leave for Catalonia on the 24th, and to be accompanied by the President of the Council.—The failure of the negotiations with the Court of Rome continued to excite great uneasiness, and the funds had not recovered the depression produced by the first announcement of the result. The Heraldo freely admits that the Madrid Government has experienced a great disappointment in the turn the negotiations have taken, but says that it is not yet discouraged, but is determined to attempt the effect of further negotiations. It was said that the cabinet had resolved on appointing the Duke de Rivas ambassador at Rome, in place of M. Castillo. Others said that M. Castro y Orosco, the present President of the Chamber of Deputies, would be appointed. The Queen, after leaving Madrid on the 24th, was to proceed to Azanhuez—to rest in that royal residence on the 25th—to proceed on the 26th to Quintanar, to Albacete on the 27th, to Valencia on the 29th—to remain in that city on the 30th, 31st, and the 1st of June—to continue her journey to Castellon on the 2d, to Tortosa on the 3d, to Tarragona on the 4th, and to reach Barcelona on the 5th. Her Majesty will probably stop in the capital of Catalonia until the latter end of June, and then leave for Saragossa, where she will sojourn some days. She will afterwards visit Tudela and Pampeluna, traverse the Basque provinces, and spend some weeks at Deva, in Biscay, to enjoy sea-bathing. The Spanish Government, it is said, wish Queen Christina to retire from Spain, to which she does not wish to accede until the marriage of her daughter. It is believed, however, that the match with the Count de Trapani being at an end, Queen Christina will return to France after the proposed visit of Queen Isabella to Barcelona and the Basque provinces.

Belgium.—Brussels letters state that Mr. Mackenzie and an English party had obtained the final concession of two railways in Belgium—namely, the link of the State Railway from Tournay to Jurbise, and the line from Lauden to St. Trond and Hasselt, with a right of excursion from the last-named town to Maestricht. The same parties are said to have obtained, jointly with some Belgian capitalists, the concession of "several new lines of railway in Belgium, and of a short canal, which were deemed calculated to open up the rich and extensive coal field of the Mons district to Paris, and even the western departments of France."

Germany.—The Cologne Gazette states, from Hanover, the 18th, that the Princess Royal is expected shortly to give birth to an heir to the throne.—A letter from Friburg, May 16, states that an archiepiscopal circular issued a few days ago to the deaconries of the archbishoprics, announces to all the clergy of the diocese that Professor Dr. Schreiber, by joining the so-called German Catholics, is excommunicated.—An alleviation of the censorship in Austria is spoken of, Count Kallowrath having been heard to say that the present severity of the censorship was not in accordance with the wishes of His Majesty.

Switzerland.—A letter from Lucerne, of the 19th inst., announces that the Grand Council has granted Dr. Steiger a reprieve, and that hopes are entertained of his sentence of death being commuted into exile. The same letter states that eight of the political prisoners confined in the tower of the Hohenrain have effected their escape by breaking the bars of the window, and letting themselves down by means of a rope. Another account attributes the pardon of Dr. Steiger, to the demand of the cantons of Berne, Zurich, and Argovia, the representatives of which threatened that if he were executed the troops of those cantons would instantly march upon Lucerne.

Italy and Malta.—The widow of one of the brothers Bandiera died on the 15th at Venice, aged only 27. Her death is attributed chiefly to grief at the melancholy fate of her husband.—The King of Naples, with a view of exercising his fleet and army, is going to assemble the whole of his fleet, and several regiments of cavalry and infantry, at Messina, where a sham fight, upon a scale of splendour and magnificence never before seen, will take place. His Majesty was expected at Messina about the 20th inst.—Mr. Penrose, who some twelve months ago was sentenced to 10 years' confinement for a forgery committed on the navy when clerk in charge of her Majesty's steamer Polyphemus, has received a free pardon from Government, on the recommendation of the authorities at Malta. He has been in a very delicate state of health, having already entirely lost one of his lungs. The order for his release reached Malta on the 14th, and on the evening of that day he was put on board the Neapolitan steamer, which left for Naples. Had he but remained one day more, he would have been stopped by Sir Lucius Curtis, who had given orders for a civil proceeding against him, for debts due by the convict to his department.

Sweden and Norway.—The Diet of Sweden has responded to the appeal of the King in such a manner as to secure the abolition of slavery in the island of St. Bartholomew. This important intelligence has been communicated by Professor Geyer, of Stockholm, in the following letter to Mr. Scoble:—"Dear Sir,—I have delayed answering your last letter till I could give certain information of the state of the slavery question at the present Diet. I can now transmit to you the intelligence that the Estates have acceded to the proposition of the King concerning the emancipation of the slaves at St. Bartholomew, in voting 10,000 piastres yearly for five years, to be expended in redeeming the slaves of that island and compensating the loss of their masters. His Majesty feels deeply interested in that great question of justice and humanity." By this act freedom is secured to between 400 and 500 human beings now in slavery.—The Copenhagen Journal, of the 17th, publishes the text of a convention, concluded at Calcutta on the 2d Feb. last, relative to the sale of the Danish possessions in India. The possessions sold are the town of Tanquebar and its districts on the coast of Coromandel; Serampore, in Bengal; a territory in Ballassore, and all the royal domains in those possessions. The price of sale is 1¼ millions of rupees.

Russia.—Letters from Constantinople state that the campaign in the Caucasus will be commenced by the Russians this year with an immense force; but, at the same time, the brave mountaineers have not the smallest doubt of gaining the victory. In spite of all the precautions of the Russians, they have received considerable supplies of arms and ammunition from Turkey. There is at Constantinople a society of enemies to the Russians, chiefly consisting of Poles, which has considerable pecuniary resources, and provides the Circassians not only with all requisite ammunition, but able European officers. The society is closely connected with the Poles who have deserted from the Russians to the Caucasus, and has its emissaries in the Russian army to assist the Poles in the service to desert.—An ordinance of the Council of Administration of Warsaw directs that, after the 1st of July this year, no Jew of either sex should be permitted to have a public-house in the villages, nor to manufacture, distil, or sell, any home-made liquors, either under their own names, or the names of others, as partners, factors, or assistants; nor after that day shall any Jew reside in a public-house, distillery, or brewhouse.

Egypt.—Mr. Bourne, president of the Foreign Letter Office, sent out by Lord Lowther, to enter into a postal treaty with Mehemet Ali, about 10 months back, has returned to London, his mission having entirely failed. The Pacha entered into a five years' treaty, and expected the British Government to have ratified it, but it was objected to in consequence of the Pacha's determination to retain the monopoly of the transit of the passengers through Egypt.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—After the preliminary business noticed in our last, Earl Fitzwilliam moved for a select committee to take into consideration the practicability and expediency of establishing a principle of compensation to landowners whose lands should have been compulsorily sold to railway companies; and also to take into consideration all questions of severance and injury by railways. The noble Earl stated the plan which he proposed to submit to the committee. He said that there were various principles by which the price of land might be determined. One mode, he thought, might be by a reference to the previous value of the land, which might be arrived at by the medium of valuation. Another principle might be, a consideration of what would be the value of the land, not only to the existing proprietor, but to the company that proposed to purchase it.—Lord Stanley, on the part of the Government, made no objection to the granting of the committee, though he confessed he had no hope that their labours would result in any practicable principle that would be generally applicable to cases in themselves so generally different. Of the two propositions shadowed by Lord Fitzwilliam, Lord Stanley said one appeared to him to be quite unreasonable, and the other wholly useless, as not meeting any of the real difficulties of the question.—After remarks from Lord Brougham, the Earl of Wicklow, the Marquis of Londonderry, and Lord Hatherton, the committee was appointed.

Monday.—On the motion of Lord Campbell, a Bill for the registration of all deeds and instruments respecting real property in England and Wales, founded on the report of the Real Property Commission, was read a first time.—Lord Brougham questioned the Government respecting the alleged misconduct of Mr. O'Driscoll lately at the Skibbereen sessions, who, according to a French newspaper, had been dismissed from the commission of the peace for having provoked a brother magistrate to commit a breach of the peace, and notwithstanding this dismissal had been again restored to the bench.—The Lord Chancellor replied that he had heard nothing of the affair, but that he would write to the Irish Lord Chancellor to inquire into the facts.—A conversation followed on the antecedent history of Mr. O'Driscoll, who had been twice before deprived of the commission of the peace for intemperate conduct.—A great number of petitions were presented against the Maynooth Bill; amongst others, one signed by 240 of the Irish clergy, presented by the Bishop of Cashel, in the prayer of which the right reverend prelate said he entirely concurred.—The Bishop of London likewise presented petitions to the same effect, which he heartily supported.—Lord Stanley stated that in the course of next week he should lay on the table the Tenants' Improvement Compensation Bill, and that other measures, founded on the report of the Irish Land Commission, would be brought forward as soon as they were in a state of forwardness.—Lord Cottenham moved the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Courts Consolidation Bill. It was, he said, the same as that introduced by the Government last year. All agreed that it would operate for the general interests of the country, though it might affect local and peculiar interests. The principal feature of the Bill was that a central court should be established in London, to which all wills should be sent, and that it should have surrogates acting in the towns where the diocesan courts were now held, who should grant probates when the amount of property was small, but be obliged in every case to send the will to London to be registered, so that in future time every man's testamentary dispositions might be found in the metropolis. In questions of divorce and excommunication this central court would retain the power of the old courts. In the matter of church-rates, over which the jurisdiction of these courts had caused so much ill-will, he proposed an appeal to quarter sessions, where the rate had been illegally levied; and in that of tithes, he thought the power of these courts should be abolished altogether, and that pending suits should be transferred to the Court of Chancery.—The Bishop of Lincoln did not agree to all its details, but would not oppose the second reading.—Lord Brougham supported it.—The Lord Chancellor said he would give the Bill his cordial support. Indeed, he should be ill-pleased if he were not to do so, because it was substantially the same measure as that which had been introduced by the Government unsuccessfully, in 1843.—The Earl of Winchilsea thought it would give great cause of discontent to the body of the people.—The Bill was read a second time.—The Carlow Printing and the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bills were read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—Mr. S. Wortley moved a resolution that the following clause be inserted in all Railway Bills passing through the House:—"And be it further enacted, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to exempt the Railway by this or the said recited Acts authorised to be made from the provisions of any General Act relating to such Railway or any General Act relating to Railways which may hereafter pass during the present or any future session of Parliament."—Lord Howick supported the motion, with additional words providing exemption from future increase of rates and charges. After a discussion the debate on the motion and amendment was adjourned.—Sir V. Blake gave notice of two resolutions, which he is to bring forward on the 10th June, the enactment of which raised great laughter. The first was, that it was indelicate, inconvenient, and inconsistent with the usages of Parliament that the avowed enemies of the Government should occupy the Government benches, and the second was, that members habitually using language inconsistent with the usages of civilised society, are guilty of the highest disrespect to the House; that for the first offence they be reprimanded, and for the second, if found incorrigible, be expelled.—The "dropped orders" of the previous night (as there was "no House") were disposed of for other occasions. One of them was the "Call of the House," on which Mr. Hume said that having ascertained from the clerks that sufficient members had been obtained for the public and private committees, he should best consult the convenience of the House by not preserving with his motion.—The second reading of the Academical Institutions (Ireland) Bill, on the order of the Day, was postponed till Friday (to-day) at the request of Sir R. Inglis, and the latter at the request of Mr. Hume.—On the motion for the House resolving itself into a committee of supply, Sir C. Napier explained the items which induced him to take the division on the first vote in the naval estimates—namely, on the vote [illegible] for naval stores—on the present question rather than in committee of supply. He did not object to the vote on account of the amount; but he did object to it on account of the [illegible] manner in which it had been hitherto expended. The gallant Commodore then repeated the criticisms which he has so frequently made in the course of the present session, on the reckless manner in which the Admiralty has laid down ships of the line, frigates, and steam-vessels of war during the last four or five years, and contended that all their experiments in naval architecture had been signal failures.—Mr. Soames complained of the manner in which Sir C. Napier endeavoured to disparage the construction of the vessels recently built by the Board of Admiralty. He had no hesitation in saying, that Her Majesty's steam-vessels of war, 104 in number, were superior to those of any other potentate in the world. Besides these 104 steam-vessels of war belonging to Her Majesty, we had also 150 steamers in our mercantile marine, which could speedily be converted into vessels of war, so that in case of emergency we were able to meet all the steam-vessels of the world in arms.—Captain Pechell [illegible] the statements of Sir C. Napier, and he said on Thursday next sending out some steam-vessels with the experimental squadron, to teach them the duties which they might have to perform in time of actual war.—Captain Fitzroy insisted that the course pursued by Sir C. Napier in constantly depreciating our navy, and in elevating the navy of other Powers, was calculated to do much harm. It was not the best way to encourage sailors to enter into the service of Her Majesty.—Sir G. Cockburn had answered on former occasions everything which Sir C. Napier had brought forward that evening, and therefore felt it necessary to apologise to the House for repeating again for the fifth or sixth time the refutation he had previously given. He then proceeded to describe the improvements which had recently taken place in our system of naval architecture, and informed the House that all our steam-vessels would be soon equipped with screws instead of paddles, and thus would carry their machinery under water. He defended in detail the construction of the different vessels impugned by Sir C. Napier, and observed with particular pleasure that after the alterations which had been recently made in the Queen's yacht she was now the most perfect vessel of her class in the world.—Mr. Hume was always sorry when any statement derogatory to the character and efficiency of our navy went abroad; but still, if there were defects in our navy, we ought to be obliged to those who pointed them out. What had occurred that evening increased the regret which he had always felt at our having put down the School of Naval Architecture nearly 30 years ago.—Captain Berkeley thanked Sir C. Napier, for bringing these matters before the House, and controverted the doctrine of Captain Fitzroy, that the discussion of them in public did harm. He denied that either he or any of his gallant friends on his side of the House had any pleasure in finding fault with the present Board of Admiralty.—After a few remarks from Mr. Bernal, who recommended the Admiralty to give every encouragement in their power, not only to the chief engineers, but also to their subordinate assistants, on board our steam-vessels, in order to induce them to stand as gallantly by their engines as our seamen stood by their guns, the conversation dropped.—The Speaker then left the chair, and the House resolved into committee of supply, when some progress was made with the naval estimates.—The House then resumed, and the other orders of the day were disposed of.

Monday.—The adjourned debate on Mr. S. Wortley's resolution respecting Railway Bills, and Lord Howick's amendment thereto, was resumed, and both resolution and amendment were agreed to.—In reply to a question from Mr. Labouchere, Sir G. Clerk said that it would be premature for Government, as yet, to give an opinion as to what could be done with the Railway Bills left unfinished at the end of the session. In his opinion, it was much better at present to let the parties go on under the impression that Parliament would adopt its usual course as regarded unfinished Bills.—In reply to Dr. Bowring, Mr. Cardwell said that the postal treaty with Sweden had expired, and it was not proposed to renew it, as the expenses were wholly disproportionate to the amount of revenue derived.—Lord J. Russell submitted to the House a series of nine resolutions respecting the labouring classes in England and Wales. The noble lord began his speech by confessing the vastness of the subject he was about to propound, and his inability to treat it adequately—but he depended, he said, on the House to contribute facts and opinions to elucidate the question. In explanation of the form of his motion, he admitted that, if he thought that any one of the measures he was about to propose could be carried by him, he should have proposed that measure substantively. But knowing that the Government discouraged all measures brought forward by private members, he felt that it would be idle for him to attempt to bring in a Bill, and, therefore, he had no alternative but to submit general resolutions to the House containing the principles which he esteemed sound and beneficial for the country at large. According to his view, his resolutions were closely connected together, because he believed that measures of free trade would not relieve industry from the trammels of legislation unless accompanied by other measures devised for instructing and educating the people morally and religiously; and that no measures of education would be acceptable unless the physical condition of the people were at the same time considered. Having established the intimate connection between his various resolutions, Lord J. Russell proceeded to trace the history of the national debt, and to review the changes which had taken place in the currency upon what he termed "the fatal measure of 1797." The national debt and the currency had, he had asserted, greatly deteriorated the condition of the labouring classes, and no alteration that could be now made in them would, in his opinion, contribute much to benefit the labourers. He then turned to the contemplation of the policy of "restriction or monopoly," which, however some might suppose an ancient, he maintained to be a modern system. He instanced the cases of wool and silk, as proof demonstrative that whenever protection was removed all parties benefitted by it. The manufacturers had, he said, adopted the principles of the political economists, that all restrictions are unjust, and particularly injurious to the labouring classes. He referred to the fears entertained by mechanics and small traders of the destructive effects of the tariff of 1842—all of which had turned out to be unfounded—and he called on the House not to hesitate to experimentalise with landed gentlemen and persons of great estate and dignities, in the same way as they had done with shoemakers, ropemakers, and other workmen. The noble lord quoted returns to show that the manufactures had not suffered from the reductions made in the duties, and he would therefore say, "Let us abandon altogether the protective duties!" Coming to the question of the Corn-law, he asserted that the sliding-scale, as well before as since the last alteration, had proved a total failure, and that it operated contrary to all commercial principles. It deprived the consumer of cheap food, it disappointed the farmer of the protection promised to him, it checked the improvement of the land, and it lessened the wages of labour. He read documents to establish that wages did not fall with the price of food; on the contrary, that the labourers had been always losers by the high price of corn, and gainers by the low price. He disclaimed having any distinct proposal to make on the subject of the next alteration that should be made in the corn duties; but if he had any proposal to make it should be a fixed duty, and not one of 8*s.*, but of 4*s.*, 5*s.*, or 6*s.*; and, as an abstract proposition, he would recommend no duty on corn at all. The noble lord then turned to regard the new Poor-law, which, he contended was a great improvement on the old, which, had it continued, would have reduced the labourer to the most deplorable state. The new law had improved wages, but he did not deem it sufficient to stand strictly on the principles of that law, and thought that Sir J. Graham should have persevered in his proposal of last year, to give a right of settlement to an industrious residence of five years, and also to give a temporary settlement to residence for shorter periods. Lord J. Russell then canvassed the merits of emigration, the very name of which he said had been made a perfect bugbear. Two principles should be attended to in every Government scheme for emigration; one, that those only should he sent out who were fit for hard labour, or able to endure temporary inconveniences, and the other, that the emigrants should not be taken indiscriminately, but selected for certain districts known to each other, and under the lead of persons who knew the colonies. He then arrived at the question of education, and read jail returns to show the gross state of ignorance in which the people still remain, notwithstanding the Government advances made for education during the last few years. There had been of late years great improvements made in the education of the people; but the latest accounts which he had seen upon that subject were contained in the last report of the British and Foreign School Society, and that, in alluding to the jail returns for the last year, showed that the House had still in this respect a great duty to perform. He implored the House, when it was taking measures to remove the restrictions imposed on the food and clothing of the poor, not to shut its eyes upon the awful state of ignorance in which a great mass of our population was buried. It ought never to be forgotten, that, whilst in this month of May pious men were subscribing their funds to enable missionaries to preach the gospel in China and in other foreign parts, there were numbers of persons in Sussex and other counties of England totally ignorant of every duty which a Christian ought to perform. He could not entertain a doubt that the House and the Government would both be anxious to remedy this lamentable deficiency. He knew that they should be met with the objection that we could not give the labouring population of this country a religious education, on account of the multiplicity of sects which prevailed among them. But this we could do—we could make a grant for educational purposes to those who applied for it—we could assist them in building schools, and in providing competent masters for those schools. It was the duty of the House to improve the education of the people; and it could be done in the way which he had stated without any violation of the rights of conscience. He asserted that their grant for education was at present insufficient, and thought that Ministers might safely ask Parliament this year for a grant of 150,000*l.* for the support and maintenance of schools in England and in Wales. These were the resolutions which he intended to propose—these were the outlines of the measure which he wished to have introduced for the amelioration of the condition of the country. The present time being a state of political calm and commercial prosperity, was well adapted for their consideration. He thought that unless they were persuaded that their system was most wholesome, they ought not to wait till the time of clamour arrived. What their measures might be then he could not tell; but in all probability they would be tinctured with the heats of such a time. He asked the House to consider these resolutions now, to adopt the one which he was about to put into the hands of the Speaker, and to add to it, if they pleased, any other resolution according to their own views of the interests of the country. His conviction was that the laws of the country would not long remain in their present condition. He therefore implored them to alter them at once, and to relieve the people from all the restraints and all the evils which their own pernicious legislation had imposed. The noble lord concluded by moving his first resolution:—"That the present state of political tranquillity, and the present revival of trade, afford to this House a favourable opportunity to consider of such measures as may tend permanently to improve the condition of the labouring classes."—Mr. S. CRAWFORD advanced his usual arguments in favour of the extension of the suffrage, and moved to insert in Lord J. Russell's resolution after the word "opportunity," the following words:—"To give immediate attention to the claims so repeatedly urged in the petitions of the people for an extension of the Parliamentary suffrage." He then proceeded to reply to the observations which Lord J. Russell had made in favour of the New Poor-law, and in which he had denied that certain propositions had been made by the Poor-law Commissioners to the Ministry of Earl Grey for forcing the labouring population of England to live on a coarser diet. He could not say whether such a proposition had ever been made to that Ministry; but this he knew from their measures—that some such project had been contemplated by the Poor-law Commissioners. The New Poor-law had not increased wages; on the contrary, he knew that in the agricultural districts wages had fallen, and that fall had been occasioned by the New Poor-law. He also expressed himself very strongly in condemnation of any system of banishing the people of England from their homes under the plausible title of emigration.—Sir J. GRAHAM observed, that he should have risen immediately after Lord J. Russell, to move the previous question upon his first resolution, had it not been for the consideration that by so doing he should have been acting discourteously towards Mr. S. Crawford, who in that case would have been prevented from proposing the amendment which he had placed on the notice-book. The ordinary form of the motions submitted to the House gave them some notion previously of the subjects which they had to discuss; but that of Lord J. Russell had thrown the House into a maze of confusion as to the topics which he intended to bring before it. If anything were wanted to complete the confusion, it was the proposition for the adoption of universal suffrage, which had been introduced by Mr. S. Crawford. He denied that Government had ever discouraged legislation by private individuals for the benefit of the industrious classes; and as a proof of the correctness of this position, referred to the co-operation of Ministers with Lord Ashley in advocating the interests of the manufacturing population. He could not pretend to follow Lord J. Russell through all the various details which he had introduced into his speech; but he would endeavour to follow him through the different resolutions which he had proposed to the House. The first was one which, upon the whole, he considered to be highly complimentary to the present Government, for it spoke of the present state of political tranquillity and of the recent revival of trade, which he maintained was attributable to its commercial policy. The second passed a condemnation on protective duties; and on that resolution he wished to remind the House that the object of Ministers in their recent commercial policy had not been the abolition of protecting, but the substitution of them in the place of prohibitory duties. That policy was first introduced by Mr. Huskisson, who had declared his intention of following it up by a cautious and gradual diminution of protecting duties, to be made in proportion to the increase of the population. That had been the guide of every administration since Mr. Huskisson's death, and more particularly of the present Government. He reminded the House how much had been done in the last three years to relieve the indirect taxation of the country, which pressed so heavily on the industry of the working-classes, and to impose in its stead direct taxation affecting the interests of the more wealthy portion of the community. Ministers had found on their accession to office 1152 articles in the tariff, and had reduced them by their Bills of 1841 and of the present year to 579, thereby removing from it more than half the articles which were charged with duty to the Customs, and relieving to that extent the fetters hitherto imposed upon our commerce. He then proceeded to refute the arguments which Lord J. Russell had urged in favour of his third resolution condemnatory of the present Corn-law. If Lord J. Russell really thought the law so prejudicial, he ought not to have proposed a vague resolution like that which had just been read to the House, but that the House go at once into committee to consider the propriety of altering it. Formerly Lord J. Russell had defended a fixed duty as a fiscal regulation. Now he abandoned that ground altogether, and said, that he would leave a fixed duty of 4*s.* or 5*s.* as a protection to agriculture. After pointing out the inconsistency of this doctrine with Lord John's second resolution, he proceeded to state his conviction that a fixed duty of 4*s.* or 5*s.* on the importation of foreign corn was a mere delusion. If the price of corn was low, it would be no protection; and if the price were high, the country would not bear it, and no Government would think of enforcing it. He did not say that protection was the cause of agricultural improvement; but he showed that coincident with protection there had been a great improvement in our agriculture, and in the productiveness of our soil. It was satisfactory to know that in the last four years the price of labour had increased, the price of the necessaries of life had diminished, and the entire condition of the working classes had become greatly ameliorated. He showed that within the same period there had been a great increase in our trade, foreign and domestic, and a surprising improvement in the manufacturing districts; and inferred therefrom that the commerce of the country was now in a wholesome and healthy condition. He contrasted the condition of the manufacturing districts in 1841 and 1842 with their present condition, and read several documents and statistical details, to show that, coincident with the revival of trade the wages of labour had increased; crime had diminished; pauperism had lessened; emigration had gone on steadily, not forced, but voluntary; that it had been aided, and the emigrants directed to those parts where labour was most required; that education had been extended, and the means of religious instruction afforded. He felt confident that the public would see that Government had discharged its duty in promoting the interests of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, but especially the labouring classes. He was anxious to improve the law of settlement, but he found great difficulties in the way of adjusting the conflicting claims of towns and counties. He felt that any extensive system of emigration would prove futile, because voluntary emigration had supplied Australia and the other colonies with a larger amount of labour than they required. With respect to education he thought the vote taken last year would be sufficient for this, though he agreed with Lord J. Russell that it will be necessary hereafter to ask for a larger sum for the purposes of general education. Sir J. Graham concluded by saying that, though the tone of the noble lord was free from any party character, yet that the resolutions could not fail to be regarded as a disapprobation of the Government, and, therefore, though he had no objection to the first resolution, he should meet it by moving the "previous question;" but before doing that it would be necessary to dispose of Mr. S. Crawford's amendment, which he would by giving it a distinct negative.—Sir C. BURRELL in a few words defended the county of Sussex from the unjust aspersions which Lord J. Russell had cast, no doubt unintentionally, upon its inhabitants. He spoke in high terms of the general morality and intelligence of the peasantry of Sussex.—Mr. LABOUCHERE supported Lord J. Russell's resolution. He thought that, as exaggerated notions of the distress of the people, and of the ability of Parliament to remedy them by direct legislation were abroad, it was both patriotic and wise of the noble lord to place on record his opinions of what Parliament really could do by legislation to improve the condition of the working people.—Sir JOHN TYRRELL thanked Lord J. Russell for bringing forward his "multitudinous propositions," though he could not undertake to support them. All the Ministers of late years had fought shy of meddling with the manufacturing and commercial interests, though they hesitated not to sacrifice the agricultural interest to the aggrandisement of traders. This was the case with the present Government, from whom, he said, he had entirely withdrawn his confidence.—Lord POLLINGTON declared that he would support a plan of colonisation as distinguished from emigration, and that he did not look with the same great degree of alarm as some of his friends on the eventual repeal of the Corn-laws.—Mr. VILLIERS observed, that he had been listening all the evening for an answer to Lord J. Russell, on the main question contained in his resolutions, and had heard none. The great question which Lord John had raised was that of protection. He concurred with everything which the noble lord had said on that subject, and waited with impatience to hear from Government some defence of that system, or some proof that what Lord J. Russell had proposed was practically untrue. Sir J. Graham had described to them in the most glowing terms the effects of free trade. He had told them, that since it was introduced the agricultural peasantry were well off, and that their wages had risen. He had told them that when the price of food was high, in 1841, there was inconceivable distress; and he had shown what were the consequences now, when the price of food was low. Sir J. Graham was an invaluable witness in the cause of free trade. He was not going to defend Lord J. Russell's conclusion on one subject, but he thanked him most cordially for bringing forward his resolutions. The noble lord had broken up the ground and prepared the way for him, whenever he should propose the repeal of the Corn-laws.—Mr. F. SCOTT expressed himself strongly in favour of giving protection to agriculture.—On the motion of Mr. P. HOWARD, the debate was then adjourned till Wednesday.

Wednesday.—After a mass of preliminary business had been transacted, and several railway bills advanced, Mr. HUME renewed his motion relative to the recall of Lord Ellenborough.—In reply to questions, Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he was not prepared to recommend the appointment of two additional Judges to the Courts of Law, and that the question of additional judges was not one which the commission appointed to inquire into the division of the circuits was competent to discuss. Sir J. Graham announced that he would proceed with the Irish Colleges Bill the first thing on Friday.—Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of the Catholic Relief Bill.—Sir J. GRAHAM approved of the principle of the Bill, so far as relieving Roman Catholics from penalties on account of their religion, but the Bill repealed some of the enactments of the Relief Bill of 1829. After a brief conversation, the Bill was read a second time, with the understanding that the debate should be taken on its next stage.—Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN moved the second reading of his Malt Drawback Bill, the object of which is to permit malt duty free, in order to fatten cattle.—Mr. CARDWELL, on the part of Government, opposed it, and read a letter from Dr. Playfair, containing his opposition; it says:—"I am of opinion that in the present state of knowledge no applicable process is known by which malt can be rendered unfit for the purposes of distillation and useful for feeding cattle." Further on Dr. Playfair adds—"A given weight of barley is more applicable for the production of muscles and fat than the same quantity of barley when converted into malt." Mr. Cardwell stated that Government had paid all possible attention to the subject, but that all the conclusions which had been arrived at tended to show that the adoption of the measure would endanger the revenue. Experiments were still in progress, and if any more practical suggestion, or one tending to more feasible results, were made, the Government would consider it.—Mr. MILES suggested to Mr. O'Brien to postpone the measure.—Lord HOWICK suggested that to admit Egyptian beans and Indian corn duty free, for the purpose of fattening cattle, would effect all the objects desired, without raising any of the objections which encountered such a proposition as a drawback on malt. He wished the agricultural interest, to which he was proud to belong, would raise their minds above these petty attempts at special legislation.—Mr. ESCOTT characterised the Bill as one of a series of delusive measures—he hoped it was the least and the last — brought forward for the purpose of conciliating the farmers, but which they saw through and despised.—After a few remarks from Mr. CURTEIS and Mr. HUME, Sir R. PEEL urged that the Bill should be altogether withdrawn, as it would be hopeless to persevere with it.—Lord J. RUSSELL stated, that when he was in office, he had consulted the Excise with reference to a similar Bill which the Duke of Buckingham had in contemplation, and the report which he then received had led him to the same conclusion as that to which the Government had now arrived, from their recent inquiry.—After some observations from Mr. BUCKE and Lord WORSLEY, the Bill was withdrawn.—The Scientific and Literary Societies Bill was read a second time.—The adjourned debate on the condition of the labouring classes was resumed by Mr. P. HOWARD, who objected to the resolutions as being too comprehensive and indefinite, and leading to no practical result. Even if carried, they would only bring about the resignation of Ministers, which, under existing circumstances, and seeing that there were no successors who were prepared to take their places, would not be a patriotic act.—Mr. ESCOTT believed that the resolutions, if carried, would lead to serious practical results. The resolutions admitted that the country was in a state of political tranquillity and general prosperity, which would be disturbed by any change in the Government, and whatever might be the ultimate consequences of their being carried, a change in the Government must be the immediate consequence. (During Mr. Escott's speech a motion was made that the House be counted, but more than 40 members proved to be present.) The hon. member therefore proceeded, censuring the extreme free-traders and the extreme protectionists, the latter of whom he considered, by their selfish arguments and absurd clamours, to have done more to shake the protective system than anything else which had assailed it. Restriction could only be defended on the ground that it enabled us to raise the largest domestic supply for the consumption of the people. But all those absurd prohibitory or protective duties, which enhanced the price of keep for stock, crippled the operations of the farmer, and diminished the resources of the community, must give way before that increasing knowledge which was giving senators wisdom, and penetrating the people at large. Though allied with and dependant on the agricultural interest, he disclaimed for himself and the farmers the wish for the maintenance of any system adverse to the general welfare of the community.—After some remarks from Sir J. GRAHAM, Captain PECHELL, and Sir J. WALSH, Lord HOWICK pointed out that the resolutions contained particular embodiments of opinion, which if affirmed by the House, it would then devolve on the Government, as the executive advisers of the Crown, to carry out by specific measures. The condition of the people was a subject which called for the most serious deliberation of Parliament. If they could improve it, their duty was clear, and the time for attempting it was a time like the present, one of considerable prosperity, interposed between past years of distress, and those which we had a right to anticipate when deficient harvests again visited us. Equally clear was it their duty to define what Parliament could do, and not raise false hopes to be afterwards disappointed. Poverty was a main cause of ignorance; and it was one fatal consequence of the periodical visitations of distress with which we were visited under our present system, that the distresses of our working classes reacted on their moral condition and aggravated it. Permanent improvement of the physical state of the labouring classes was the only solid basis for extended educational measures; and that improvement could only be effected by setting their industry free, and giving them, through the abolition of the restrictive system, a greater command over the necessaries of life. This he inforced at considerable length, by illustrative examples and argument, urging that an immediate repeal of the Corn-laws would produce the largest benefit, unalloyed by injury to any interest.—Sir J. HANMER expressed himself in favour of a fixed duty, and praised the Government, whose measures he considered to have been instrumental in bringing about the change in our material condition, and that improvement of the position of the labouring classes which has been effected since they came into office.—Sir R. PEEL attributed the apparent apathy and scantiness of attendance of members not to any real indifference on the part of the House to the great subject which had been brought under its attention, but because there was a predominant feeling that the resolutions of Lord J. Russell were proposed in a manner not calculated to lead to any practical result. It was easy to lay down a proposition affirming the importance of bringing forward measures for the advancement of education, founded on liberal and comprehensive principles. But the recent contest on Maynooth, and the approaching debate on academical institutions, showed how much easier it was to propound and to pledge, than to carry such measures. On the subject of the Corn-laws, Government had acted in the spirit of Lord J. Russell's resolution, affirming the necessity for a cautious and deliberate revisal, with a view to the interests of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. He gave his cordial acquiescence to the principle that protection was in itself an evil; and the Government had endeavoured to reduce its amount, with a view to the mighty interests involved. He had been told that he had forfeited the confidence of the agricultural interest. How far this might be true he did not know but he would not.

attempt to purchase it back by any expression of regret or repentance for the course he had pursued. Recollecting the frightful condition of the country in 1842, he believed that he had acted as a Conservative Minister in attempting the removal of a state of things, the effects of which the landed interest would have been the first to feel. Bound up, as he was himself, with land, he could have no sordid motive for the policy he had adopted, which, he contended, had saved the country from a great crisis, and was calculated to promote and to secure the general welfare of all classes of the community.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL, in reply, observed that the sole question then before the House was this whether, if it were necessary to make an alteration in our protective system and in our Corn-laws, it was wise to make it now, in a time of political tranquility, or to wait for a time of clamour and distress? It was evident, from the course, not only of the present, but also of many a preceding debate, that the cause of protection and of the Corn-laws was even now tottering to its fall; and it was therefore incumbent upon the House not to be taken unawares, when that fall should take place. Sir R. Peel had already admitted that if he had lost the confidence of his own supporters, he had not obtained the confidence of his opponents. As Sir R. Peel had himself adverted to that subject, he would be frank, and say at once, that Sir R. Peel had not gained his confidence. He disagreed with Sir J. Tyrrell, when he said that the introduction of the tariff and the existing Corn law had been injurious to the farmer; but when the hon. baronet went on to assert that he had been taught by Ministers, when in opposition, to expect that they would be in favour of protection and against free trade, he was prepared to contend that Sir J. Tyrrell was perfectly justified in such an assertion. At the same time, he would add, that if Sir J. Tyrrell were to propose a vote of a want of confidence in Ministers, he would not support it; for what he had now to consider was how he could best carry the measures which he deemed conformable to his own principles. If he and his friends were to propose measures similar to those now proposed by Sir R. Peel and his colleagues in the Government, he knew that they would be opposed by Sir J. Tyrrell and many of the gentlemen who were now in office. He therefore thought that the best mode of carrying out his own principles would be by opposing Sir J. Tyrrell on any such motion, and by leaving measures founded on his principles to be proposed and carried by the party now in power. There could be no doubt that Whig principles were better carried out at the present moment by the opponents of the Whigs, than they could be by the Whigs themselves.—After a few words from Lord CLEMENTS, the House divided, when the numbers were—For Mr. S. CRAWFORD'S amendment, 33; Against it, 253; Majority against it, 220.—Sir J. GRAHAM then moved the previous question. Another division took place, when the numbers were—For the previous question, 182; Against it, 104; Majority for it, 78.—Lord J. RUSSELL'S resolutions were accordingly lost.

Thursday.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL brought up the report of the select committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the action of Howard v. Gossett. The report stated that on Tuesday last judgment was obtained against the Serjeant-at-Arms, and a verdict of 200*l.* returned, execution upon which would be levied on the 2d of June. The committee recommended that a writ of error should be brought on the judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench. As the execution would not prejudice the proceedings in the writ of error, the committee did not feel it expedient to prevent the levy of damages according to the regular operation of the law.—Mr. HUME and other members said that in that case there was an end to the privileges of the House of Commons, as the House of Lords would have the power of deciding in what form and to what extent they could be exercised.—After some further discussion, it was agreed that copies of the record, warrant, and other documents, should be produced, in order to enable the House to come to a decision on the question; and the discussion was postponed until the following day.—Sir J. GRAHAM subsequently stated, that should the debate on this question of privilege extend to any length, he would postpone the second reading of the Irish Academical Education Bill to Monday.—In answer to Mr. MUNTZ, Sir R. PEEL stated that a treaty between Naples and this country, stipulating that British ships should have the same privileges in Neapolitan ports as the ships of that country, and securing privileges for resident British subjects, had been signed, but was not yet ratified.—Mr. H. BERKELEY moved for a select committee to inquire into the effects produced upon debtors and creditors by the operation of the Insolvency Act of last session.—Mr. KEMBLE seconded the motion.—Sir J. GRAHAM stated that a Bill was now before the House of Lords, with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, the object of which is to remedy the defects of the Act of last session. Immediate legislation was preferable to protracted inquiry; and he thought they should wait till that Bill came down from the other house. With all their professions for the welfare of the labouring classes, they would badly evince their sincerity if they were to re-enact the old tyrannical power of imprisonment. It might be requisite to afford a more summary mode of procedure against the property of the debtor; and he believed this would be afforded by the measure before the other house.—Mr. PARKER deprecated any return to the old system of imprisonment for debt.—Mr. M. PHILIPS and Mr. MASTERMAN were favourable to inquiry, in order to ascertain if means could be taken more effectually to protect the creditor from the fraudulent debtor.—Mr. HAWES was afraid that the appointment of the committee would have the effect of cushioning the Bill coming down from the other House.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL was anxious to increase the security of the creditor, but suggested the postponement of the motion until the Lords' Bill reached them.—After some further conversation, Mr. H. BERKELEY consented to withdraw his motion.—Mr. Sergeant MURPHY next drew attention to the subject of Ministers' Money in corporate towns in Ireland—a specific tax for the maintenance of clergymen of the Established Church. He moved that "this House will resolve itself into a committee to take into consideration the Act 17 & 18 Car. II., c. 7, intituled 'An Act for provision of Ministers in Cities and Corporate Towns, and making the church of St. Andrews, in the suburbs of the city of Dublin, presentative for ever,' with a view to the repeal of so much thereof as relates to the payment of ministers in corporate towns in Ireland."—Sir H. W. BARRON seconded the motion.—Sir T. FREMANTLE admitted that the tax of Ministers' Money operated unequally and harshly, and stated that Government had been considering whether or not some remedy could be devised, but as yet no determination had been come to. Still he contended that the tax was not so onerous as had been represented, and that it would be unjust to repeal it before a substitute had been found for it. He therefore recommended Mr. Sergeant Murphy to withdraw his motion, promising to direct his attention to the subject.—Mr. E. B. ROCHE thought they ought to have a pledge from the Treasury bench that they would, this session, deal with what they admitted to be an abuse. At this stage of the proceedings the House was "counted out."

Friday.—This being the last day for receiving reports on private Bills, other than Railway Bills, a great number were brought up. The following Bills were read a third time and passed.—The York and North Midland Railway (Bridlington Branch) Bill, York and Scarborough Railway Deviation Bill, Ely and Huntingdon Railway Bill, Bristol and Exeter Railway Branches Bill, Hull and Selby Railway (Bridlington Branch) Bill, Bradford and London and Birmingham Railway Bill, and Dunstable and London and Birmingham Railway Bill.—Lord J. MANNERS gave notice, that on the second reading of the Academical Institutions (Ireland) Bill, he should move, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.—In reply to a question from Mr. HUME, with respect to the case of James Deedes, committed to Reading gaol for four months, for selling pheasants' eggs, Sir J. GRAHAM said, in this case there were two commitments, one for three months, and the other for one month. He had advised the Crown to remit the punishment of one month, and not the imprisonment for three months. He had acted according to the usual practice of the Home-office.—Mr. M. GIBSON trusted the right hon. Gentleman would use the influence of his office to prevent the sale of live game and eggs. It was frequently the case that they were bought by the gamekeepers of gentlemen who afterwards had to decide on the offence.—After a few words from Sir J. WALSH, Mr. OSBORNE, and Sir J. GRAHAM, Mr. COLLETT said he had sent his servant to Reading on Thursday last, and paid the fine 10*l.* 11*s.* for Deedes, and he believed that person was immediately set at liberty.—In answer to a question from Mr. ROEBUCK, Sir J. GRAHAM said he had referred all the communications sent to him relating to the case of Mr. C. Wilson, to one of the law officers of the Royal Court of Jersey, with instructions that he would carefully examine them, and make a full report. That report had not been received, consequently he could not give any information at present on the subject.—[Left sitting.]

Her Majesty's Birth-day.—The club-houses and theatres were tastefully illuminated on Tuesday night, in honour of Her Majesty's birth-day, and the early part of the evening being fine, a considerable crowd gathered in the public streets, to see the splendid sight. Her Majesty's tradesmen, too, very generally illuminated, and the west end of the town was quite in a blaze. The principal emblems were roses and thistles, with stars and crowns, while the letters V and A were frequently repeated. The tradesmen of Her Majesty, to the number of 95, celebrated the day by dining together at the Freemasons' Tavern. The Gentlemen-at-Arms also commemorated Her Majesty's birth-day at the same tavern. Sir B. Smith, the captain, presided, and was supported by 35 of the corps. In honour of the day, the numerous fleet of vessels lying in the river and the several docks, presented a very gay appearance, by being decked out with their national and signal flags. The royal standard was hoisted at the Tower, at Deptford and Woolwich dockyards, Greenwich Hospital, &c. The Great Britain steam-ship was decorated almost in the same style as on Her Majesty's visit, and was an object of much interest; and at the Nore and Sheerness the several men-of-war, acting as guard ships, fired a royal salute in honour of the event.

The Bankruptcy Laws.—A meeting of merchants and others, convened by requisition, signed by many of the most influential firms in the City, was held on Tuesday at the London Tavern, "to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament for an amendment of the Act abolishing imprisonment for debt under 20*l.*, and for other improvements in the laws of bankruptcy and insolvency." Mr. Masterman, M.P., took the chair, and stated the object for which the meeting had been called, as he had heard that the clause in question had worked great inconvenience to the trading interests in London. It was lamentable to think how many in this city got fraudulently into debt; and it was not so much to recur to the old system of taking the person that they had then assembled, but to ascertain if some means could not be devised of more readily attaching the property of the debtor.—Mr. Hawes, M.P., proposed the first resolution. Whilst they had been legislating too favourably for the debtor, they had overlooked the real interests of the country and of the creditor. They had gone to the very opposite extreme of the old law. The old Roman law made the debtor the slave of his creditor. The recent English law made the debtor almost the master of his creditor. These were the extremes of the scale, and both were objectionable. The debtor could now, with too great facility, not only escape personal consequences, but could also avoid, by legal means, a proper and full surrender of his property. The object of this meeting was to press upon the Government the absolute necessity of considering the interests of the creditor, not so much with a view to go back again to the old and unwise law, as with a view of obtaining a simple, prompt, efficacious, and cheap mode of attaching the property of debtors, so that the trading interests of this country might have the means of securing the property, without unnecessarily detaining the person of the debtor. He did not mean to say that the person of the debtor should not be detained in cases of fraud, or when he refused to disclose his property. He would be happy to concur with the chairman, and with those who had convened this meeting, in the establishment of any measure for enabling the creditor more readily and efficaciously to attach the property of the debtor. He trusted that the mode devised for obtaining the possession of property would be combined with a system of local tribunals, which would enable the creditor to obtain redress without expense and inconvenience. Such was the expense of recovering small debts in our courts, as at present constituted, that creditors frequently abandoned their debts rather than incur the cost of securing them. Competent tribunals should be established throughout the country, to which an appeal might easily be made by creditors, and from which efficient process might issue, without involving either the delay or expense at present attendant upon legal proceedings. The judges of these courts should be authorised at their discretion to imprison the debtor in order to get at his property. The resolution which he had to move was—"That this meeting is deeply sensible of the injury which has been inflicted on trade generally, by the recent alterations in the law of bankruptcy and insolvency, especially the abolition of imprisonment on final process for debts under 20*l.*, whereby the facility of committing fraud has been increased, and the risk of punishment lessened, without the substitution of any adequate power to creditors of obtaining possession of the property of their debtors, unjustly withheld." If the creditors obtained the power of securing the property of debtors, the trading community would obtain all they desired. Mr. Hayward, in seconding the resolution, said he was afraid the establishment of local courts, such as were alluded to by the hon. gentleman, would rather enhance the expense and inconvenience of the trading interest than otherwise. Mr. Basil Montagu could not see how they could affirm that great evils had resulted from what he considered a great improvement in the laws of bankruptcy. The bad consequences to the traders which had been alluded to, had nothing to do with the alterations of the bankrupt laws, which he believed were conducive to the interests of trade generally, and to the traders of the city of London particularly. Mr. Hawes then proposed, that in order to meet the views of Mr. Montagu the words "recent alteration in the law of debtor and creditor" should be substituted for "recent alteration in the law of bankruptcy and insolvency," as the resolution then stood. The resolution was then put as thus amended, and carried. Other resolutions on the same subject were moved by Mr. Gassiot, Mr. Travers, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Moffatt, Mr. Goldsmidt, and a committee was nominated to draw up a petition to Parliament embodying the views of the resolutions, and requesting the city and metropolitan members to support it.

The late Mr. Hood.—The following is abridged from a notice by Mr. S. C. Hall, in the Art-Union of Saturday:—"Mr. Hood's existence was a long disease rather than a life: yet his temper, unembittered by continual pain, remained ever cheerful and kindly, turning, to the very last, his own sad suffering into jests, and forcing those who wept over his agony, fierce as it was (till he was overtaken by the last dull sleep that continued for three days preceding his death) to smile at the witticisms of his conceits, however strangely mingled with the consciousness of his situation, and his solemn forecast of the rapidly-approaching hereafter. Nor were such terrible contrasts reserved for his death-bed only. Even when the 'Song of a Shirt' was knocking at every heart in Great Britain, its author was panting for breath; and soon after he was confined to his bed, and literally propped up by pillows to write wit. And so he struggled on, through successive paroxysms of illness, till the last few months found him working amidst the very crisis and beatings of heart disease (more than once even in the intervals of delirium!) at the monthly chapters of his last novel—doomed to remain, like his life, a great fragment. But it is all over with him now. He is released from labours never remunerated in proportion to the pleasure they gave, and to the enormous profit they produced to others, seldom perhaps thought of by those whose hearts they opened, and whose care they seemed to beguile. Latterly his friends had been agonised by his terrible lament—'I cannot die, I cannot die;' and they could not but be thankful to lay him, on the 10th of May, in a calm grave, at Kensall-green. It will not, we are sure, be long before a monument is raised to his memory; and there are hearts enough in England to remember that his widow and children have but the small pension bestowed by Sir R. Peel, whose letter, in words that did equal honour to the Minister and the poet, conveyed his regret that the grant was necessarily so scanty, and a request that he might be permitted to make the personal acquaintance of one with whose works he was intimately acquainted, and whose talents and character he had long appreciated and admired." We may add to this account that Sir R. Peel has sent a contribution of 50*l.* to the fund now in progress of collection in aid of Mr. Hood's family.

Extraordinary Influx of Strangers in London.—At no period, with the exception perhaps of a few days before and after the coronation of Her Majesty, was London so full as at the present moment. The cause of the extraordinary influx of strangers is principally owing to the present extraordinary rage for railroad speculations, and the desire to give all the principal cities and towns in the United Kingdom the benefits derivable from this great modern improvement. For one Irish line alone there are nearly 50 witnesses in attendance to be examined before the committee, besides the numerous solicitors, agents, &c., to support and oppose the Bill introduced; and the benefits derivable to the hotel and tavern keepers are very considerable. The theatres, too, are reaping a profitable harvest, as well as the various exhibitions in the metropolis, by railway witnesses.

River Steamers.—As a proof of the increasing inclination of the inhabitants of London to proceed towards the sea for recreation, it is stated that in 1843 upwards of 1,500,000 persons were landed at the various piers at Gravesend, and which was increased to upwards of 2,000,000 in 1844. These, of course, are exclusive of those who visited Southend, Sheerness, Herne Bay, Margate, and Ramsgate, amounting to upwards of 250,000.

The Money-Order Office.—Eighteen additional clerks were taken into the money-order service of the General Post-office last week, making a total of 86 extra officers for this department within the last quarter. 12 messengers have also been appointed. The increase in money-orders is now about thirty-fold, and the expense of this section of the service upwards of 12,000*l.*

Church Innovations at St. George's-in-the-East.—A vestry was held on Saturday in the parish of St. George-in-the-East, at which a proposed rate for the repairs of the church was resisted by the most stanch supporters of the church, for the sole purpose of exhibiting the disapprobation which the parishioners feel at the novelties introduced by the rector, the Rev. Bryan King, into the church service shortly after he became incumbent of the parish. The rate being rejected by a show of hands of 164 to 30, a poll was demanded, which commenced on Monday at 10 o'clock, and closed at 4, when the numbers were—for the rate, 14; against it, 36.

Fatal Fire at Raggett's Hotel.—A dreadful fire broke out on the premises known as Raggett's hotel, in Dover-street, Piccadilly, shortly after 12 o'clock on Monday night, which involved the destruction of a vast amount of property, and as many as four, if not a greater number of human lives. The following facts, collected from statements made by the Earl of Huntingdon and others, leave no doubt as to the origin of the fire, and that four persons at least—viz., Mrs. John Round, aged 56, the lady of the hon. member for Maldon; Mr. Raggett, sen., the proprietor of the hotel; his daughter, Miss Raggett, aged 27; and Mrs. Jones, a nurse in the service of the Earl of Huntingdon—have perished by the sad occurrence. It appears that the hotel was at the time of the outbreak completely occupied by families, who had mostly come to town to attend the Drawing Room. The Earl and Countess of Huntingdon, with their infant son, Lord Hastings, occupied the front drawing-room on the first floor, and the corresponding room above for their servants Mrs. Jones and the nursemaid, &c. The back-drawing-room was occupied by Mrs. John Round and her daughter, who had only arrived there late on Monday afternoon from Brighton, and they had also a sitting-room and other apartments on the second floor. Another suite of apartments on the drawing-room floors was occupied by Mr. R. Poer King and his sister; and beneath these were apartments in the occupation of Lord Louth, the Hon. Col. Bouverie, and other gentlemen; the remainder of the building being devoted by Mr. Raggett to his own family and domestics, and those of the families staying at the hotel. When the fire was first discovered the hotel had not been closed for the night. Mr. Raggett and his daughter retired to rest shortly before 12 o'clock, as did all the servants, with the exception of the head waiter and the cook, who, as well as Mr. Raggett, Jun., were sitting up for those inmates who had not then returned home. Mrs. Round and her daughter had been to St. James's Theatre to witness the French Plays, and the Earl and Countess of Huntingdon to the Opera. Mrs. Round and her daughter came home a few minutes after 12, and retired to her sitting-room, on the second floor. They had scarcely sat down when the head waiter, who had just seen Miss King enter her bedroom at the back of the first-floor, was alarmed at hearing screams of "Fire." On rushing up to the first-floor landing he met Miss King coming down in a distracted state, exclaiming that her bedroom was in flames, and that she had set fire to the bed-curtains. He found the room in a blaze, and entrance impossible from the dense smoke issuing from it. The screams had attracted the attention of the inmates, and on his rushing up the second-floor stairs he saw Mrs. Round on the landing, in the same dress in which she had arrived from the theatre. He told her the house was on fire, and to make her escape. He ran down stairs, supposing Mrs. Round to be following him, and saw no more of her. Miss Round states, that she was with her mother at this time, and either from the smoke or fright Mrs. Round fell on the stairs, but at the same moment a man caught her up, saying he would save her, and seeing her, as she supposed safe, she ran back into the apartment occupied by their attendant, but was unable to proceed down stairs on account of the intensity of the heat and smoke. She and Miss Raggett again went back to the front room, and opened the window, and when the fire-escape arrived the fire was coming into the apartment. Miss Raggett was the first to go out, but did so before the conductor could get up, and fell on the pavement and was killed. Miss Round then got out with her attendant, and they effected their escape. A minute or two before this occurrence a painful sight was witnessed by the crowd which had already assembled. A poor fellow, servant to Mr. King, was seen to make his appearance at an adjoining window of the second-floor to that from which Miss Raggett fell. The flames were in the apartment, and in the hope of immediate assistance he got outside and clung to the window-sill for several minutes. The flames bursting through the window burnt his hands so dreadfully that he let go his hold, and fortunately fell into the balcony, from which he ultimately managed with great difficulty to scramble into the street. About three or four minutes prior to the cry of "fire" being raised Lord Huntingdon had arrived home, and his lordship states that he had scarcely put his hat down when he was startled by the alarm. His first impulse was to rush to the room where his son, Lord Hastings, and servants were. Mrs. Jones, the nurse, had heard the alarm, and was preparing to dress the child, but his lordship snatched his son from her arms, and, with the countess, ran out of the house, telling her to follow him. He believed she did so, but returned for some article, and must afterwards have mistaken the staircase, and got into one of the back-rooms and out of the window, from the position in which her body was found. The person whom Miss Round saw on the landing with her mother is supposed to have been Mr. Raggett, sen., from the fact that the remains of two bodies when discovered on Tuesday were found close together. The rapidity and intensity of the fire may be accounted for from the fact that the whole of the apartments were wainscotted, and that there was three times as much wood in the building as is usual in modern houses. Although, therefore, there were 10 engines in attendance within half an hour of the outbreak, and a plentiful supply of water, the whole building was destroyed, with the single exception of the sitting-room of Mrs. Round, which remained with the supper-things still standing on the table, uninjured and untouched. The first body discovered was that of the unfortunate woman Mrs. Jones, lying dreadfully burned about the head, face, and arms, on the top of some leads in the rear of the premises and over the kitchen. She had evidently dropped from one of the second-floor windows. She had also a frightful wound on her head, but the body was immediately identified by Lord Huntingdon. The ruins were not sufficiently cool to commence a search for the other bodies supposed to be there, until 10 o'clock, when at the urgent request of Colonel Boucher, Colonel Rolt, and other relatives of Mrs. Round, some of the brigade were induced to enter, and after a short search they found those which were supposed to be the remains of Mrs. Round, lying on a part of the burnt flooring of the first-floor, and close to them the remains of another body, supposed to be that of Mr. Raggett. They presented a shocking spectacle, scarcely any parts but the mere trunks remaining. They were placed in shells and conveyed to the workhouse of St. George's, Hanover-square, as was also that of the deceased woman, Mrs. Jones. Miss Raggett was conveyed to No. 8, Dover-street, exactly opposite the hotel, where she died almost immediately. It appears that the Countess of Huntingdon has lost the whole of her jewels, except one box, the estimated value of those lost being as much as 3000*l.*; and those of the unfortunate Mrs. Round and her daughter, which they intended to have worn on Thursday at the Drawing-room, are estimated at a much larger sum, in addition to the plate. Mr. King, who is a merchant, from Bristol, had in one of his apartments a large and valuable chest full of plate, which has been found unhurt. Her Majesty herself witnessed the progress of the flames from the Palace, and sent a messenger at an early hour to inquire the extent of the damage. In the official report made by Mr. Braidwood, he attributes the rapid progress of the fire to the fact that the whole of the doors were thrown open, and thus a free current of air tended to increase the flames. The inquest on the bodies is still sitting, and the latest accounts published add little to the above fact, except that it is believed that the body first found on the stairs is not that of Mrs. Round, and that another body which was discovered yesterday among the ruins dreadfully mutilated, is that of the unfortunate lady.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending May 24:—West Districts, 140; Northern, 137; Central, 158; Eastern, 167; Southern, 208; Total, 810, males, 389; females, 421. Cambridge.—The subjoined address of resident members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge, in favour of the proposed grant to Maynooth, which has been called forth by the one presented last week, expressing a repugnance to that measure, was on Wednesday presented to the representatives for that University. The address is signed by residents only, and among them by eight professors and 18 principal tutors of colleges, the remainder of the 78 names appended, consisting almost entirely of Fellows and officers of the different colleges and of the University:—"To the Right Hon. Henry Goulburn, M.P., and the Hon Charles Ewan Law, M.P.—The undersigned, resident members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge, desire to intimate to you, its representatives in Parliament, that the proposed grant to Maynooth College, is viewed by them with no feelings either of apprehension or repugnance, and that they deprecate most strongly the agitation now in progress against it."

Chatham.—The Janus, steam-sloop, was again tried on Wednesday and Thursday last, in the presence of Captain Shirreff, superintendent of this dockyard. Her rotatory engines have acted much better. The paddles slowly revolved several times during the trials, which were made for two or three hours together, and hopes are now entertained that the engines will eventually answer. The Earl of Dundonald is so far recovered as to be enabled to leave the captain superintendent's residence for London.

Helston.—The Times states that the church at Helston is likely, at length, to be restored to peace and harmony; that Mr. Blunt is forthwith to be removed, and that the congregations of Helston and the adjoining parishes have not only paid the whole expense of the suit lately brought in the Exeter Consistory Court against Mr. Hill, the churchwarden, but have also subscribed for a memorial to him, to serve as some compensation for his past services and encouragement for the future. The bishop purposes visiting Helston in June.

Mitcham.—For some weeks past great excitement has prevailed in the village of Mitcham, Surrey, in consequence of the discovery of defalcations to a very large amount in the books of the late actuary of the savings'-bank in that place. Trade has been at a standstill, and hundreds of families believed themselves utterly ruined. It appears that about a month since, Mr. W. J. Chart, an auctioneer, builder, and parish clerk of the village committed suicide. This person was highly respected by his fellow parishioners, and at different times had filled all the parochial offices. About ten years since he was made actuary of the savings'-bank, and so great was the confidence reposed in him that the managers of the bank never suspected anything could be wrong in his accounts. This circumstance accounts for the fact that Mr. Chart was enabled to embezzle during the last ten years a sum falling little short of 7000*l.* The deceased had to meet Mr. G. M. Hoare, the brewer (who resides at Morden, and is the treasurer of the Bank), on the 18th ult., upon business respecting the bank. Instead of keeping that appointment, the deceased went into a loft and hung himself. The fact of his committing suicide at such a time caused it to be inferred that he was behindhand in his accounts, and had not courage to meet Mr. Hoare. At the inquest it was stated that his affairs were in a satisfactory state. Such, however, has proved not to be the case. As soon as deceased was buried a meeting of the trustees and managers (the latter consisting of tradesmen in Mitcham) was held, Mr. Hoare, the treasurer, Mr. Chambers, of Morden, and Dr. Bartley, of Mitcham, being the trustees present. The proof of embezzlement having been made apparent, and to a much larger extent than had been anticipated, it was determined forthwith to communicate with Mr. Tidd Pratt, the revising barrister for banks of savings and benefit societies. The learned gentleman met the trustees on the 28th April. After several hours' investigation, he adjourned the further investigation until the following Monday. In the interval Dr. Bartley was taken dangerously ill, and died within a week. It is stated that mental anxiety, produced by the unfortunate bank transactions, was the cause of the death of this gentleman, who was only in his 50th year, and previously in good health. The investigation was ultimately proceeded with and brought to a close on Friday week, when the total deficiency in the bank assets was declared to be 6557*l.* There were many societies that deposited their money in this bank, and amongst them two lodges of Odd Fellows, and the Mitcham Tradesmen's Club. Of this club deceased was secretary. The latter club had deposited 124*l.*, and in deceased's ledger they were credited with 5*s.* 1*d.* Thirty Odd Fellows had deposited 10*l.* each, and were credited with 1*l.* each. Mr. Pratt stated that the actuary must have paid 300*l.* per annum out of his own pocket, as interest to the depositors, to lull suspicion. It is now decided that the amount deficient shall be made up by the treasurer, trustees, and managers, Mr. George Hoare paying 4000*l.*, Mr. Chambers 1000*l.*, and the widow of Dr. Bartley 1000*l.*, and the widow of the deceased actuary 100*l.*—the amount of his security. Sir Thomas and Lady Acland have subscribed 150*l.* towards relieving the managers, who are chiefly poor tradesmen, of their burden.

Nottingham.—The festival of Corpus Christi was celebrated by the Roman Catholic clergy on Sunday in their new Cathedral of St. Barnabas, with unusual pomp and ceremony. Hundreds of persons assembled to witness the procession.

Oxford.—A melancholy accident took place on Tuesday last. Mr. J. F. Ede and Mr. Edward Harris, the former a scholar, and the latter a commoner, of Pembroke College, started on that day in a couple of skiffs on an excursion to Islip, a village about six miles from Oxford. After partaking of some refreshment at the Red Lion Inn, they imprudently ventured to return in the same manner, although the river was much swollen from the quantity of rain that had fallen, and consequently the current was much stronger than usual. From the time they left the inn it must have been at least ½-past 8 o'clock before they got into their boats. They were afterwards seen both rowing in one boat. Their friends at college finding that they had not arrived at 12 o'clock, became alarmed for their safety. An active search was immediately set on foot. The river was dragged, and next morning the two bodies were found near the Isle of Rhee. It is supposed that, owing to the darkness of the night, their fragile boat must have been upset by coming in contact with the bank. Mr. Ede took his degree of B.A. this term, and Mr. Harris had also passed his final examination.

Ryde.—In order to celebrate the auspicious circumstance of Her Majesty becoming a proprietor in the Isle of Wight, an idea was started of forming a Yacht Club at Ryde. The papers state that the fortunate opportunity has not been lost, and that a party of influential gentlemen met on Saturday, the Queen's birthday, to frame resolutions and establish a club. Nearly 200 guineas per annum was immediately subscribed, and T. W. Flemming, Esq., of Quar House, in the Isle of Wight, was appointed commodore, and A. Hamborough, Esq., of Steephill Castle, vice commodore. A resolution was immediately adopted, directing the commodore to apply in the proper quarter for Her Majesty's permission to name the club the Royal Victoria Yacht Club, and to solicit the patronage of Her Majesty and Prince Albert. Amongst the noblemen and gentlemen who have already become members, are: the Marquis of Conyngham, Earl of Yarborough, Earl Mountcharles, Lord Rossmore, Lord Keane, Hon. L. Burrell, R. Burrell, Esq., E. V. Utterson, Esq., G. S. Harcourt, Esq., B. B. Williams, Esq., &c.

THE Standing Orders Committee have come to the following decisions:—Portarlington and Tullamore Line—The standing orders not to be dispensed with; Southampton and Dorchester—Standing orders not dispensed with as to powers of leasing line; Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings (Ashford branch)—Standing orders dispensed with; North British (petition for additional provision)—Standing orders dispensed with; Newport and Pontypool (petition for additional provision)—Standing orders dispensed with; Preston and Wyre—Standing orders dispensed with; Guildford and Chichester—Standing orders dispensed with; Birmingham and Gloucester—Standing orders dispensed with, on omitting clauses, giving power to sell or lease; North Wales (petition for additional provision)—Standing orders dispensed with. The committee on the Kentish lines have agreed to the preamble of the Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings (Keymer branch), and to the Bill for enabling the Greenwich to lease their line, and have decided to report it to the House. The committee on the Northumberland lines have decided that the preamble to the Newcastle and Berwick Bill had been proved, and that the preamble to the Northumberland Atmospheric Bill had not been proved. The most intense anxiety was manifested during the time the committee was in deliberation, and the lobbies leading to the committee-room were crowded to excess. The committee on the Dundee and Perth district, after a long consideration of the spot at Perth where the terminus should be constructed, has come to the determination that the question should be left to the decision of the Board of Trade. The other clauses of the Bill were gone through seriatim, and were agreed to with various alterations, more particularly with reference to the conveyance of goods, and the running of trains for the less opulent part of the community.—The Blackwall Railway directors have been authorised by the shareholders to proceed in Parliament for the formation of the proposed branch to Epping, and also to convert 160,000*l.* of the money now borrowed on debentures into capital, by the creation of new shares. It has also been resolved to promote the proposed new line in continuation of the Blackwall through South Essex by Plaistow, West Ham, Barking, Dungenum, Rainham, North and South Ockendon, Horndon, Langdon, Basildon, Rayleigh, Hockley, Rochford, to Southend and Prittlewell, with branches to Tilbury and the River Crouch.—The Liverpool and Manchester, the Bolton and Leigh, and the Kenyon and Leigh Companies, held special general meetings at Liverpool last week, for the purpose of approving of and deciding upon the drafts of the several measures now before Parliament for the amalgamation of those companies with the Grand Junction and North Union lines. In each meeting the Bills passed unanimously without eliciting observation. The St. Helens Company also met, and agreed upon an amalgamation with the Santrey Brook Navigation Company. Notwithstanding the reduction altogether of 25 per cent. in the passengers' fares of the London and Birmingham, and as much in their goods charges, the last week's traffic is 2,800*l.* over the corresponding week of last year. This is evidence of the results of low fares and quick trains, and if carried over the year it will exceed 140,000*l.* per annum. The new railway schemes of the last week are larger, in a numerical point of view, than at any previous period. They form an array of 15, and are as follow:—Worcester, Tenbury, and Ludlow; Direct London and Manchester; the City and Camden Town (Birmingham Junction); the Great Western Birmingham and City Extension; North London Junction; London, Salisbury, and Yeovil Junction; Atherstone, Ashby-de-la-Zouch, and Burton-upon-Trent; Somersetshire Midland; Fleetwood, Preston, and West Riding Junction; Derby, Uttoxeter, and Stafford; Paris and Caen; Worcester, Shrewsbury, and Crewe; Manchester and Birkenhead Continuation, and Mold, Ruabon, and North Wales; Ulverstone, Furness, and Lancaster and Carlisle; Cork, Blackrock, Passage, and Monkstown. The expenditure incurred by railway companies in carrying their bills through Parliament is enormous. At every stage of their progress they are subjected to charges of the most multifarious and costly character; but the one item which throws all others into the shade is that required to defray the inquiry before the select committees of the House. It is understood that not much under 50,000*l.* has been expended in the committee on the rival Newcastle and Berwick and Northumberland Railways; and it is estimated that in more than one of the committees now sitting the expenses cannot fall short of from 1,000*l.* to 1,500*l.* per day—these committees in few cases sitting for less than ten days or a fortnight, and many for five or six weeks. It is calculated that fees to counsel alone during the present session in connection with railway bills, will exceed 100,000*l.*

Ireland.

Dublin.—On Saturday a deputation, consisting of Archbishops Crolly, Murray, and Mac Hale, and the Right Rev. Dr. Ffrench, waited upon the Lord Lieutenant, at the Vice regal Lodge, Phœnix Park, with the following memorial, unanimously adopted at the meeting of the Irish Roman Catholic bishops on Friday last.

"To his Excellency Lord Heytesbury, Lord Lieutenant & Lord and Governor General of Ireland. The Memorial of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland Humbly showeth—That memorialists are disposed to co-operate, on fair and reasonable terms, with her Majesty's Government and the Legislature in establishing a system for the further extension of academical education in Ireland. That the circumstances of the present population of Ireland afford plain evidence that a large majority of the students belonging to the middle classes will be Roman Catholics, and the memorialists, as their spiritual pastors, consider it their indispensable duty to secure to the utmost of their power the most effectual means of protecting the faith and morals of the students in the new colleges, which are to be erected for their better education. That a fair proportion of the professors and other office-bearers in the new colleges, should be members of the Roman Catholic Church, whose moral conduct shall have been properly certified by testimonials of character, signed by their respective prelates. And that all the office-bearers in those colleges should be appointed by a board of trustees, of which the Roman Catholic prelates of the province in which any of those colleges shall be erected, shall be members. That the Roman Catholic pupils could not attend the lectures on history, logic, metaphysics, moral philosophy, geology, or anatomy, without exposing their faith or morals to imminent danger, unless a Roman Catholic professor will be appointed for each of those chairs. That if any president, vice-president, professor, or office-bearer in any of the new colleges shall be convicted before the board of trustees of attempting to undermine the faith, or injure the morals of any student in those institutions, he shall be immediately removed from his office by the same board. That as it is not contemplated that the students shall be provided with lodging in the new colleges, there shall be a Roman Catholic chaplain to superintend the moral and religious instruction of the Roman Catholic students belonging to each of those colleges; that the appointment of each chaplain with a suitable salary, shall be made on the recommendation of the Roman Catholic Bishop of the diocese in which the college is situate, and that the same prelate shall have full power and authority to remove such Roman Catholic chaplain from his situation. Signed on behalf of the meeting, † D. MURRAY, Chairman. Dublin, May 28."

The Lord Lieutenant read the memorial with attention, and entered into conversation with the prelates on the suggestions it contained. His Excellency intimated that he should at once transmit the memorial to the Government, and expressed his own opinion that every fair and legitimate concession would be made to protect the morals of the pupils, and to prevent any interference with the religion of Roman Catholics. His Excellency seemed to be of opinion that there would be no serious difficulty on any point suggested in the memorial, with the exception of the appointment of a board of trustees in whom the nomination of the professors should be vested. On that point his Excellency stated his conviction that Government would feel it their duty to give a decided negative. The change sought in this respect involved a principle to which he conceived the Government would feel bound to adhere; but in regard to the matters of detail suggested, every disposition existed to render the measure as useful and satisfactory as possible. The members of the deputation retired after thanking his Excellency for his anxiety to meet their wishes.

The Weekly Meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday, in Conciliation Hall, Mr. Moriarty, barrister, in the chair.—Mr. O'CONNELL said that before commencing the business of the day he had two most gratifying facts to communicate to the meeting. They had reference to the late magnificent demonstration in the county Meath in favour of nationality. On a former occasion the decorations in the town of Kells were entirely confined to the houses of the Roman Catholics, but on the present occasion seven out of the eight Protestant houses were decorated. He equally respected the opinions of the eighth individual, for he had no doubt but he acted in accordance with a conscientious feeling, but he felt bound to tender his gratitude to the seven Protestants who had declared in favour of their country. In Navan an equally gratifying exhibition took place. All the Protestants of that town joined in the demonstration, and decorated their houses in honour of the occasion, and in consequence the temperance bands played through the streets the "Protestant Boys." When all Ireland acted as the men of Kells and Navan the day of Ireland's regeneration could not be far distant. Mr. S. O'BRIEN commented severely on the conduct of Mr. Hume in persevering in his intention to move a call of the House, and accused him of ingratitude towards the Irish people. The motion of Mr. Hume, however, was useful in one respect, for it had been the means of deciding that the law gave the British House of Commons no power over the Irish members. The Government policy, however, had been changed and conciliation had become the order of the day. If he might be permitted, he would state his individual opinion on the measures they had granted, and were about conceding to Ireland. The first measure he would refer to would be the Bequests Act. It was said that that Bill was intended to be a measure of conciliation, but he would leave it to the meeting to say how far it was entitled to that character. The financial measures of the Government were favourable to Ireland, and he considered the Banking Bill as better than he was led to expect would be conceded by a Conservative government. The Maynooth Bill had his most unqualified approval. It had given satisfaction to the Catholics of this country, and, therefore, he was warranted in saying that it had his most hearty concurrence. He would now advert to the proposed system of academical education. The advantages that would accrue to Ireland from the establishment of provincial colleges and the extension of education were obvious. He regretted to be obliged to differ from his friend Mr. John O'Connell on the subject of mixed education, as he considered that the adoption of that system would ultimately lead to the opening of Trinity College. On the whole, he condemned the Government system of education, with the exception of the financial part, as deficient in many particulars and the fact of its not opening Trinity College, and allowing Roman Catholics to participate in the scholarships and fellowships of that establishment was enough to censure its condemnation, not to speak of the non-provision for religious education. After some further remarks of this kind, he said that too much had been made of this and other concessions. They were, after all, a mere nothing; and for his part he wished to see the contest for Ireland between Sir R. Peel and Mr. O'Connell a little longer. Mr. O'CONNELL said he came there to denounce the New Colleges Bill from end to end. He spoke authoritatively in condemning this execrable Bill. They were all united on the point; there was no dissension among them. He admitted the value of education. The foulest part of the penal code was that it prevented education; but he saw no redeeming quality in the new Bill, except merely that it recognised the importance of education. He sought nothing for the Catholics that he would not concede to the Protestants. He did not understand mixed education. Education if religious at all, must be exclusive. A more atrocious Bill was never attempted. He would not bid at all for it. A fouler attempt at public profligacy was never made. It was a bill to bribe and corrupt. It was replete with horrors and abominations. He pronounced his emphatical denunciation of it. It was altogether a graft from the French system of Louis Philippe. He thanked the Catholic Bishops for the explicit manner in which they had condemned this abominable Bill. He condemned the system of German education, and then proceeded to read a report on education in Prussia to show the prevailing ignorance of the people, particularly on the subject of religion. Education, he insisted, must be religious, any other might corrupt, but could not enlighten. He would go to London if necessary, to oppose the Bill. He objected to every part of it but the money part. As to Trinity College, he repeated his opinion that the Protestants ought to leave it to themselves. He wished the Catholics to have one also for themselves. Under present circumstances, Trinity college proved a sort of snare to many Catholics, who were tempted to recant by the good things which it had to offer. As to Lord J. Russell, his political hardihood—not to say impudence—was unmatched. He was himself the first Repealer, for it was his unjust partial Reform Bills which had first greatly excited the Repeal agitation. No living statesman had done such injustice to Ireland as Lord John Russell. They were all agreed about the Bill. The Government refused to alter the Bill; this he knew; but they would all unite and rally all Ireland together—to defeat this atrocious measure.—Mr. GRATTAN next addressed the meeting in a long speech. He denied that they were hostile to British connection, they were only hostile to British tyranny. They would be on their guard against a desperate Minister, who wanted no more than to reduce them to perfect captivity. The people of Ireland were not agitators. They were only too quiet. If they were agitators they would be up in arms against their oppressors. They would not, at all events, be deluded by any insidious bribes from Ministers. They rejected the colleges—nay, they would kick them over the bar of the House.—Mr. O'CONNELL deprecated the idea of turning out in arms; it was quite contrary to his system.—Mr. JOHN O'CONNELL spoke against the new colleges, and particularly against the system of mixed education. German education he looked upon as equivalent to sheer infidelity and such was the system which he argued it was sought to introduce here. He contended that Trinity College should be left to the Protestants.—A rather animated discussion then ensued on the merits of the bill, between the "Young Ireland" party and the "Old Ireland" party, the former declaring in favour of a mixed system of education, as tending to the amalgamation of all parties, which they considered as highly advantageous. The speakers in favour of mixed education were Mr. DAVIS and Mr. M. J. BARRY.—Mr. O'CONNELL then rose, and proceeded to combat the propositions made by the latter gentleman, and declared himself for "Old Ireland," and animadverted on the importance which "Young Ireland" had so unwarrantably assumed. He was glad that that party had at last openly declared itself, and that they could now understand the dark mutterings which had been uttered in other places.—Mr. STEELE then addressed the meeting in opposition to the bill, and a reconciliation having been effected between the "Young Ireland" and "Old Ireland" parties, Mr. O'CONNELL announced the rent for the week to be 600*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*

Tara.—On Thursday, the 22d, the long-announced Repeal demonstration took place on Tara-hill, which is about 20 miles distant from Dublin. Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by Mr. Steele, Mr. Ray, and others of his friends, arrived on the previous evening at Tara-hall, the residence of Mr. Lynch, where he remained for the night. The programme of the proceedings of the day included a meeting upon Tara-hill, and the celebration of mass afterwards. Next, a procession from Tara to Navan, a distance of five miles; then a meeting in the Town-hall of Navan, to petition for a Repeal of the Union; and, finally, a dinner to the Repeal "martyrs," in a newly-erected building, stated to be capable of accommodating 1000 persons. The preparations for the meeting on the hill were of the simplest character. An altar, of rude construction, screened by a canvas awning, was placed on the conical mound which surmounts the hill, and at a short distance from it a few tents were pitched, in which refreshments were furnished. Shortly after 12 o'clock Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by several friends, some of whom wore the uniform of the '82 Club, arrived upon the hill, and was, of course, received by the crowd with great cheering. Having taken up his station near the altar, the celebration of mass was immediately proceeded with, the Rev. Mr. M'Evoy, of Kells, being the officiating priest. At the conclusion of the service the rev. gentleman addressed his congregation briefly, exhorting them to behave in an orderly manner during the day, and advising them to give into the custody of the police any person whom they might find selling or distributing seditious ballads or placards. The number of persons assembled for the purpose of hearing amounted to about 5000, and there was probably about half that number scattered about in the neighbourhood. The number of horsemen was likewise very limited, and there was scarcely a vehicle on the ground of a class superior to the common farmer's cart. Contrasted with the monster meeting last year at the same place, the demonstration was a failure. At the former meeting the cars and carriages in attendance extended upwards of two miles in double and treble lines on the Dublin road; but on this occasion the by-road leading to the hill sufficed to contain the vehicles which joined the procession. Indeed, at the monster meeting there were nearly as many horses as there were men at the meeting of Thursday. Immediately subsequent to the termination of mass a procession was formed, consisting chiefly of the peasantry of the neighbourhood and the tradesmen of the adjoining towns of Kells, Navan, Slane, Dunshaughlin, &c., the people from each locality being headed by the temperance band of their district. Mr. O'Connell, about 2 o'clock, joined the procession, which then moved rapidly towards Navan. There was neither military nor police in attendance, and the proceedings on the hill, which were devoid of any feature of interest, were conducted in the most quiet manner. Having passed through the town of Navan, Mr. O'Connell ascended the platform, and the proceedings of the day commenced. Nicholas Boylan, Esq., ex-J.P., Hiltown-house, was called to the chair. —Mr. R. Mullen, secretary to the meeting, read "The petition of the clergy, gentry, electors, and other inhabitants of the county of Meath, in public meeting assembled, pursuant to requisition, at Navan, on Thursday, the 22d May," praying for a Repeal of the Union.—Mr. M'Cann moved the adoption of the petition, and that it be presented to the Commons by Mr. H. Grattan, M.P. The motion, which was seconded by Mr. J. Barnwall, Bloomsbury-house, was carried unanimously. —Mr. O'Connell came forward to address the meeting, and was received with loud cheers. When the cheering had subsided, he adverted to Ribbonism as one of the greatest calamities of Ireland, and after recapitulating his usual arguments in favour of Repeal, he proceeded to discuss the Maynooth Bill: What reliance, he said, can be placed upon the people of England? we shall look for kindness to this country in vain. You lately had an instance of what they really are. There is the grant to Maynooth. I am glad they have come to Maynooth at last—it was time for them to do something for the clergy of the people. But what passed in England in consequence? A yell—a hellish yell—was raised from one end of the land to the other. Every species of religionist was arrayed in opposition to it—everything that bigotry, prejudice, and fanaticism could suggest was urged against this simple measure of justice. The English people emphatically were against us; it is, therefore, that I appeal to you. I appeal to the people of Ireland. I ask you if you will join with me? I will lead you into no scrape—no difficulty—no danger. Commit no crime—extinguish Ribbonism—join with me. We will most scrupulouly obey all the existing laws. If they pass an Act of Parliament rendering it compulsory to supply 15 or 20 men from each barony in each county in Ireland, we will pay most implicit obedience to that Act of Parliament. If they call out the militia, why, the militia will turn out in obedience to commands, but between you and I, it is not very likely they will take such steps. We will, as I said before, obey the law in all respects. But beyond that we shall positively do nothing, unless they give us the value of our resources by restoring the legislative independence of Ireland. The year before last Sir James Graham said that concession to Ireland had reached its limits, but is Sir James of the same opinion now. He has retracted every word of it; he now says that instead of concession to Ireland having reached its limit, it is now only beginning. Why does he say so? Because they perceive the progress of Repeal, and they are trying to buy the people from me. Oh, what a chance they have of it! Let them compete with me, and I am satisfied. What will they bid for the Irish people [cries of "Repeal"]? The Repeal—indeed that would be our price. [A voice: "We will take no less."] Yes, we will take everything we can get. Everything we get will put us in good humour. There will be some benefit derived from the Bank Bill, and also from the measure with reference to the reduction of the duty on glass. But I want something to be done for the poor man. I say, let the man who is in the possession of land not be put out of possession until he is paid to the last farthing the value of the labour and capital expended by him in its improvement. Lord Stanley has actually promised that we shall have such a law. Do you think he would do that if we were not looking for Repeal. In the House of Commons they had the audacity to declare that Repeal was on the decrease. A moon-calf of a fellow, who represents Cornwall (I forget his name—it is no matter) told his constituents the other day that the Peel ministry was a glorious ministry, a magnificent ministry—and why, think you? Because they had put down O'Connell and Repeal. Did you ever hear anything like that in the whole course of your lives? Put me down! Do I look as if I had been put down? If they put me down it was by packing a jury against me, and resorting to every infamous device in order to secure an illegal conviction against me. They succeeded; I was sent to gaol for three months, and at the termination of that period they made the notable discovery that I ought not to have been sent there at all. But it is no matter; I will forgive them everything if they give me the Repeal. And they will—be assured of it the day will come when they will give it us, and no thanks to them—that is, if you follow my advice, and resolve upon transgressing no law, and being guilty of no violation of the peace." At the banquet in the evening, Mr. O'Connell again addressed the meeting at great length, and in the course of his speech condemned the New Education Bill of Government, on account of the absence of religion from the system of instruction it proposes. Dr. Cantwell, Roman Catholic bishop of Meath, also spoke on the same topic, and said, that Sir R. Inglis had very properly described the Bill as a "gigantic scheme of godless education."

Sporting.

EPSOM RACES.—TUESDAY.—These races opened with delightful weather, and the following sport.—Craven Stakes of 10 sovs each: for 3-yrs-old, 6 st 8 lb; 4 yrs, 8 st 10 lb; 5 yrs, 9 st 4 lb; 6 yrs and aged, 9 st 10 lb. 8 subs. Lord Chesterfield's Knight of the Whistle, aged, beat Col. Cradock's Pagan, aged; Mr. Ford's Attorney (carried 4 lb over), 3 yrs, and five others. Won by a neck.—Woodcote Stakes of 10 sovs each, with 50*l.* added: for 2-yrs-old colts, 8 st 6 lb; and fillies, 8 st 3 lb. 14 subs. Lord G. Bentinck's Cherokee, beat Mr. John Day's The Hero, Mr. Dawson's Lord Harry, and seven others. Won easily by a length.—Manor Stakes of 5 sovs each, with 40 added; for 3-yrs-old, 6 st 10 lb; 4, 8 st 7 lb; 5, 8 st 12 lb; 6 and aged, 9 st 1 lb; winner to be sold for 300*l.* second to save his stake. Heats, 2 miles. 7 subs. Mr. Dockeray's Dalesman, 4 yrs, beat Mr. T. Dawson's Montgomerie, 3 yrs. Mr. Worley's John Davis, 3 yrs, won the first heat cleverly by a length, and was mounted for the next, but, to the chagrin of his backers, was drawn, in order that he might take his chance for the Derby. Mr. Rolt's Hampton, 6 yrs, and Mr. C. Smith's Antonio, 3 yrs, who were three and four in the first heat were also drawn. Dalesman, who was second in this heat, won the two next in a canter.

WEDNESDAY.—THE DERBY.—Notwithstanding the heavy rain with which the "Derby day" was ushered in, the course was crowded at 12 o'clock, and as the weather cleared up in the afternoon the scene altogether was as usual most exciting. The chief race was fixed for half-past two o'clock, but punctuality in such an event is so difficult that it has never yet been attained. The difficulty, was however, increased by the unprecedented number of horses brought to the post; no fewer, in fact, than 31. Besides three false starts, an accident happened to Alarm and his jockey, which delayed the final start at least a quarter of an hour. Libel reared up, and, striking at Alarm, hit the jockey on the wrist and caused him to be dismounted. Alarm ran off, but was caught and took part in the race. At about half-past three a good start was effected, and in a few brief moments the hopes and fears of the thousands who had breathlessly awaited the commencement of the struggle were set at rest. The "crack" was beaten disgracefully; and a horse that was not even mentioned in the betting, proved to the satisfaction of the unlearned in racing matters that the "knowing ones were done again!" The Derby Stakes of 50 sovs each, h ft; for 3-yrs-old colts, 8 st 7 lb, and fillies, 8 st 2 lb. Owner of the second horse to receive 100*l.* out of the stakes; winner to pay 100 sovs towards the police regulations of the course. Last mile and a half. 138 subs. Mr. Gratwicke's The Merry Monarch, by Slane (F. Bell) beat Mr. A. Johnstone's Annandale, Mr. Gully's Old England, and Mr. Mostyn's Pantasa. The following also started, but were not placed:—Lord Stradbroke's Idas, Mr. Gully's Weatherbit, Mr. A. W. Hill's The Libel, Mr. Gratwicke's Doleful, Lord Chesterfield's Pam, Mr. Ford's Fuzbos, Colonel Cradock's Jinglepot, and 20 others. A good start was accomplished at the fourth attempt, Idas leading off followed by Salopian, Fuzbos, Cobweb colt, Wood Pigeon, Kedger, and Doleful, Pantasa and Merry Monarch next, side by side, and behind them Mentor and Pam, Annandale and Old England lying in the centre. In this way they ran at a good pace to the top of the hill, where Kedger and Doleful went to the front, and jointly carried on the running at an improved pace, Pantasa and The Merry Monarch next, with Wood Pigeon, Idas, Mentor, Pam, Old England, and Annandale in their wake. They came thus to the turn, in rounding which Pam, owing as it is alleged, to another horse hanging upon him, struck into Wood Pigeon's heels and fell; Weatherbit, who was following, jumped over him, and being put out of his stride, of course lost some ground. Doleful and Kedger kept their places to the distance, where the Merry Monarch went in front, followed by Annandale, Pantasa lying third, and Old England, in company with Doleful, Kedger, and Wood Pigeon. The run in was all in favour of The Merry Monarch, Annandale never getting nearer than his quarters, and being finally defeated in clever style by a length. Old England came at the last, and beat Pantasa for third place by a neck, Annandale beating him by a length. Next to this lot were Wood Pigeon, Doleful, and Kedger, and behind them the favourite Idas (who was in trouble before he got to the road), and Adonis. Those who pinned their faith on Libel must have been not a little mortified to perceive that he was the first horse beaten, and the last at the winning chair. The Laird o' Cockpen, the Corumba colt, Worthless, Young Eclipse, The Black Prince, Cabin Boy, and several others, were beaten early. The pace was good all the way. Value of the stakes, 3975*l.*—Epsom Stakes of 5 sovs each, with 35 added; 3-yrs-old, 7st 10lb; 4, 8st 11lb; 5, 9st 2lb; 6 and aged, 9st 6lb; mares and geldings allowed 3lb. Winner to be sold for 120*l.* 1 mile. 5 subs. Mr. T. Dawson's Live and Let Live, 4 yrs, beat Lord G. Bentinck's Such-a-getting-up-Stairs, 3 yrs, Mr. York's Bletsoe Lass, 4 yrs, and Mr. Coleman's The Black Duchess, 5 yrs. Won cleverly by a length and claimed.—Walton Stakes of 5 sovs each, with 35 added; 3-yrs-old, 7st 10lb; 4, 8st 11lb; 5, 9st 2lb; 6 and aged, 9st 6lb; mares and geldings allowed 3lb. Winner to be sold for 120*l.*; 6 subs. Mr. Phillimore's Physalis, 4 yrs, beat Lord G. Bentinck's Moonshine, 3 yrs, Mr. Drinkald's Midge, 5 yrs, Mr. Dorrien's Justice Greedy, 4 yrs, and Mr. Roe's Midas, 4 yrs. Won easily by a length and claimed.—Burgh Stakes of 5 sovs each, with 35 added; 3 yrs, 8st 2lb; 4 yrs, 8st 11lb; 5 yrs, 9st; 6 yrs and aged, 9st 4lb; mares and geldings allowed 3lb; winner to be sold for 80*l.*; 9 subs. Mr. Shelley's Prince of Wales, 4 yrs, beat Lord G. Bentinck's Physalis, 4 yrs, and 6 others who were not placed; Won on the post by a head only.

THURSDAY.—Epsom Four-Year-Old Stakes of 50 sovs each, h ft; for colts, 8 st 11 lb, and fillies, 8 st 6 lb. 5 subs. Mr. Ford's Qui Tam walked over.—Sweeps. of 10 sovs each, 5 ft, if declared; second to save his stake. 8 subs, 1 declared. Lord Lord G. Bentinck's Moonshine, 3 yrs, 4 st 9 lb, beat Mr. Hook's Wild Roe, 3 yrs, 4 st 9 lb, Mr. T. Dawson's Live-and-let-Live, 4 yrs, 7st, Mr. Death's Isleworth, 6 yrs, 8 st 3lb, Mr. Galpin's f, by Elis, out of Cecilia, 4 yrs, Mr. Wesley's Jessie Hammond, 3 yrs, 5 st 6 lb, and Mr. I. Day's b g by Mazeppa, out of Busk, 4 yrs, 6 st 11 lb; won by three lengths.—Surrey Cup (handicap) or piece of Plate of 209 sovs, surplus in specie, by subs of 10 sovs each, with 50 sovs added. 22 subs. Scott's Gatherer, 5 yrs, 7 st 1 lb, Mr. Ellis's Moustache, 4 yrs, 7 st 1 lb, Duke of Richmond's Lothario, 5 yrs, 8 st 12 lb, Mr. Bowser's The Correct Card, 3 yrs, 5 st 3 lb, and Lord Verulam's f, by Laurel out of Christina, 4 yrs, 6 st 11 lb. Won by a head.—Sweeps of 5 sovs each, with 40 added: 3-yrs-old, 6 st 7 lb; 4, 8 st 7 lb; 5, 9 st 12 lb; 6 and aged, 9 st 1 lb, &c; winner to be sold for 150 sovs. Heats, one mile. 6 subs. Mr. T. Dawson's Live-and-let-Live, 4 yrs, beat in both heats Mr. Coleman's The Devil-among-the-Tailors, 6 yrs, and Mr. Dyson's Loadstar, 3 yrs; both heats won in a canter. The weather all day was cold, misty and rainy—confining the prospect to a very limited range. The roads were in bad condition, and the course dirty and clammy. The company was small, and the day's sport very inferior.

FRIDAY.—The Oaks Stakes of 50 sovs each, h ft, 3-yr-old fillies, 8st 7 lb; second to receive 100 sovs of the stakes. Last mile and half. Duke of Richmond's Refraction, beat Mr. R. Bennett's Hope, Major Yarburgh's Miss Sarah, Lord Chesterfield's Lady Wildair, and 17 others. Won by two lengths.

News of the Week.

THE debates in Parliament this week have run to an unusual length, and will be read with much more than common interest. In the Lords the chief event has been the great discussion on the second reading of the Maynooth Bill, to which the public curiosity has been so much directed. The debate was opened on Monday by an animated speech from the Duke of Wellington, who gave a novel feature to the arguments already used in favour of the Bill, by urging that as this country is now in a position of strength, in regard to Ireland, it would look like persecution to refuse the grant. The Duke of Cambridge seconded the motion, and regarded the Bill as involving a political, and not a religious question; and as being one of the wisest and most conciliatory measures that have been proposed for some years. Lord Roden moved an amendment to the effect, that a committee be appointed to examine and report upon the class books used at Maynooth, and that the present Bill be referred to such committee. The Bishop of London seconded the amendment, and a debate ensued which lasted during the whole of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday nights. The speakers in favour of the second reading of the Bill were the Earl of St. Germans, Lord Beaumont, Lord Clifford, the Earl of Hardwicke, the Earl of Carnarvon, the Marquis of Normanby, the Archbishop of Dublin, Lord De Ros, Lord Brougham, the Duke of Cleveland, Earl Spencer, the Bishop of Norwich, the Earl of Mornington, Lord Monteagle, the Bishop of St. David's, and Lord Stanley; and the speakers in favour of Lord Roden's amendment were the Duke of Manchester, the Bishop of Cashel; the Earl of Winchilsea, the Bishop of Exeter, the Earl of Clancarty, Lord Colchester, and the Earl of Charleville. The interest of the debate was such that it was not brought to a close until half-past three on Thursday morning, when the House divided,—first on Lord Roden's amendment, which was negatived by a majority of 96, and then on the main question of the second reading, which was carried by a majority of 157, the numbers being 226 to 69. Another debate of some interest took place in the Lords on Friday, on Lord Radnor's motion for the second reading of his Bill for regulating the opening of letters at the Post Office under the warrant of the Secretary at State. The Bill was supported by Lord Denman and Lord Campbell, and opposed by Lord Stanley, Lord Brougham, the Marquis of Normanby, and the Lord Chancellor, and was negatived on a division by 55 to 9. In the Commons, Ireland has also formed the main topic of discussion. On Friday night, Sir J. Graham moved the second reading of the Irish Colleges Bill, upon which Lord J. Manners moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months. After two nights' debate, during which several members declared that they gave the measure only a conditional support in the hope that it would undergo important alterations in committee, on the subject of religious instruction, the House divided on the amendment, and negatived it by 311 to 46. The amendment was therefore lost, and the Bill read without further opposition. On Tuesday, Mr. Hume moved an address to Her Majesty, praying for the grant of a suitable provision to Sir Henry Pottinger, as a reward for his eminent public services. The interesting debate which ensued was remarkable for the cordial unanimity which pervaded the House in favour of the motion, and it will, perhaps, be difficult for Sir H. Pottinger to decide whether it was a greater compliment, that it was carried without a dissenting voice, or that such a motion originated with Mr. Hume. On the same night Mr. Ward brought forward his motion for a select committee to inquire into the burdens affecting the landed interest, which was opposed by Ministers, and negatived by 182 to 109.

The Overland Mail has arrived this week, but, with the exception of the continued disturbances in the Punjaub, there is scarcely a syllable of news. The Punjaub is naturally the source of much anxiety, and it is believed that the moment for British intervention cannot be far distant.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal family continue at Buckingham Palace. During the week the Queen has taken her usual exercise, and has occasionally rode out on horseback. Prince Albert on Monday was installed as a Governor of Bridewell and Bethlehem Hospitals, with the usual ceremonies, and afterwards presided at the distribution of the prizes, &c., at the Society of Arts. On Tuesday evening the Queen and his Royal Highness, accompanied by the Prince of Leiningen, honoured the performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter-hall, with their presence, Her Majesty having been pleased to command a performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio, St. Paul. On the same day Prince Albert was present at St. George's, Hanover-square, at the christening of the infant son of the Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer, his Royal Highness honouring their Excellencies by standing godfather in person. On Wednesday morning Her Majesty and the Prince visited the Exhibition of the Royal Botanical Society, in the Regent's-park, and on the same day the Duke and Duchess of Nemours arrived from France on a visit to Her Majesty. The Queen's Fancy Ball, for which such extensive preparations have been in progress for some time past, took place last evening, but the details of the entertainment must be reserved for our next. The Countess of Gainsborough has succeeded the Countess of Mount Edgecumbe as lady in waiting. The Marquis of Ormonde has succeeded Lord Byron as lord in waiting. Colonel B. Drummond has succeeded Capt. the Hon. A. Duncombe as groom in waiting; and Colonel the Hon. C. Grey has succeeded Lord C. Wellesley, as Equerry in Waiting to the Queen; and Major-General Sir E. Bowater has succeeded Colonel Wylde as Equerry in Waiting to Prince Albert. It is stated in the daily papers that Her Majesty and his Royal Highness contemplate a visit to Germany during the ensuing summer. It is understood that the Court will leave England early in August, and that, as at present arranged, Her Majesty and the Prince will pay a visit of six days' duration to their relatives at Gotha, and a further six days at Coburg. Active preparations are already in progress for the reception of the Royal party, both at the Palace and the Theatre of Gotha. It is believed that the visit of Her Majesty and Prince Albert to Paris (if it has ever been contemplated), will not take place during the present summer.

Parliamentary Movements. — On Tuesday Lord Edwin Hill was elected, wishout opposition, member for county Down, in the room of the Earl of Hillsborough, who has succeeded to the peerage as Marquis of Downshire.—A vacancy is about to be created in the representation of Belfast, by the appointment of Mr. Emerson Tennent to the office of Colonial Secretary of Ceylon. Lord John Chichester has offered himself as a candidate, and it is believed that he will be unopposed. —It is rumoured that Mr. Greene will not again offer himself as a candidate for Lancaster, but will be raised to the peerage after the dissolution of the present Parliament.

Death of Lord Harris.—This nobleman expired on Friday last, after an illness of four days, at his seat, Belmont, near Feversham. The deceased Baron Harris, of Seringapatam and Mysore, and of Belmont, Kent, was a Lieutenant-General in the army, and Colonel of the 73d Regiment, K.C.H. and C.B., was born in 1782, and succeeded to the family honours in 1829. His lordship married first, in 1809, the daughter of William Dick, Esq., of Tallimet, county of Perth, who died in 1817; and secondly, in 1824, Isabella, only child of R. H. Temple, Esq., of Waterstown, Westmeath. His lordship has left issue by both marriages, and is succeeded by his eldest son, who was born in 1810.

Knighthood.—The Queen has been pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood upon Henry Robinson, Esq., and to appoint him Lieutenant of Her Majesty's Hon. Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms, vice the Hon. Sir Edw. Butler, who retires.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The new convention, concluded by the Duc de Broglie and Dr. Lushington, for the suppression of the slave-trade is published by all the Paris papers, but is far from proving agreeable to the Opposition prints one of which pronounces it "the most opprobious diplomatic hoax of the age." On the other hand, the Ministerial Débats bestows the utmost praise on it, as being the felicitous conclusion of one of the most arduous and delicate negotiations a Government ever undertook. The same Ministerial print adds that Ministers were to meet in council on Tuesday, and that the convention was likely to be returned to London, duly ratified, either on the same day or Wednesday. M. Guizot was so much improved in health that he intended to resume his official duties by affixing his signature to this treaty.—The abdication of Don Carlos in favour of his son is another leading topic of the Paris papers. The Opposition prints very generally consider Don Carlos to have abdicated in the expectation that a marriage will take place between Queen Isabella and his son. The Presse considers that the abdication has not been the work of one day only, but that it was hastened by Cabrera, who forwarded, a few days ago, a letter to Don Carlos, in which he told him that the marriage between the Prince of Asturias and Queen Isabella must, at any cost, be prepared for, even were the Prince to bear no other title than that of the Queen's husband. According to the Constitutionnel, it was on Friday that the Marquis de Villafranca delivered the documents announcing the abdication to Louis-Philippe, demanding, at the same time, that passports be issued to Don Carlos for Italy. "The King," adds the same print, "is said to have confined himself to the reply that the affair should be examined in the council of Ministers." "Few events of equal importance have presented themselves under more difficulties to the speculator than the abdication of Don Carlos," says the Paris letter of the Times. No man can foretell the consequences. It is either for a great good or for a great evil. One thing only is clear, namely, that it is not the work of French intrigue, being, on the contrary, diametrically opposed to the views that France has so long entertained upon Spain. It is notorious in the precincts of the Tuileries, that previous to the unexpected arrival of the Envoy of Don Carlos with his abdication, and which you announced two days before it was known here, the Duke de Nemours proposed to be at Bayonne about the middle of August with the Duc d'Aumale and to visit the Queen of Spain at St. Sebastian. This was, it is asserted, with a view to promote the interests of the brother, the Duke de Montpensier, who aspires to the hand of the Infanta, the sister of Queen Isabella. The abdication of Don Carlos and the pretensions of his son are calculated, however, to bring about changes and events in that respect, and in others of vast magnitude. One of them will probably, in any case, be the withdrawal for ever of Queen Christina from Spain, but it is really premature and a loss of time to attempt to speculate upon this new phase in Spanish affairs, and upon which you are likely to hear more than upon any other subject for months to come."—Regarding the negotiations with Morocco, the Constitutionnel says, that, alarmed at the impression they have made on public opinion, the French Cabinet has determined to make no concession respecting the question of the boundaries of Morocco, and to yield only with respect to such articles of the treaty as refer to commercial relations. The same organ of M. Thiers has an article on the result of the negotiations between the French and English Governments, for the revision of the treaties for the right of search. It asserts that the concessions of the English Cabinet on this subject have been purchased by the French Cabinet with a pledge of intervention for the purpose of preventing the annexation of Texas to the United States. The Constitutionnel censures this arrangement in very strong terms. It observes that the only part which France ought to perform in this affair is neutrality, but that if intervention would be excusable at all it would be the other way. To take part with the English Government, adds this journal, is to make an enemy of the Government of the United States.—The Chamber of Peers, resumed, on Saturday, the debate on the Bill, already passed by the Deputies, for the reduction of the Five per Cents., and rejected it by a majority of 118 to 28.—In the Chamber of Deputies, on Saturday, the Minister of Commerce presented a Bill for regulating the selling of poisonous substances, in consequence of the many crimes of late committed in France. The Chamber then resumed the discussion on the Bill for improving the condition of the slaves in the French colonies.—"It appears," says the Courrier Français, "that Prince Napoleon Jerome Bonaparte, son of the ex-King of Westphalia, has obtained permission from the Government to visit his cousin, the prisoner at Ham. It is even stated that the young Prince is to endeavour, in the name of all the members of his family, to persuade him to make such concessions to the French Government as would allow him to receive the benefits of the amnesty, and be restored to liberty." "Some judicial proceedings now before the law courts prove," says the Presse, "that Don Manuel Godoy, the Prince of Peace, is at present residing in obscurity in Paris, in the Rue de la Michodière. He had preserved of his former fortune a collection of valuable Spanish pictures, 297 in number, esteemed worth 2,000,000f. In 1829 M. Friedlein treated with the Prince for the acquisition of his gallery. Since then, several of the pictures were sold with the consent of M. Friedlein, but the latter now pretends that several were disposed of without his knowledge, and he demands a sum of 100,000f. from the Prince and the Countess of Castille Fiel, his wife."

SPAIN.—Accounts from Madrid of the 24th ult. state that on that day the Queen, accompanied by her mother and sister, left that capital for Barcelona.—General Narvaez has inaugurated his new constitution by the arbitrary arrest of the editors of the Clamor Publico for a libel upon himself, in violation of two of the most important principles of the constitution. The Clamor published an article upon Narvaez, in which a parody was given of the Queen's speech from the throne, under the title of "A Chapter from the History of the Hero of Ardoz, addressed to the Fathers of the People." M. Corradi, one of the gentlemen arrested, was Secretary to the Junta of Madrid during the insurrection which upset Espartero, and was long a warm supporter of the Moderado party. He was arrested by the head of the police, by Narvaez's orders. The other, M. Calvo, was arrested by one of Narvaez's Aides-de-Camp. It was said that so great was Narvaez's exasperation at the attack, that he gave immediate orders for the prisoners being forthwith sent off to Cadiz, to be transported thence, without trial, by the very first opportunity, to the Philippine Islands.

TURKEY AND SYRIA.—Accounts from Constantinople of the 17th ult. mention the approaching visit of the Crown Prince of Russia to the Sultan, and contain a long description of the ceremony of the betrothal of Mehemet Ali Pasha with the Sultana Adile, the youngest sister of the Sultan.—The latest novelty imported by the Porte from Europe is a stamp tax, which the Government is about to lay upon the people. All receipts, petitions, and law documents are to be subjected to a Government stamp, with the exception of the probate stamp, which is not mentioned in the tariff. The Turks impose this tax upon the people with European completeness.—The accounts from the Lebanon are of the most distressing kind. The arrangements recently made to prevent a renewal of the feuds between the Druses and the Maronites have completely failed in their effect; fresh disturbances have broken out, and many lives been lost on both sides, but the unfortunate Maronites were ultimately defeated by the aid of some Turkish soldiers, who joined the Druses to put down the defenceless Christians. The Turkish Government is suspected of having secretly instigated these unhappy commotions, and the Consuls of the European powers have protested against the part taken by the Turkish soldiers in the affair. The accounts describe the country as being given up to the most complete anarchy and disorder. Houses, convents, and villages are destroyed. The people, without regard to age or sex, are massacred, after being subjected to the most revolting brutality and excess. Several French priests have been murdered, and all this is done, it is said, under the protection and with the assistance of the Turkish Pacha. Colonel Rose, the British Consul, has interfered in favour of the Christians, and the result of a journey into the disturbed districts has been to rescue about 700 starving wretches, the remains of the tribes still remaining in the ruined villages.

UNITED STATES.—The mail-steamer Hibernia has arrived with news from Boston to the 16th ult. The intelligence which she brings is more interesting than important. It puts at rest all the fears which have been expressed and entertained that war would take the place of negotiation in the matter of the Oregon territory. The official organ of the Government, conducted by a personal friend of the President, declares that America desires peace with Great Britain—an honourable peace, and that there will be no interruption to the diplomatic intercourse which has hitherto existed between the two Governments on the mooted point. This pacific tone is adopted by the press of both parties, and the papers by the present arrival are almost, if not entirely, free from the acrimonious attacks upon Great Britain which marked those of an earlier date, and the threatened meetings in opposition to "British rapacity" have fallen through. It also appears that negotiation has been resumed by the present Secretary of State at the point at which it was closed by the retirement of Mr. Calhoun; and the rumour is repeated that a special Minister (probably Mr. Calhoun or Mr. Van Buren) is to be despatched to England for two important objects, which are stated by the New York Herald to be, "to cover both the settlement of the Oregon question, and to negotiate a commercial treaty of a character to draw the ties of friendship closer than ever between the United States and Great Britain."—As regards Mexico and the United States, matters remain in statu quo. War has not been declared, but it appears to be menaced. In this state matters will probably remain until the Mexican Government has had the opportunity of sounding some of the principal European powers on the peculiar position in which they now find themselves involved. In the meantime, it is declared with a kind of semi-official authority, that Mexico will consent to acknowledge the independence of Texas if the latter power will not connect herself with the United States. Santa Anna is still a prisoner, and his trial, if such it can be called, was still pending. Another earthquake occurred in Mexico, on the 15th April, accompanied by some damage to property and public buildings; it appears to have been hardly less injurious than the one which occurred on the 7th of the same month. In Montreal, a slight shock of an earthquake had been experienced, unattended, however, with any calamity. Our advices from Canada are of little importance. The Provincial Parliament had been further prorogued until the 17th June. The Kingston Chronicle states, upon authority not to be questioned, that Sir Charles Metcalf, on hearing it reported that he contemplated retiring from the government of Canada, replied, "that I have no such intention, and that it is my full determination to retain my present position as long as Her Majesty shall require my services."

WEST INDIES AND SOUTH AMERICA—By the Thames mail steam-ship, we have advices from Jamaica to the 9th of May, which is the latest date from that island. These state that at Kingston the most pleasing accounts had been received from the sugar districts. In some parts the planters were sanguine of producing double the quantity of sugar that was shipped last year, while in every parish a considerable increase was expected. Railways proceed apace. The valuation of land in the parish of St. Catharine's had taken place.—From Hayti the latest intelligence was the death of Guerrier, and the election by the Council of State of Louis Pierrot to the Presidency. Martial law had been declared in consequence of the threatened invasion by Herard, who however had not landed, fearing the result of his adventure.—Advices from Bogota to the 18th April announce that General Thomas C. de Mosquera has assumed the reins of Government. He is stated to be deeply interested in the fulfilment of the undertaking of opening a communication across the Isthmus of Panama between the Atlantic and the Pacific. He is also said to favour the construction of the canal of the Dique, now in progress of formation between Carthagena and the river Magdalena, which canal will afford the means of easy and convenient transport for passengers and merchandise from Carthagena as far as Honda, the point of embarkation on the river near to Bogota.—A private letter from the Havannah, dated the 7th ult., states that Capt. Elliot, our Chargé d'Affaires at Texas, had been to Mexico and had induced that Government to take the first steps towards acknowledging the independence of Texas, on the latter republic promising not to incorporate with the United States.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The Overland Mail has arrived this week with accounts from Bombay to the 1st of May, and from Calcutta to the 22d April. The news is not of general interest, the disturbed state of the Punjab, with its intrigues and counter-intrigues, being the chief topic of the Indian papers. The sequel of these strange events is anxiously looked for, and it is generally believed that our Government will ere long be obliged to interfere. In Scinde all was quiet, and Sir C. Napier had arrived at Kurrachee. The British troops were assembling in considerable numbers on the banks of the Sutlej, but a treaty, it was expected, would be proposed to the King of Lahore before any hostile attack would be made on the Punjab. All the rebel chiefs of Sawunt Warree, save one, who was expected to be taken without trouble, had given themselves up to the Government of Goa. There was little room for doubting that the Affghans were fully prepared to invade Peshawur. Akhbar Khan quitted Cabul for Jellalabad on the 15th Feb., after a stay there of only 11 days, and was again in the valley of Nungunhur prosecuting his arrangements for offensive operations. Prince Waldemar of Prussia had been at Agra and Benares, and it was said intended visiting the Himalaya, after having seen all worthy of note in the upper provinces.—The news from China is to the 8th March, but is of little interest. Governor Davis, while on a visit at Macao, had been attacked by some Chinese footpads, who got him down and were proceeding to strip him when they were scared away by the appearance of some Portuguese gentlemen of the place.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—An immense number of petitions were presented against the Maynooth Bill.—Lord DACRE brought in a Bill for the amendment of the Game Laws, which was read a first time.—The Duke of BUCCLEUCH moved the committal of the Calico Print Works Bill.—Lord BROUGHAM said that dealers in legislative humanity dealt in the cheapest of all cheap articles, and it was worthless in proportion as it was cheap. To think that women—full-grown women of the age of 30, should not be allowed to work after 9 o'clock! But, then, they were dealers in morality as well as humanity! Why, did they think that those who were not to be allowed to work after 9 o'clock in print works, could not find a less innocent mode of employing their time?—The Earl of RADNOR followed in condemnation of humane legislation.—The Marquis of NORMANBY and Lord CAMPBELL supported the principle of the Bill, which passed through committee with some verbal amendments.—The Earl of RADNOR moved the second reading of the Post-office Regulation Bill, which, he said, was framed with the intention of regulating the practice of opening letters under the warrant of the Secretary of State. Nobody knew what the state of the law really was, and two Committees had elicited no information on the subject. With regard to the practice, he denied that it existed by virtue of Royal prerogative; neither could it be said to be undisputed, for it was done secretly, so that no one had an opportunity of complaining. The House would do well to consider the immoral effect of the system, and the bad example it set the other classes of society. The only question was, whether the Post-office Acts gave the power claimed? He thought that persons conversant with the language of Parliamentary Acts would agree with him that they did not. The noble Lord then proceeded to criticise the report of their Lordships' Committee on the matter, and said that this very return showed that the number of warrants had risen of late years from 1¼ per annum to 8. At first he had been disposed to abolish the power altogether, but on reconsideration he determined to bring in this Bill for regulating it. If the method adopted were objectionable, it could be altered in Committee.

Lord STANLEY was compelled by a sense of public duty to oppose the Bill. As for Lord Radnor's appeal to the honourable feelings of the House not to sanction an immoral practice, it would have been much more strong had it been followed by a Bill to abolish the custom altogether; but as it was, after-considerations had convinced him that the power must be retained as an engine of State policy. The measure had two objects in view—firstly, to define the law; and secondly, to impose restrictions on its application; but, instead of defining, it left the matter more indefinite than ever, and where it imposed restrictions, they rendered the law entirely inoperative. Surely, if there was one point more than another in which the law should be clear and definite, it was in specifying whether there might be a general warrant to open all letters addressed to a certain person or whether there must be a special warrant for each letter; and yet the measure contained no such provision. Lord Campbell had given it as his opinion that a general warrant was illegal, but that opinion had been controverted by Lords Brougham and Lyndhurst, as well as by Lord Denman in the first instance. The latter noble lord had, indeed, afterwards qualified his opinion; but the common sense of the question was contained in what had been first said by Lord Denman, "that it was absolutely impossible to know which particular letter of A. B.'s correspondence was treasonable, and therefore all his letters must be opened." This was a proof that a general warrant was the only practicable course, particularly at the present day when letters were transmitted by millions. But Lord Denman had afterwards said that circumstances might occur by which information might be gained, and what were these? Under a system of espionage information might be given to the Secretary of State, and thus a special warrant would be available; but in his (Lord Stanley's) opinion, a system of spies was odious, and utterly exploded as an engine of Government in this country. Now all this question of warrants was here raised in the measure. The only question for the House was, whether it was practicable to preserve the power as a principle, and provide by statute against its abuse. In his opinion it was not. Lord Radnor had introduced a clause defining the law under which the Secretary of State exercised this power, but it left the matter, as in the present law, entirely at the discretion of that Minister. So complete was the misdescription that he really thought Lord Radnor had not read his own Bill. The noble lord then proceeded to call the attention of the House to the imperfections of the Bill in detail; and, after contending that it would leave to the Government all the moral odium of the power, while it stripped it of all the advantages from its exercise, concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.—Lord DENMAN thought the subject should be considered on its true principle, and not on small technical points. The question was, whether the whole correspondence of the country was to be at the mercy of the Secretary of State, because it might be convenient to ascertain the secrets of eight people per annum. He hoped the House would never hear that the Crown had any prerogative for opening the letters of its subjects, for such a claim was unsupported by any legal proof. The statute of Anne was the first which compelled the proper transmission of letters, by making it penal not to deliver them. By one section of that act it was made penal for the Postmaster to detain, delay, or open letters, with an exception if the act were done under a warrant of the Secretary of State. But was the state of the law so well defined that they should not apply their minds to alter it? On the contrary, if an action were brought against the Postmaster for the offence, he did not know what was to protect him, except an inference from the statute of Anne. He must protest against the use which Lord Stanley had made of an inadvertent suggestion, to quote it as a deliberate opinion of the Lord Chief Justice. He had disagreed with Lord Campbell in thinking it absurd to specify every letter, and on another occasion he had said "that the very nature of the power of opening letters suffered a system of espionage, but was he to be held up as a patron of a system of espionage because he had also said that under that act he did not see how the power could be restricted to any particular letter? Practically that power could not legalise itself, for if a general warrant were brought into a court of justice, it was immediately condemned. But supposing the Secretary of State to have the power, what kind of warrant was it that would justify him? Was it a general warrant? That would give him the right of stopping all letters. Was it to be confined to a single letter? Then there would be no use in it. The subject, therefore, was a very proper one for their Lordships' consideration, especially as the Ministers themselves declared the exercise of the power to be odious, and one which they would be glad to get rid of. With respect to the proceedings of last year, he fully acquitted the Secretaries of State of misconduct, but he should like to know on what principle they had acted. If it were a good one, he did not see why an Act of Parliament should not bind them. The noble lord then proceeded to quote passages from Lord Malmesbury's "Diary" bearing on the subject, and to give other instances of the abuse of the power; and, after declaring that he thought the right might be safely abolished, concluded by adverting to the state of suspicion into which the proceedings of last year had thrown the public, and after quoting a passage from Hume depicting the miserable condition of Cromwell at the end of his life, owing to his suspicious fears, hoped that the illustrious conqueror who was the pride and bulwark of England, would rescue the Government from the odium which hung over it.—Lord BROUGHAM agreed with Lord Denman in what he had said of the noble Duke and Cromwell; but had not time to enter into that or some other topics touched on in the noble lord's speech. He should content himself with defending the Committees. First of all, they had been charged with not defining the law; but on consulting the report it would be found they had said "the power was of immemorial usage," and had been recognised by repeated statutes. He knew of no better foundation than this, and nine-tenths of the Constitution rested on no better authority. His lordship proceeded to defend the Committees, and then argued in favour of maintaining the power on account of its use in the detection of crime, and the preservation of peace in the country.—Lord CAMPBELL said the question was, whether the law was to remain in its present state, or whether an attempt should be made to regulate it? For his part he thought it would be better to abolish the power altogether, but if it must be retained, it was contrary to all notions of honour and propriety, it was [illegible] necessary that it should be legalised and defined.—The Lord CHANCELLOR said, that though he was sorry to differ from the Lord Chief Justice, it was impossible to doubt that the power in question was a legal power legally exercised: it had been recognised over and over again in courts of justice and Acts of Parliament, as was clear from the facts stated in the reports of the Committees. With respect to the Bill itself, its inconsistencies had been so well exposed by Lord Stanley and Lord Brougham, that he would not waste any time on it.—Lord NORMANBY explained; and after a few words from Lord DENMAN in opposition to the Bill, their lordships divided—For the second reading, 9; against it, 35: majority, 26.—The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill passed through committee. The Museums of Arts Bill was read a second time.

Monday.—The Lord CHANCELLOR announced that Mr. O'Driscoll had been dismissed from the commission of the peace in Ireland.—On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, the Debtors and Creditors Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.—After the presentation of an immense number of petitions against the Maynooth Bill, and some in favour of it, the Duke of WELLINGTON moved the second reading of the Bill. His grace began by admitting that any grant to Maynooth was inconsistent with the laws by which the Reformation was established, but at the same time, by denying that it was inconsistent with the principles of the Reformation. He then proceeded to trace the events antecedent to the establishment of Maynooth, which college, he said, had only been founded after all attempts to propagate the Reformation in Ireland had failed, and after repeated rebellions and a contest for the Crown. Here the noble duke was called to order by the Duke of NEWCASTLE, who demanded to know whether his grace had the Queen's permission to make such a communication to the House.—Lord BROUGHAM called upon the Duke of Wellington not to answer the question, and denied that the consent of the Crown was requisite to enable that House to discuss the Bill.—The Duke of WELLINGTON, without giving an answer to the Duke of Newcastle's question, proceeded. His grace contended that the annual grants made by successive Parliaments, Irish and Imperial, since 1795, had been sanctioned by men who were the best friends of the Established Church, and that these grants were not contrary to the religious principles of the reformed religion; and he held that the permanent increased grant now proposed made no alteration in the principle sanctioned for 50 years. He dwelt much on the danger of having priests, to whom the instruction of the Irish people must necessarily be confided, educated abroad, and said that, as they could not make the Roman Catholic people of Ireland Protestants, they were bound to give them a properly educated priesthood. The making of the grant perpetual he considered as most wise, because it would put an end to the annually returning disputations on the subject, which tended to no good. The Duke, after going through the provisions of the Bill, concluded by saying:—"My lords, whatever may be the opinion of the legal effect of the decision of your lordships' House on the writ of error delivered in August or September last, I believe that there is no man in his senses who now doubts that it is absolutely impossible—absolutely hopeless and impossible—to carry any measure by violence and tumult in Ireland against the wishes of the Government and the Parliament. I believe no man in his senses now doubts that fact, and that we are therefore this day in a situation to undertake the consideration of this measure. Now I beg to ask your lordships whether, standing as you do at this moment in a position of strength, without any danger pressing on you—knowing as you do that the great body of those who took a principal part in those tumults and acts of violence were Roman Catholics, though there were certainly some exceptions, but most of them belonged to the Roman Catholic religion, amongst whom, however, there are many who are as firmly attached to the Union as any of ourselves; knowing this, I say, and seeing that you are in a situation of strength at present, I ask you would it not look, having maintained this institution for 50 years, a little like persecution if you were now to turn round and say, 'No, we are aware of the necessity of continuing the grant, but will not countenance the institution being placed on a more respectable footing.' I have told your lordships there is no religion in this question; but I say there is a great Christian principle, and that it is your duty not to persecute, not even to appear to persecute."—The Duke of CAMBRIDGE seconded the motion. His Royal Highness looked upon this as a political, not a religious question; and as such, it was, in every sense, one of the most conciliatory and wise measures that had been proposed for many years in Parliament. The Government deserved the gratitude of the country for having brought it forward; and he hoped it would be eminently successful in that country for the advantage of which it was specially designed.—The Earl of RODEN moved as an amendment, for the appointment of a committee to make inquiries with respect to the class-books used and the general instructions given at Maynooth, and that this Bill might be referred to such committee. He had always opposed the annual Maynooth grant, because he considered it a violation of the principles of the reformed religion. The permanent grant he regarded as an aggravated violation. By the annual grant Maynooth was a Roman Catholic institution, supported and tolerated, doubtless by the State, but by the present proposed endowment the College at once became a State institution, and that, too, without the slightest supervision of the State. It was said that this was a merely political measure: but, for his own part, he could not look upon it as one of a merely political tendency. On the contrary, he could not but look upon it as one involving the best religious feelings of the great majority of the Protestants of this empire; and, if he wanted proof of this, he need only refer their lordships to the petitions which had been presented against the Bill. The Protestants of Ireland had been ungratefully treated. Within the last few years all support by means of public funds had been withdrawn from most of the institutions connected with the Protestant Establishment—from the Incorporated Society, the Society for the Discountenance of Vice, and the Kildare-street Society, from the last of which the Government had withdrawn the grant at the very moment when that Society was so beneficial in promoting united education in Ireland. The Government of the day had, moreover, established on the ruins of that Society a system of national education which was contrary to the feelings of the majority of the Protestant hierarchy of Ireland, as well as of the general body of the Protestant laity. It appeared to him, also, that there was another view of the present measure, in reference to which he thought that "fair play" had not been the lot of the Protestant Church. The Protestant Church had itself established a Church Education Society, under the control and direction of a majority of the hierarchy of that Church, and which educated members of that Church in its tenets and doctrines; and yet the Government had refused, and still continued to refuse, all aid to that institution, whilst, that very night, they would call upon their lordships to endow a priesthood, educated for the purpose of extending in Ireland the Roman Catholic faith—a religion not only differing from, but hostile to, the Established Church of the nation. The noble earl read a variety of documents and speeches to prove the disloyal and disaffected character of the Irish Roman Catholic priesthood, and quoted several of the class-books read at Maynooth to establish the objectionable nature of the instruction given at that college.—The Bishop of LONDON thought the noble earl had made out a case for inquiry with reference to the Bill itself. After the most careful and anxious consideration, he found himself under the painful necessity of refusing his assent to it, as involving a violation of one of the most fundamental principles of the constitution, while it held out no prospect of such advantage as might be thought to justify it on the grounds of expediency. The principles taught at Maynooth were calculated to make the priests democrats in politics, and in the church intolerant bigots. They were at once inconsistent with the faithful discharge of duty to the State, and utterly incompatible with the maintenance of peace in a commonwealth composed of persons having different opinions. Could they be justified, then, in endowing a college to carry out such a system, without at least exacting from those to be intrusted with the working of it some distinct and definite pledge that the system itself should be improved, and its worst features removed? This was the first link that had been forged to tie together the State and the Roman Catholic church. He could not consent to any measure which would make the College of Maynooth an integral part of the constitution. He gave credit to the pure and charitable motives of the Government in bringing forward this measure. He could well understand their embarrassment when they turned their eye to the map of Ireland; but the right principle on which, in his opinion, that country should be governed was this—never for any consideration to do what was clearly wrong in principle; to do their best to discover what was right, to follow it out honestly and fearlessly, trusting for the issue to the Supreme Disposer of events, who, in accordance with His written word, would deal favourably with that nation which upheld His own truth, or at least did nothing to impede its progress.—The Earl of ST. GERMANS vindicated the provisions of the Bill, and insisted that the new system of bonâ fide and effectual visitation which it contained would of itself do much to improve the system of education pursued at Maynooth. Hitherto the grant had been wholly inadequate; and the niggardly treatment the priests received at that seminary rankled in their minds long after they left it. By making the endowment in some degree commensurate with its important objects Parliament would do much to insure their gratitude and conciliate their support. He recommended the measure as one of justice to the great majority of the Irish people.—The Duke of MANCHESTER opposed the Bill, and read several extracts from evidence given before various committees to show the injurious influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood on the minds of the people in Ireland.—Lord BEAUMONT, on the part of his co-religionists, emphatically denied many of the statements which had been made by the opponents of the Bill. If they really believed the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church to be as they described, toleration would be a crime. He altogether repudiated the ultramontane doctrine of allegiance; and it was not fair to quote books of no authority to prove that such doctrines were inculcated at Maynooth. He did not regard this as an isolated measure; if it were, it would not purchase the allegiance of the priesthood if it were alienated. Their charity must be extended to the working clergy. They must also do something for the laity, and already he was happy to think that a measure had been introduced elsewhere, which, faithfully followed up, would not only be a great benefit to the laity, but also to the higher classes of the clergy, by improving the system of academical education in Ireland.—The Bishop of CASHEL urged the necessity of inquiry. His own mind was indeed made up on the question, but inquiry would be useful to those who had not so strong opinions as he entertained, both with reference to the injurious system of separate education for ecclesiastics and the intrusion of Jesuits into the College of Maynooth. The main ground, however, on which he objected to this Bill was, that he could not be a party to teach what he conscientiously believed to be erroneous. It was not Christian charity or morality that he should teach to others what was antagonist to his belief as a Protestant by conviction; and before the State could honestly and consistently endow a Roman Catholic college she must unprotestantise herself. He would infinitely prefer the voluntary system to the endowment of two antagonist Churches.—After a few words from Lord CLIFFORD in favour of the Bill, the debate was, on the motion of the Earl of HARDWICKE, adjourned.

Tuesday.—The Debtor and Creditors Act Amendment Bill passed through committee.—The adjourned debate on the second reading of the Maynooth Bill was resumed by the Earl of HARDWICKE, who admitted that a strong feeling had been raised against the measure, which, however, it was somewhat difficult to understand, for it involved no new principle, and only extended to Ireland those measures which had already been adopted in many of the colonies of this country. He was friendly to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Although it had been called an antagonist church, its endowment might tend to strengthen the position of the Protestant Established Church, even if the funds for that purpose were derived from the ecclesiastical revenues of those 151 parishes, amounting to 58,000*l.* per annum, in which no Protestants were to be found. He was opposed to any inquiry into the system pursued at Maynooth; he gave no spiritual sanction to its dogmas; indeed there was much in them that without offence he must say he abhorred: but he hoped by raising the standard of education at Maynooth to make those educated there repudiate many of those absurd doctrines and opinions which men of taste and learning must disown.—The Earl of CARNARVON considered it the duty of Parliament to maintain the Protestant Church in Ireland; but it was impossible to deny that it formed the most anomalous, and therefore the most endangered, part of our Irish polity. But if that establishment were to be shaken by the mere breath of toleration and kindness, having no strength in itself, it must be, not of God, but of men. The question now was, whether the spiritual instructors of the great body of the Irish people should be well or ill educated?—whether they should be for or against us?—whether they should be attached or hostile to British interests? They had already sanctioned the principle of appointing Roman Catholic chaplains to prisons and workhouses; and if they refused their approval of this measure, their lordships ought not only to retrace their steps in that respect, but to withdraw the grant to Maynooth altogether, and repudiate the kinder policy so long pursued in our colonies. He vindicated the priests from the charge of disaffection, and commended them for the part they had taken in times of danger to preserve the loyalty of the Irish people. There could be no assured safety for our institutions in Ireland, unless we not only consulted Irish interests, but Irish sympathies too. He hailed this measure as a good omen, and he sincerely trusted that a just and equal policy would efface the wrongs of past misrule in that country.—The Earl of WINCHILSEA reprobated the measure as the most deadly blow ever aimed at Protestantism—our national Christianity—the foundation of our civil and religious liberties, and the true source of England's greatness. Were these to be cast away for the purpose of conciliating an ultra-montane priesthood? If their lordships passed this measure in spite of the respectful remonstrances of between 1,200,000 and 1,500,000 people of this country, they would forfeit the confidence and respect of the nation. He protested against this Bill as an national endowment of Popery, and in contravention of the oath taken by Her Majesty at her Coronation. He reiterated the charge that anti-social, disloyal, and intolerant principles were taught at Maynooth, and called special attention to the fact that in France they were making laws to exclude the Jesuits from all interference with education, while the Parliament of England was insanely throwing it into their hands. He concluded by solemnly entreating their lordships to reject this measure, which he warned them, in the excited state of Protestant feeling, must produce an outbreak, not in Ireland, but in this country.—The Marquis of NORMANBY reminded the House that they were now legislating for 7,000,000 Roman Catholics, whom they could not help continuing Catholic. Though Protestantism had done much for England, yet after all the ingenuity of Legislatures and the severity of Executives could do, in three centuries nothing had been accomplished by Protestantism in Ireland, because it had not been in accordance with the sincere convictions of the vast majority of the people. They must judge of the tree by its fruits. There had been no complaints whatever of the moral conduct of the students educated at Maynooth; and as to those whom they instructed, was it nothing to say the Irish were the most honest, the most modest, and the most temperate people? It was said the Catholic priests had stimulated crime in Ireland; on the contrary, he must bear his testimony that no body of men had ever exerted themselves with more energy and success in detecting and preventing crime than the Catholic priests. It was true they had often expressed themselves strongly, but what did their lordships say who had heard the speech of the Bishop of Cashel with reference to vehement language? The noble Marquis strongly condemned the spirit of that right rev. prelate's address, and read an extract from a charge said to have been delivered by the bishop, in which some very vituperative expressions occurred.—The Bishop of CASHEL declared the entire document to be a false and impudent fabrication. The charge had been printed and circulated at the time; he should send a copy of it to the noble Marquis, and advised him to read a portion of it to their lordships the next time he was in want of a speech.—The Marquis of NORMANBY explained that the document he had quoted purported only to be a report written by a gentleman who heard the charge. For himself, and those with whom he acted, he would say they gave a humble, sincere, and, he trusted, an effectual support to the policy of which he hoped this was no isolated measure.—The Archbishop of DUBLIN had often felt and expressed that the system of education at Maynooth was imperfect—scandalously imperfect; but it never occurred to him that, by wishing for its improvement, he should be considered inconsistent. If they gave the Roman Catholic priests the best education they were prepared to receive, one great evil would be cured. He protested, on the part of many of the most sincere, best informed, conscientious, and active, though not the most clamorous, of his clergy, that they were not to be held indifferent to their own faith on account of the perhaps mistaken toleration and indulgence they might show to that of others. He claimed no jurisdiction over the Roman Catholics, although he had spoken and written against their errors. He had vowed "to banish away all strange doctrines contrary to God's word." Now, there were different ways of doing this. Was he to drive them out by secular coercion—by penal laws—at the point of the bayonet! Was he to do this—a minister of Him who forbade his followers the use of the sword! Sooner than do this he would relinquish his profession—his Church—and endeavour to maintain himself by manual toil in the humblest station of life. His duty was to drive out erroneous and strange opinions from his own Church, and no one on the episcopal bench had exerted himself more assiduously and energetically than he had publicly to censure those who held the principles of one Church and the emoluments of another. He avowed himself the advocate of expediency in this matter, and he denied that expediency and duty were at variance with each other. He believed the Bill, though it might not satisfy agitators, would do much good in Ireland.—Lord DE ROS supported the Bill, and stated, with reference to the doctrines taught at Maynooth on the authority of the head of that college, that he was opposed to the agitation for Repeal.—The Bishop of EXETER insisted that the recluse mode of education practised at Maynooth was wholly inconsistent with the growth of manly character. During the 7 years the students were shut up in that monastic institution they never mixed with their superiors in rank or station, and could not, except occasionally in the vacations, even take a walk in the country by themselves. They were mere slaves, and the only consolation they had was, that at the end of their servitude they were to go forth, not as the ministers, but as the representatives of their God. They were educated as spiritual despots, and they became furious agitators, unfit to be the guides of the people. Instead of one great monastic establishment, he wished, in addition to the Bill in another place for founding three academical institutions in Ireland, there were a fourth, or rather, one branch in connection with each of those institutions, in which a liberal education might be given to Roman Catholic priests, with a proper system of discipline, consistent with fair opportunities of mixing with the gentry and other educated youth of the country. They would thus create in Ireland a body of priests such as they had in this country. The present measure would perpetuate a curse in Ireland. It would be easy before a committee of inquiry to prove that intolerant and anti-social doctrines were taught at Maynooth, of which he cited various instances.—Lord BROUGHAM felicitated the opponents of this Bill who had spoken before the Bishop of Exeter on the remarkably discrepant support given to their amendment by that Right Rev. Prelate, who, strongly as he was opposed to Maynooth, had yet no objection to the establishment of four colleges, where, in addition to the teaching of science and letters to lay-pupils, there should be ecclesiastical seminaries for the express purpose of fitting forth Roman Catholic priests on their mission for propagating Popish errors. Let the pictures of Maynooth—its defective police, habits, discipline, and education—be as unexaggerated as they might be, the real question was how those evils should be remedied. The system of visitation prescribed by this Bill furnished an effective cure for those mischiefs. He admitted the errors of the Romish Church, and the evil tendencies politically of the policy engrafted on the Catholic system. Intolerance was not confined to the Romish Church, or Popes or priests. Just in proportion as any Church was armed with secular power, by an alliance with the State, was its tendency to persecute other sects. Even the Anglican Church had its minatory service. The Dissenters were the loudest in their opposition to this Bill; but had the Independents and the Calvinists no persecuting doctrines? John Calvin was himself author of the most elaborate treatise on the propriety of putting heretics to death; and had, by the most atrocious proceedings, got Servetus condemned and burnt for being suspected of Socinian or Arian doctrines. This was no question of conscience, but of policy and expediency. The Government had been most unjustly and heedlessly calumniated in reference to this measure. It was a pure anachronism to allege that fear of America had counselled it; for "the message of peace" was sent to Ireland before the Oregon question was referred to by Sir R. Peel. He cordially approved that policy which tended to allay agitation in Ireland, agreeing with the Prime Minister in thinking that agitation could not be put down by force until it broke out into open violence, which that right hon. gentleman had triumphantly quelled. The popularity which followed great actions was infinitely more precious than that which was run after; and if Government performed such actions, he assured them they should receive that applause.—The adjournment of the debate was then agreed to.

Wednesday.—The Bishop of CASHEL presented the Marquis of Normanby with an authentic copy of the charge delivered by him at Lismore, and repeated his denial of the words attributed to him by Lord Normanby. In fact, said the right rev. prelate, the statement read by the noble earl was a wilful fabrication from beginning to end.—The Marquis of NORMANBY mentioned the name of his informant—the Rev. Dr. Fogarty, the vicar-general and parish priest of Lismore.—Lord CAMPBELL asked the meaning of the following words which he found in the avowed charge:—"I feel that I need not go into particulars in warning you (the clergy) against those new, or rather old, revived heresies, for I have no reason to believe that you are affected with the poison, for you live so much in the midst of genuine Popery, as not to be inveigled in its corruptions."—The Bishop of CASHEL answered that, as he must speak out, what he stated was addressed against what is now called Tractarianism.—The adjourned debate on the Maynooth Bill was resumed by the Earl of CLANCARTY, who opposed the Bill and supported the amendment moved by Lord Roden, for a committee to inquire into the class-books and doctrines taught at the college. No case had been made out for the Bill; and no expediency could justify the violation of the oath their lordships had taken. Let the oath of supremacy be abrogated if they pleased, and let a new Parliament be called, unfettered, to pronounce a deliberate opinion on the policy the Government had now indicated. He challenged them to pursue such a course. This measure would not be a boon to Ireland; it was a mere surrender to Rome. Looking to the whole conduct of the Government with reference to Irish questions, he must say it had not been such as to warrant either confidence in their wisdom and ability, or any well-founded anticipation of good results. The noble earl was referring to the course which Ministers had taken as to the monster meetings and state prosecutions in Ireland, when he was called to order by the Duke of WELLINGTON, who submitted that these matters had nothing whatever to do with the question before the House. They might be subjects perfectly proper for discussion, but not on a motion for the endowment of the College of Maynooth.—The Earl of CLANCARTY insisted that he had a right not merely to consider the tendency of this particular measure, but to look to the circumstances under which it had been introduced. Many of his Irish fellow-subjects seriously doubted, after the Papal rescript, which had lately made some noise in this country, whether it was in the power of Ministers to extend to them the protection of the British Constitution; and the Maynooth Bill looked very like an attempt to subsidise Papal authority to aid them in the government of the country.—The Duke of CLEVELAND having always voted in favour of the grant to Maynooth, felt bound in consistency to support the Bill; although he was free to add, that if it had been introduced by Government for the purpose of ascertaining how far they could go in endowing the Roman Catholic Church at all in conformity with the suggestions offered last night by a Lord of the Bedchamber, no failure could have been more complete.—The Earl of HARDWICKE explained that he alone was responsible for the opinions he had expressed. In fact, however, he had only put a hypothetical case. He had not named the source from whence the endowment of the Roman Catholic priests should come, but admitted that he had in his mind the revenues of the Irish Established Church.—Earl SPENCER was ready to take his share of the unpopularity and odium which this Bill had excited against Her Majesty's Ministers; although, if he regarded it as an isolated measure, he should not attach much importance to it. He trusted, however, that it was only a prelude to an improved system of policy with regard to Ireland. If the Government pursued a proper and a steady course of impartiality and conciliation, they would not only confirm the union with that country, but render Ireland the strength rather than the weakness of the empire. He was most decidedly opposed to the Roman Catholic religion; but still it was the duty of the State to provide religious instruction for the people; he was therefore fully prepared to give his support to this Bill. Presbyterian Scotland had always been in a state of confusion and discontent till the Presbyterian form of church government had been conceded; and prosperity and peace followed its establishment. Roman Catholic Ireland was in the same state of confusion, and they must do something for the Roman Catholic religion there before they could expect tranquillity and contentment.—The Bishop of NORWICH supported the Bill. He was adverse to Popery in every shape; but he considered this a measure of justice, equity, and mercy. It was an experiment in the right direction—in favour of education, which as it advanced would elicit truth; and when truth was elicited, he felt confident that the laity, at least of the Roman Catholic persuasion, would at once rise as one man and denounce that thraldom of priesthood under which they were now in bondage. Whatever odium might for some time attach to those who supported this Bill, in the days of their children it would be regarded as one of the most wise, benevolent, and useful measures that had been propounded in the 19th century. —The Earl of MORNINGTON hailed the measure as the first step towards the regeneration of Ireland.—Lord COLCHESTER could not think that Maynooth was very popular among the Roman Catholic laity, or contributions would not have been wanting, either to give adequate salaries to the professors or maintain the buildings in a decent state of repair. It was intended, by the act of 1795, that the college should chiefly be supported by private subscriptions; but, except the benefaction of Lord Dunboyne, and two or three others, the college had derived no support whatever from Roman Catholics. He did not think there was such a promise of improvement in the system of education given at Maynooth under this Bill as to induce him to give it his support. If carried, he was sure the measure would produce as much dissatisfaction in England as it would give contentment to Ireland.—Lord MONTEAGLE regarded this measure as the most important which had been introduced, if not since the Union, certainly since the Relief Bill. Its practical effect in Ireland would be very great. Hitherto our course of legislation had been to create a wall of separation between us and the religion of the great body of the people in that country—between us and their spiritual instructors; and now almost for the first time, the Parliament of the United Kingdom touched the sore place for the purpose of healing it, and told the Irish people not only that we felt no jealousy of their religion, and desisted from subjecting it to penal disabilities, but that we were disposed to countenance and support it—to deal with it, not indeed as a religion which we as Protestants prefer, but as the religion which was preferred by the great body of the Irish people. It had indeed been said that they ought not to propagate error; but they had contributed to this institution year by year for the last half century, and in many of our Colonies we had gone much farther. We had even founded a college in the East Indies for the instruction of Hindoos in their language, literature, and religion. Were they prepared to say they would do that in the sacred city of Benares which they would not do in Ireland—for the Mahomedans what they would not do for their fellow-citizens and friends? He thought the Roman Catholic Church should be considered further than regarded Maynooth; but as he valued the peace of the country and the security of property, he could not for a moment contemplate the endowment of that Church, or anything belonging to it, out of the revenues of the Protestant establishment.—The Bishop of ST. DAVID'S could not entirely approve of the manner in which the opposition to this Bill had been organised and conducted. He thought unfair means had been taken to bias public opinion; yet he was prepared to admit that the petitions which had been presented expressed the sincere, earnest religious convictions of a very large portion of his fellow-countrymen. He denied that this measure at all involved any sacrifice of principle to expediency. The question was, would they do no good, unless it were pure good?—would they convey no truth, lest it should be tainted by the slightest admixture of error? It was the dictate of wisdom to do all the good they could, although they might not be able to do all they could wish. He deprecated the use of the epithets "idolatrous and superstitious" as applicable to the doctrines and worship of the Roman Catholics; it would be better even in public official documents to avoid language which, while it conveyed no very clear, distinct, or intelligible ideas, must always excite angry and unpleasant feelings. Expressing no opinion whatever as to the truth of the Roman Catholic religion, they could not be said in supporting this Bill either to sanction error, to strengthen, or to perpetuate it. He supported this Bill because it was a conciliatory measure—because it formed part of a large and liberal policy which was absolutely necessary to the tranquillity and safety of this country—and because it was the fulfilment of a great and solemn obligation contracted at the Union. In passing the measure they would consult both the temporal and spiritual welfare of the people of Ireland.—The Earl of CHARLEVILLE opposed the Bill, and mentioned as an additional ground of inquiry that the students at Maynooth had been admitted into the order of Jesuits, thereby subjecting themselves to the penalty of transportation under one of the clauses of the Catholic Relief Bill.—Lord STANLEY, in a speech of some length, replied to the various objections that had been urged against the Bill. If students at Maynooth had been admitted to the society of the Jesuits they were amenable to the law; and if the noble Earl was cognisant of the fact, and desirous of proceeding against them, they were open to prosecution for a misdemeanour, and liable to banishment. For this purpose inquiry was not necessary; indeed, inquiry would be altogether useless; but it would be more than useless —it would produce an incessant and daily increasing acerbity of religious animosities among different classes of the Irish people. If he believed this measure likely to injure the Irish Protestant Church either in its temporalities or spiritual influence, he would not only have refused his assent to it, but have been the first to denounce and resist it to the uttermost. He did not think it necessary to injure the one in order to advance the other. He had been asked whether the permanent endowment of Maynooth would lead to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. He said that was no necessary or even probable consequence of this measure. The permanent endowment of Maynooth would no more lead to the permanent endowment of the Roman Catholic Church than the annual endowment of Maynooth led to the annual endowment of that Church. He saw serious obstacles to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in the opinions, the feelings, and the prejudices of the people of this country, and in the avowed opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy themselves; but religious scruples would not be a very serious obstacle with him on such a question as this. He fully believed if this measure had any effect at all on the religion of the Roman Catholics, it would be not to make more, but better Catholics. No new principle was involved in this Bill, and the sum they were called on to pay was inconsiderable in comparison with the magnitude of the objects to be gained. Government wished the measure to be received in Ireland, not as the harbinger of future measures, but as an indication of their determination to treat with kindness, conciliation, and favour, the Roman Catholics, as they did all their other fellow-citizens in Ireland. He believed it would be so received; he rejoiced to say it had been so received in that country. It might not produce the gratitude of those fanatical firebrands of the Church whom no justice would conciliate, or of those political agitators who, from mercenary motives, preyed on the distresses of their country, but it would secure the gratitude of those through whom was our nearest road to the hearts and affections of the people. He had too high a sense of the wisdom, justice, and patriotism, of their lordships to doubt the issue.—Their lordships then divided on Lord Roden's amendment—Contents, 59; not content, 155; majority against it, 96. On the main question—contents present, 144; proxies, 82; total contents, 226. Not contents present, 55; proxies, 14; total, 69; majority in favour of the second reading, 157.

Thursday.—Lord BROUGHAM complained of the imperfect ventilation of the House, and severely censured Mr. Barry, the architect of the new Houses of Parliament, charging him with contumacious disregard of their lordships' wishes in respect to the preparation of the new House for their reception. Mr. Barry was all but resisting the authority of the House. He was fencing with the House, and he foolishly and short-sightedly, as he would find to his cost, and most ignorantly, fancied that he had some high protection out of the House.—Lord COTTENHAM moved the committal of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.—The Bishop of EXETER moved its commitment that day six months. He could not consent to the taking away from the Church its spiritual jurisdiction.—Lord BROUGHAM suggested a reference to a select committee.—The Bishop of SALISBURY concurred in the propriety of that course. He thought the Church should at least retain the shadow of spiritual power.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE wished the Bill to be allowed to pass through committee, the objections to it to be postponed to its next stage.—The Bill was referred to a select committee.—On the motion of the Duke of BUCCLEUCH, the Calico Printworks Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the LORD PRESIDENT'S motion to adjourn to Monday, on account of the Court ball last evening, Lord BROUGHAM objected on the ground that he wanted to make a very short speech on the Small Debts Bill. His lordship said he would promise their lordships that he would not detain them beyond half-past 5; and if their lordships were afraid that they would not have time to dress, why not come down to the House in their ball-dress? He should be most anxious to see the Lord President of the Council in the attire of Lord Burleigh, which he understood the noble lord intended to assume, and also his noble and learned friend on the woolsack in that of Lord Hardwicke. Their lordships nevertheless adjourned the House to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—After the business noticed in our report of last week, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law respecting arrestment of wages in Scotland.—Lord J. RUSSELL suggested the expediency of adjourning the discussion on the privilege case, Howard v. Gossett, until the committee appointed by the House should have made their report respecting the appeal by writ of error to a superior court.—Sir R. PEEL said, that he was not present yesterday when this report was presented; but it appeared to him premature to call upon the House at present to affirm the latter portion of it. He thought that the report had been properly made to give the House an opportunity of interfering if it deemed proper; but as the House ought to be in possession of all the information collected by the committee, he considered delay to be advisable.—Mr. HUME thought they should proceed at once in arresting all who opposed them. He moved the following resolution: "That, adverting to the report of a committee presented to this House, all persons shall be guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House who shall levy any money on any officer or servant of the House, in the case of Howard v. Gossett, referred to in the report of the committee."—Lord HOWICK moved as an amendment to Mr. Hume's resolution, that the debate be adjourned to Monday week.—An animated discussion ensued, in which the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, Mr. F. KELLY, Sir T. WILDE, Mr. D'ISRAELI, Lord J. RUSSELL, Sir R. PEEL, and several other Members took part.—Sir R. PEEL intimated that the present case was hopeless—that the damages must be paid; but should any future case arise, he unhesitatingly avowed they should not be satisfied with attorneys, or sheriffs, or other minor ministers of the courts of law, but that they should assert their privileges over the judges on the bench.—Mr. HUME said he could not rest satisfied with this distant prospect of vengeance. —The House divided on the original motion: for adjourning the debate, 96: against it, 50; majority, 46.—Sir J. GRAHAM moved the second reading of the Colleges (Ireland) Bill, and, in reply to a variety of questions, stated that Government did not intend making any material alterations in the measure—that they could not agree to the chief propositions contained in the memorial of the Roman Catholic prelates—that they were still resolved to confine the proposed academical education in Ireland to no religious faith—and that all interference with religious instruction, so far as state endowment is concerned, was to be strictly discountenanced.—Lord JOHN MANNERS moved as an amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The Noble Lord said that it was absurd to call such a system as that proposed a system of academical education for Ireland. He would never consent so to designate a Bill, containing a provision that no student should be compelled to attend any theological instruction, and that no religious test should be required as a qualification for admission to the privileges of these institutions. It was the fashion to appeal to the results of foreign education, and to point out Prussia, France, and Bavaria as models for imitation in that respect; but he not alone denied the benefits of the system as followed in those countries, but maintained that of all systems calculated to work injury and create danger, that was entitled to a bad pre-eminence. He thought that a separate education for the different religious sects should be provided.—Mr. Ross and Lord SANDON supported the Bill.—Sir J. GRAHAM defended its non-religious principle, and in doing so gave a sketch of his own non-religious career at Oxford. He said that he had had the advantage of being a member of Christ Church, Oxford, and during the two years and a half that he was there, with the exception of compulsory attendance on chapel, he was never called upon to attend any lecture on theology or divinity. He never received any religious instruction whatever, and he was ashamed to say that during two years and a half he never heard one university sermon. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford would call that a godless system of education, but during the time that he (Sir James Graham), was a member of Christ's Church, he never attended a divinity lecture, nor did he in point of fact receive from his tutor, or from any one in that college, any religious instruction whatever; and with regard to the attendance on sermons that was not compulsory. —Mr. E. ROCHE approved of mixed education; but objected to the appointment of the professors by the Government.—Sir R. INGLIS repeated that the measure was a gigantic scheme of godless education, and denied that the practice at Oxford was such as that described by Sir James Graham to be prevalent in his time. Sir R. Inglis said he agreed with the Roman Prelates and with Mr. O'Connell, that religion should be the basis of education, and that the youth of Ireland could not be usefully brought up in mere lecture shops, such as those proposed by Government.—After some remarks from Mr. REDINGTON, the debate on the motion of Mr. M. MILNES was adjourned.

Monday.—The Lincoln and Nottingham, Great Grimsby and Sheffield Junction, Kendal and Windermere, Southampton and Dorchester, Scottish Central, Berks and Hants, and Midland Railway (Syston to Peterborough), Railway Bills, were read a third time and passed.—Sir J. GRAHAM stated that, in connection with Lord Lincoln, he was making inquiries relative to the best mode of instituting precautionary measures against accidents by fire. His present opinion was, that a special establishment, to which these measures should be intrusted, would be advisable.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER postponed the Committee on the Scotch and Irish Banking Bills to Thursday. —Sir J. GRAHAM, in reference to a case at issue between Mr. Twyford, the magistrate at Bow-street, and a respectable tradesman named Meyer, stated that he was entirely satisfied that Mr. Twyford had acted with good faith in the transaction, and to the best of his judgment: but he was bound to say that his judgment was not good in this case.—The adjourned debate on the Academical Institutions (Ireland) Bill, was resumed by Mr. M. MILNES, who supported the measure. Those who opposed it on the ground that it did not give religious education were, in his opinion, guilty of a sophism in the sense which they gave to the word "religion." They said that we ought to establish colleges for Roman Catholics on Protestant principles, or that they would not consent to the establishment of them at all. Such language he considered to be equivalent to an absolute negation of all education to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. He saw no reason why such theological lectures as had been given formerly by Schleiermacher and Neander, and were now given by Neander in the University of Berlin, should not be given to the students of every religion in the new colleges of Ireland. He considered that the line of conduct pursued by the Roman Catholics of that country on this subject was not either wise or useful for themselves. Their education should be founded on the large comprehensive continental basis rather than on the system of any religious hierarchy. The indirect influence which the Roman Catholic hierarchy would exercise over students of their faith would be more useful to them than any direct influence which we could place in their hands. Though he admitted that this Bill made no pretensions to perfection, still he considered it deserving of support.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL agreed that this measure made no pretension to perfection, but considered that to be rather one of its demerits than its merits. He could have wished that the Bill had been prepared with greater care, and had not contained within itself so much crude legislation. It would require much alteration and much improvement to fit it for the object for which it was intended. If the view of Ireland which Sir Robert Peel had propounded on a former night were correct, Government ought on such a question as that of education to have tried to knit together the affections of all the different classes of people in Ireland, and to have made use of any instrument by which that great good could be promoted. He looked upon the Roman Catholic clergy as the instrument by which the affections of the people of Ireland could be best knit together, and by which their attachment to and respect for the law could be best produced. The co-operation, therefore, of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland might have been fairly, not humbly, solicited by the Government; and that great element, by which success must either be obtained or defeated, ought not to have been omitted in the concoction of this plan. He found that the Roman Catholic bishops in their memorial implied a distrust that the faith and morals of these students in these new institutions would be endangered by the measure which the Government proposed. Unless the Government could allay such apprehensions, the very best which it could hope for its measure was that it would be null, whilst the fear was that it would be noxious. The Roman Catholic bishops would not derive any alleviation of that distrust from the declaration which had been made in the House that we did not wish to promote Roman Catholic ascendancy. They would not look for comfort on the precedents which were to be found in the University of Bologna, or in the universities of Germany, but would rather fly them as dangerous warnings. The Government ought, therefore, to consider whether there was not some means by which it could make its scheme more palatable to the religious feelings of the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. He was not of opinion that secular instruction without religious education was an evil; on the contrary, he thought that it was a good. He thought, however, that the two ought to be combined together if possible. In England religion had always been taught as a part of education; but the system propounded in this Bill would make these new institutions differ from the only university now existing in Ireland, and from the two universities in England, and would not be agreeable to the feelings of the Irish people. Already had Mr. Roche, who, he believed, was a member of the Repeal Association, objected on behalf of his countrymen to leave the appointment of the professors in these new colleges in the hands of the Crown. He thought that the House might have adopted such a course, had the people of Ireland been willing to submit to it; but they were not willing to do any such thing, because they were afraid of the use which might be made of the power lodged in the Crown. They had a distrust of the use which would be made of it in case Mr. Plumptre should come into office, and would have had a still greater distrust of it had Sir R. Peel still continued to hold the same principles which he held five years ago. He therefore recommended the House to give secular instruction without regular education in these new institutions, if it were necessary; but, if it could give both together, not to omit from this Bill regulations to accomplish that object. Sir J. Graham had expressed his willingness to attach halls to each of these new colleges for religious education. That might mean much, or it might mean little; and therefore to ascertain what it meant, he would ask Sir J. Graham whether he would permit the deans of those halls to exercise within them over the students any authority on such points as their attendance at the places of their religious worship on Sundays, and their attendance at the ordinary theological lectures, and to inflict punishment, even expulsion, on such students as might be notorious defaulters in either of those respects? If Government were prepared to give such authority, he thought that it would get over many of the objections urged against their scheme by the Roman Catholic clergy. There was also another feature in the scheme of Government which made him consider that it had no pretension to perfection. There was no machinery by which these colleges could give degrees. He thought that Government ought to institute a university of Ireland, which should be empowered to grant degrees to the students which came from them. Without some such institution these colleges would be branded with a mark of inferiority. On points like these Government ought to consult with such men as Archbishop Murray, on whose character for learning, meekness, piety, and loyalty, he passed a high eulogium. If Government would enter into such consultation with the Roman Catholic hierarchy before this Bill was sent into committee, he thought that their measure ought to be allowed to proceed further, and that the country might look forward to its ultimate success. He could not agree with Lord J. Manners in opposing the second reading of this Bill; for being of opinion that it was, in principle, a good measure, and that it might in its details be amended in committee, he should give it his support.—Lord MAHON observed, that he should support the second reading of the Bill, in the hope of amending it in committee. If those amendments which he considered this Bill to require were not made in committee, it would be his unwelcome duty to give the measure, on its third reading, the most decided opposition. Its great defect was its want of security for religious instruction. To the principle of giving secular knowledge with religious education he was determined to adhere.—Mr. A. B. HOPE supported Lord J. Manners's amendment.—Mr. V. STUART, Mr. G. A. HAMILTON, and Mr. L. B. OSBORNE followed in favour of the Bill, but all with a reservation.—Mr. GLADSTONE agreed that the present was an imperfect measure; but insisted that its imperfection was owing to the very anomalous and distracted condition of Ireland. The question was not whether this was a perfect measure, but whether it was the best measure which could be devised to meet the present state of Ireland and its exigencies. He concurred with Lord J. Russell in thinking that it would be a very great hardship to force a measure of this kind on the people of Ireland. Lord J. Russell also thought it advisable that the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland, and more especially Dr. Murray, should be consulted on the subject. He had not yet heard that no communication had taken place between the Government and the Roman Catholic bishops on this scheme of education; but he fully agreed with Lord J. Russell in asserting that a considerable weight ought to be attached to the judgment of the Roman Catholic bishops on the adjustment of the principles and details of this measure. He then adverted at some length to the necessity and expediency, not only of communicating with the Roman Catholic bishops on such points, but also of renewing a direct diplomatic correspondence with the Court of Rome, which this Government carried on indirectly even at present. After defending the system of religious education now enforced at Oxford from the attacks and charges which had been made upon it, he proceeded to contend that the system of mixed education adopted in University College, London, was much fitter for Ireland than it was for England; for the dangers of it were most likely to be experienced in England, where religious discipline was lax, than in Ireland, where, from the influence of the Roman Catholic religion, the religious discipline exercised over each individual of that persuasion was personally strict. He then justified the principles and details of the measure; and, in so doing, entered his emphatic protest against Sir R. Inglis's declaration, that it was "a gigantic scheme of Godless education." The Bill contained a provision for religious education, so far as it was able to do so; for it provided rooms in each of these colleges for theological lectures, which was an explicit admission of the efficacy of religious education. Nay, more, it provided facilities for the voluntary payment of professors to deliver such lectures. After stating his approval of the amendments proposed by Sir J. Graham since the original introduction of the Bill, he showed that the mode of filling up the professorial chairs was a question involved in much difficulty. He did not, however, think that the difficulty would be insuperable, if both parties would lay aside their prejudices, and would give to the subject a careful, and he would even add, a tender consideration.—Mr. Wyse had on a former occasion declared this measure to be a great boon to the country, and, though he had since heard much discussion upon it, and many objections urged against it, he had not seen any reason for changing his opinion, or for concluding that great national advantages would not accrue from the establishment of a mixed system of education in Ireland. He denied that was a system of godless education, and observed that, if it were so, nothing could induce him to give it his support. He then pointed out in detail various improvements which he conceived might be made in the Bill, and declared his intention of bringing them forward, as distinct subjects for discussion whenever it got into committee. He objected to those clauses in the Bill which gave to the Crown the power of appointing and removing the professors of these colleges, and contended that the State should provide in each of them for the endowment of a professor of theology, not of divinity.—Mr. Acland called attention to the fact that not one of the speakers in behalf of this Bill had given an unqualified support of it, and contended that not one of them had proved that it would give such education as would be useful in any respect to the people of Ireland. His objection to the Bill was not that Government had endeavoured to devise a plan for the education of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, which would be free from all suspicion on their part, but that it had endeavoured to frame such a plan without any communication with the Roman Catholic bishops. Its proposal had in consequence been met, not with the unanimous acclamation, but with the unanimous protest of those venerable persons. He then explained some other objections which he had to the Bill in detail, and concluded by declaring his determination to give it his most decided opposition.—Mr. R. M. O'Ferrall made several suggestions for the improvement of the Bill, to which he trusted that the Government would agree, otherwise he should be under the necessity of opposing the second reading of this measure.—Sir R. Peel proceeded to demonstrate two points—first, the policy of establishing academical institutions in Ireland; and next the policy of educating together within their walls youths of different religious creeds. He proposed on the part of the State to provide in these institutions means of excellent education. He also proposed to provide for them professors of distinguished scientific attainments, and of high moral character. But did he relegate religious education from them? No such thing. He agreed with Lord J. Russell that he would have pure secular instruction without any religious instruction rather than no education at all; but still he thought that a mixture of secular with religious instruction was infinitely superior. But how was that mixture of education to be effected in a country distracted like Ireland by religious differences? Suppose that he had proposed to accomplish it, what would have been the consequence? First let the House consider what Sir Robert Inglis and his friends would have said had he proposed to establish a Roman Catholic professor of divinity in each of these three new colleges. Would Sir Robert Inglis, who now objected to his plan as "a gigantic scheme of Godless education," have supported it, when it embraced a proposal for endowing a professor of the church of Rome? No, he would have said that it was a covert mode of endowing that church in Ireland, and that, as it had not the precedent of 50 years to back it, he would give it his most determined opposition. Nay, more, if Government had proposed to have in each of these colleges professors of Protestant and Presbyterian divinity, he believed that Sir R. Inglis would have denounced such a proposal also as a manifest proof of utter indifference to all religion. He would leave the House to conceive Mr. Spooner's indignation at his founding a professorship for that "awful delusion" which was called the Roman Catholic religion. On the other hand, he doubted whether such a proposal would be more satisfactory to the Roman Catholics themselves. He suspected that they would say to him,—"We will not, even for the sake of an endowment of a professorship of our faith, venture upon a measure which will enable you to interfere with anything so sacred as our religion." Such being the case, Government had determined to invite the parents and friends of the youth to be educated in these new colleges to provide religious education for them; and he thought that such education would be provided for them better by their parents and friends than it could be by the Government in the present condition of Ireland. He expressed the deep regret and surprise with which he had read that portion of the memorial of the Roman Catholic bishops in which they stated that a Roman Catholic student could not attend lectures on botany and geology given by Protestant professors without danger to his morals and his faith. After commenting for some time on that document, he proceeded to notice the objection which had been urged against this measure, because the professors were to be nominated by the Crown. He believed that such a provision was at the first formation of these colleges absolutely necessary. Both the honour and the interest of the Crown were involved in the appointment of the most competent persons to these professorships. If these colleges were to be instituted in Connaught and in Munster, whose friendship would the Government have to conciliate save that of the Roman Catholics? He thought that there should be exhibitions attached to these academical institutions, for the purpose of creating competition. Such exhibitions, in his opinion, would tend much to promote sound learning and knowledge. It had been complained that he had not made a university in Ireland. It was enough, he thought, to form three colleges at first; but he admitted that his plan would be incomplete until they were incorporated into one university. If the plan were found to work well, then would be the time for considering whether their incorporation into a university should take place, and what power that university should have in conferring degrees. The Crown could have a charter of incorporation without the necessity of the interference of Parliament. These were the principles on which Government had come to the conclusion that it had a better chance of promoting a system of religious education acceptable to those for whose benefit it was intended by its present measure than it would have by founding separate theological colleges, or by endowing theological professorships in each of them.—Mr. M. J. O'Connell observed, that the amendment of Lord J. Manners raised the question whether they were to have in Ireland a mixed system of education or not. To that system he had always been attached; and, as this Bill would promote it, he should give his vote in favour of its second reading. He looked upon the Bill as another recognition of the system which had revolutionised Ireland in the course of the last 15 years—he meant the diffusion of sound secular and religious knowledge, commenced by the national schools, and continued by several provisions of the Legislature.—Mr. Shaw did not entirely approve of this measure; but he had not heard any of the gentlemen who opposed it propose a better substitute: and, therefore, considering the difficulty of the question, he did not feel himself justified in opposing the second reading.—After a few words from Sir V. Blake in favour of the Bill, the House divided, when the numbers were:—For the amendment—Ayes, 46; Noes, 311. The amendment was therefore lost, and the Bill read a second time.

Tuesday.—The Blackburn, Darwin, and Bolton Railway Bill was read a third time and passed.—The time for presenting reports on private Bills was extended to the 15th inst. In reply to a question from Sir R. Inglis, Sir R. Peel said that the alleged copy of the treaty agreed to by the French and English commissioners relative to the suppression of the slave trade, published in the newspapers, had been published without the authority or cognisance of Government, and certainly was not a copy of the English draft of the treaty. With respect to the treaty itself, the ratification would take place in about ten days, and immediately after he would have great pleasure in laying it on the table.—Mr. Hume moved an address to Her Majesty, praying her to grant a suitable pension to Sir Henry Pottinger, in reward for his eminent public services. The hon. member reviewed these services, and complained that in leaving them unrewarded, the Government was acting contrary to the wishes of a vast majority of the commercial men of the country.—Lord Sandon seconded the motion, and in doing so passed an eloquent eulogium on Sir H. Pottinger.—Sir J. C. Hobhouse could not forbear taking part in the debate, because the official station which he had held made him acquainted with the distinguished ability and noble disinterestedness in the cause of his country displayed on every occasion by Sir H. Pottinger, whose extraordinary services in China deserved an extraordinary reward.—Sir R. Peel, fully concurring in all the praise given to Sir H. Pottinger, said, it might be supposed from Mr. Hume's speech that Government had withheld from that gallant officer some distinction which it was in their power to confer. So far was this from being the case that the Crown had already granted him all the honorary distinctions it could bestow. With regard to the pension prayed for, the Crown had no power to grant it, owing to a resolution of the House pressed on it by Mr. Hume himself, which prohibited any grant for diplomatic services, unless the recipient had been engaged ten years in active service. As to claims on the civil list they were restricted to 1200*l.* a year, beyond which ministers could not go in the reward of personal service to the Crown, or of useful discoveries in science, literature, or the arts. The sum of 1200*l.* a-year was all that was allowed to be so disbursed, and beyond it must necessarily come out of the private resources of the Sovereign. It had been said that it was an implied reproach upon ministers that they had not asked for a pension for Sir H. Pottinger. If that were the case, not a week passed without the incurring of a reproach, for week after week he had been compelled to reject the just claims of parties who had conferred important and lasting benefits on their country, merely because the House of Commons had not given funds for the purpose. Look at the case of the family of Sir William Nott. He had returned to his country with broken health, after an unexceeded exhibition of constancy and valour. Not only could he not enjoy the pension awarded to him by the East India Company, but he was not able to go through the fatigue of one public expression of gratitude for his services. He doubted whether he had even been presented to his Sovereign, and after his death the East India Company had given a pension of 100*l.* a-year to each of his daughters. Here was a case of most just claim, but without the means of recognition. The cases of men of science, who were obliged to go unrewarded, were frequent and severe, and only a short time since he had been compelled to refuse a pittance to the daughter of a professor, who had actually expired in the discharge of his duty before the Royal Society. The instances of unobtrusive but unquestionable merit were numerous, and men who had devoted their best years to the perfection of mechanical science, often left their families in difficulty and distress. It was very dangerous when well-merited claims were daily made upon Government, that a precedent should be established for such appeals to the Crown; and he thought, as a general rule, that public services were best rewarded by a continuance of employment when the servants of the public were in good health. Still, as this was an extraordinary case, and seeing that the House was unanimous on the subject, he was ready to take the responsibility on himself of advising Her Majesty to make the proposed provision for Sir H. Pottinger.—Lord J. Russell thought there was no ground for reproaching the Government in this matter, and gave his cordial support to the determination expressed by Sir R. Peel.—Lord Palmerston also testified his satisfaction at the course pursued by the right hon. baronet, and hoped that Sir H. Pottinger might long retain his present health for the service of his country.—Mr. Hume denied that he had any intention of saying anything personally offensive to Sir R. Peel; and the motion was unanimously agreed to.—Mr. Ward then brought forward his annual motion for the appointment of a select committee to inquire whether there were any peculiar burdens specially affecting the landed interest of this country, or any peculiar exemptions enjoyed by that interest, and to ascertain their nature and extent. In the course of his argument in support of it—which excited much amusement from the criticisms which it contained upon the past speeches of hon. members, and upon the recent declarations made by the different speakers at Agricultural Associations, he returned thanks to Lord J. Russell and Sir J. Graham for the manner in which they had cleared the way both for his motion and for the future motion of Mr. Villiers by their speeches on a recent occasion. Sir J. Graham had declared that within the last 12 months pauperism had diminished, and trade and commerce had improved, because the price of Wheat was low. He was not going to under-rate the benefit produced by an abundant harvest; but he believed that still greater benefit had been produced by the liberal policy of Government. The idea that there were any peculiar burdens on the land was a fallacy peculiar to English gentlemen brought up in the schools of the Corn Laws. He denied that the land-tax, the poor-rates, the tithes, the county-rates, the highway rates, the malt-tax, and similar impositions, were peculiar burdens on the land; but even if they were, there was to be set against them the exemptions enjoyed by the land in not being liable to the legacy and probate duty, and in the cultivators of it being relieved from the horse-tax, from the tax on husbandry servants if employed for domestic services, and various other taxes. If he took into consideration the duties on corn levied for the protection of the landed interest, there was a large balance due to the public; but even if there was not, those duties were the very worst way that could be imagined for giving compensation to the landed interest. Did they deny his facts? Then let them give him a committee for inquiry. He called upon the country gentlemen to go into it at once like men, and not to shrink from it like cowards. If they took the first course, he was certain what the result would be; if they took the latter, he left the country to draw its own conclusion as to the reasons by which they were actuated.—Mr. S. Herbert asked why, if Mr. Ward was so convinced that the impositions which other parties deemed to be burdens on the land were no burdens at all, did he want to go into a committee to prove it? His conviction must rest upon facts; and if he wanted more facts upon this subject, he ought to move for returns and so obtain them. A committee could not find facts more readily than they could be found by the ordinary process of moving for returns; and if Mr. Ward wanted a committee for the sake of drawing inferences for the instruction of the House, he must oppose the appointment of any committee on that ground, as the House would be utterly unworthy of its situation if it could not draw inferences for itself. He hoped that at the present period of the session the House would not throw over measures of practical importance for matters like the present of mere speculative inquiry.—Mr. Cobden supported the motion, but observed that Mr. Ward was using a phrase which was perfectly ridiculous, when he spoke of the peculiar burdens pressing on the land. He hoped that next year he would vary the terms of his motion, and would only move for an inquiry into the peculiar exemptions of the land.—Mr. Newdegate declared his intention to oppose the motion. He calculated the pressure on the land, including tithe, land-tax, and county-rate, to amount to 12,000,000*l.* a year. At the close of the war it had amounted to 15,000,000*l.*; but it had been reduced to the amount which he had mentioned by the remission of taxation which had taken place in the interval. He then defended the agricultural associations from the sneers which Mr. Ward had cast upon them.—Mr. V. Smith supported the motion for a committee, called attention to the vast amount of local taxation levied in various parts of England, though he admitted it not to be very relevant to the subject before it, and recommended the country gentlemen to look into their own accounts, as the best means of recovering from any temporary depression under which they might be now suffering.—After a speech from Sir John Tyrrell against the motion, and one from Dr. Bowring supporting it, the House divided, and the motion was negatived by a majority of 182 over 109.

Wednesday.—There not being 40 Members present at 4 o'clock, no House could be made.

Thursday.—Mr. Labouchere called attention to the state of railway business before Parliament. There had been, he said, 245 Bills laid before railway committees, out of which only 103 had been disposed of, leaving 140 still lingering in the different groups. Many parties opposed at an enormous expense, hoping that by delaying the Bill it might be lost this session, and require to be recommenced de novo in the next. It would be gross injustice if such a state of things was permitted. He thought the proper course would be to give to parties, whose Bills did not even reach the House of Lords during the present session, credit for all they had done when coming before the House at the reassembling of Parliament. The right hon. gentleman moved a resolution in conformity with this opinion.—A long discussion ensued, which was terminated by Mr. Labouchere withdrawing his resolution, and by Sir G. Clerk proposing another, which the House subsequently adopted, that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state and progress of the various Railway Bills then before the House, and to report to the House what measures it might be expedient to adopt in the next session to facilitate the reintroduction of such Railway Bills as it may be found impossible to carry through the two Houses of Parliament in the present session.—Lord Mahon gave notice that, on going into committee on the Irish Colleges Bill, he should move that some provision be made for giving religious instruction, by means of lectures, to the students, until such time as the 17th clause (which rendered private benefactions for such a purpose lawful) took effect.—In answer to Lord J. Manners, Sir R. Peel stated that a communication had been received here from the French Government, acknowledging the official knowledge of the abdication of Don Carlos in favour of the Prince of the Asturias. The French Government had formally intimated their intention immediately to comply with Don Carlos's application, and to grant him the passports he required.—In reply to Lord J. Russell, Sir J. Graham announced that the alterations he intended to make in the Irish Colleges Bill would be neither extensive nor very important; and that he was not prepared to name a day to go on with the Bill.—On the order of the day for going into committee on the Scotch Banking Bill, Mr. P. M. Stewart objected to interfere with a system which had worked well for a century and a half. He foresaw that this measure would lead to the establishment of a single bank of issue; that the circulation of Scotland would be extinguished, and the circulation of the Bank of England be introduced in its place.—Sir R. Peel emphatically denied that he had expressed an opinion in favour of the establishment of a single bank of issue in Scotland. Had he to deal with the question as a res integra, he might think a single bank best, but he knew too well the vigorous opposition he would encounter from Scottish gentlemen to attempt such a proposition.—A long preliminary discussion upon the policy and details of the measure followed, in which Mr. Hume, Sir W. Clay, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Baillie, Mr. C. Wood, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Muntz, Mr. F. Baring, Mr. Ross, and Mr. Oswald, took part, but no amendment was moved. The House then went into committee. The clauses up to the 7th were disposed of; and the House having resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Monday. The Merchant Seaman's Bill was read a second time. The Fresh-water Fishing Bill was, on the motion of Mr. Fox Maule, read a second time, after an observation by Sir R. Peel that he had been 55 years in Parliament, and during that time he never recollected a session without a Bill for the amendment of the Grand Jury Act in Ireland, and another for the preservation of the salmon fishery in Scotland.

Capital Punishments.—By direction of Sir James Graham a copy of the following letter and important rule relative to the treatment of prisoners sentenced to death, has just been issued to the chairman of the quarter sessions for every county in England and Wales:—

"Whitehall, June 2, 1845.—Sir, I am directed by Secretary Sir James Graham to transmit to you the inclosed rule relative to the treatment of prisoners condemned to death, and to the proceedings to be observed on the day of an execution, on the occasion of a condemned sermon, or of the performance of divine service after sentence of death has been pronounced. This rule has been drawn up after careful consideration of the subject, and Sir James Graham requests that you will lay it before magistrates assembled at the next general sessions for the county of , with this recommendation that they should add it to the rules in force for the government of the county prisons, and submit it to him for his certificate of approval, in accordance with the provisions of the 5th and 6th Will. IV., c. 38, s. 2. Sir James Graham is desirous that the attention of visiting magistrates should be directed to that part of the rule which provides that no persons, except the authorities and officers of the prison, shall have access to such prisoners. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

"S. M. PHILLIPPS.

"The Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for the county of ."

Prisoners condemned to Death.—"Every prisoner condemned to death shall be confined in some safe place within the prison, apart from all other prisoners, and shall be allowed such a dietary as the visiting justices may direct, and exercise in the open air for a reasonable time every day. He may be visited by his relations, friends, and legal advisers, at his own request, by an order in writing from any visiting justice. No other person shall have access to such prisoner, except the governor, or other officer of the prison, the chaplain, and surgeon; or if such convict shall be of a religious persuasion differing from that of the Established Church, a minister of that persuasion attending at his request. If any person, however, shall make it appear to a visiting justice, that he has important business to transact with the convict, such visiting justice may grant permission in writing to such person to have a conference with the convict, in the presence of the governor. No person except the proper authorities, the prison officers, and the police on duty, shall be admitted into the interior of the prison on the day of an execution, nor on occasion of a condemned sermon, nor during the performance of divine service after sentence of death has been pronounced. Provided that this rule shall not be interpreted to exclude a minister of a religious persuasion differing from that of the Established Church from attending at his own request a convict of such persuasion."

The Lord Mayor and Christ's Hospital.—At a Court of Aldermen, held on Friday, the question of the Lord Mayor's right, as head of the charities of the city of London, to preside as chairman on the occasion of the Queen's recent visit to Christ's Hospital was discussed in the same spirit as at a meeting of the Court of Common Council on the preceding day. A resolution proposed by Mr. Sheriff Sidney, to refer the resolutions passed by the Court of Christ's Hospital to a committee of the whole Court, was agreed to after much discussion.

Steam Yacht for the King of the French.—Messrs. Penn and Co., engineers, Greenwich, have received the commands of King Louis-Phillippe to construct a pair of engines, &c., and Messrs. Ditchburn and Mare, of Blackwall, iron ship-builders, have received the King's order to build a vessel for the private use of himself and family. The yacht is to be fitted with the screw-propeller, and her engines and fittings are to exactly correspond with the Fairy, the yacht tender of our own Sovereign.

Merchant Taylor's School.—The Head Mastership is rendered vacant by the resignation, in consequence of ill-health, of the Rev. J. W. Bellamy, who has filled the situation for upwards of 25 years, and under whose management the school has been brought to the eminence it now enjoys.

The Anti-Corn-Law League Bazaar.—The bazaar finally closed at 10 P.M. on Wednesday week, the number admitted for the day being 10,364. During the afternoon the admissions were considerably in advance of those of Monday, but were less at the close by 419. Some of the stalls had been removed, and the flow of visitors was more free through the different parts of the the theatre than on Monday, when the doors were obliged to be closed on the crowds outside. No accidents of any kind have occurred, and no destruction of property. Save in one solitary case, nobody has been charged with attempting to commit a crime. Upwards of 100,000 persons have been visitors during the 17 days the bazaar has been open, and no complaints have been heard. Beside the money taken at the doors for 100,000 persons who have paid for admission, goods to the amount of 20,000*l.* have been contributed as free gifts. The services of 400 ladies each day, most of them acting every day, and nearly 150 of them far distant from their homes, have been gratuitously rendered. The goods which are not sold will be taken to Manchester, where another bazaar is to be held.

The New Zealand Company.—The Annual General Court of proprietors of this company was held last week, Viscount Ingestre in the chair. The secretary read the eighteenth general report of the directors, which was accompanied by citations from the official correspondence to which it alluded, and by occasional statements from Mr. C. Buller, explanatory of portions of that correspondence, and of the negotiations with Government from time to time referred to. The report entered into a detailed statement of the differences which had arisen between the Company and the Colonial Department, and was ultimately received and adopted. Dr. Evans, one of the earliest settlers, addressed the court, and detailed the proceedings of the governor, Captain Fitzroy, with reference to the Company's settlements.

Execution of Connor.—The last sentence of the law was carried into effect in front of Newgate on Monday morning on Joseph Connor, aged 20, convicted at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court of the murder of Mary Brothers, in the parish of St. Giles-in-the Fields. The day after his conviction he made a full confession of his guilt. The crowd at the execution was not so great as usual on such occasions.

The late Fire in Dover-street.—During Saturday and Sunday a crowd as numerous as on any of the previous days, continued congregated in Dover-street, anxious to ascertain if any other bodies were discovered. The search of the ruins was proceeded with during Saturday, but nothing of consequence was found except two gold watches. A seizure had been put in by the original landlord, to whom large arrears of rent are owing, and who had laid claim to all the property found, but an arrangement has been entered into between the parties, under which the search will be continued until the whole of the ruins have been examined. In consequence of the doubt existing as to whether the body found on Tuesday, or that discovered on Friday, was the body of Mrs. Round, it was determined by the relatives of that lady that both bodies should be buried in the family vault, but that course was subsequently rendered unnecessary, since by a post mortem examination, it has been ascertained that one had been a mother and the other had not. The identification was therefore clear. On Saturday afternoon the fragments of several jewels were found in the ruins. Among them were two earrings, which Lord Huntingdon identified as belonging to his countess. There was also a diamond ring, which is supposed to have been the property of Mrs. Round, and a brooch, which it is understood she intended to have worn at the Queen's drawing-room on the following day. The jury at the inquest, after examining numerous witnesses, returned a verdict of "Accidental Death;" to which they unanimously added the following:—"The jury request that the coroner will write to Sir James Graham, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, for the purpose of calling his especial attention to the evidence given at this inquest, in order that Government may take some means of preventing in future such awful sacrifice of human life." It appears by an appeal to the public in the daily papers, that the late Mr. Raggett has left a widow, three sons, and three unmarried daughters totally unprovided for. He had through a long and laborious life been struggling against adverse circumstances, and for many years rented this furnished hotel in Dover-street. The little property he possessed in the house was not insured. His widow, who is bedridden, and her family are left in a state of destitution, and have not one shilling of their own for food, clothing, lodging, or even for the interment of their unfortunate relatives.

Fatal Fire in Fenchurch-street.—Another calamitous fire happened on Sunday morning, on the premises of Messrs. Satchell and Robertson, wholesale hatters, Fenchurch-street, immediately adjoining the Mitre and Fenchurch-chambers, which was attended with a serious destruction of property, and the loss of two lives, under circumstances the most distressing. The first persons who gave the alarm of fire were two policemen, belonging to the Tower-street station. They were standing together at the corner of Rood-lane when a loud crash of glass directed their attention to the premises of Messrs. Satchell and Robertson, and which they observed to be on fire. The whole shop appeared in a blaze, and the flames were breaking through the window over the shop door and fanlights over the shop shutters. The cries of "fire," and sound of rattles brought officers to the spot, and awoke the inmates. The subsequent conduct of the police, however, showed great neglect, for had proper steps been taken in forwarding intelligence to the nearest fire-station instead of to those who have charge of the "parish engines," there is no doubt the melancholy loss of life which ensued might have been avoided. Mr. Harris, a surgeon, residing nearly opposite, hearing the alarm, observed from his windows the fire almost as soon as the police, and that gentleman states that it burnt with the rapidity of lightning, as within three minutes after he had first seen it the flames appeared to come from the back and over the roof. This is explained by the fact that the back part of the shop was lighted by a well-hole, which acted like a funnel, and the current of air threw up the fire in that direction with great intensity. In about five minutes several of the inmates were observed escaping from the roof to those of the adjoining houses, and scarcely had they done so, when a female was observed in a frantic state at one of the third floor windows with a child in her arms. The crowds now assembled raised a cry to the police, but the appeal was in vain. Not only was there no fire-escape, or even a ladder brought, but no attempt was made to procure one. Had exertions in this respect been made, they would have been of the utmost importance. According to the official report made by the city-police themselves to the commissioner, upwards of 25 minutes elapsed after the alarm of fire had been raised before the arrival of the first brigade engine. The police, however, had managed by this time, to procure the attendance of four useless parish machines, although the supply of water was plentiful in every direction. By the time the first brigade engine arrived the entire building was in flames, and they extended nearly to the houses on the opposite side of Fenchurch-street and to Fenchurch-chambers, which had already caught in the rear. The light of the fire brought the brigade engines to the spot in rapid succession, which were got into operation, the firemen, under the orders of Mr. Braidwood, exerting themselves in the most effective manner. The fire nevertheless progressed in the rear, and extended from Fenchurch-chambers into Lime-street, and it was deemed necessary for its preservation to pour copious streams of water on the walls of the Church and adjoining buildings, to prevent their ignition. Throughout the progress of the flames the most painful anxiety was manifested by the populace, from the various rumours afloat as to the number of persons supposed to be missing and buried in the ruins, and it was not until the fire had been considerably lessened in intensity, that anything positive on this point could be ascertained. It was then discovered that those who had effected their escape were, Mr. Satchell, his daughter, a little girl four years of age, Mr. Robertson, his partner, and the maid servant. After diligent search had been made in every direction, it was discovered that Mrs. Satchell and one of her children were missing. Mr. Satchell stated at the inquest that, but for his wife, every soul in the house must have perished. She awoke him, and called his attention to the springing of rattles in the street, and, on discovering the smoke in the apartment, he was at once convinced the house was on fire. They got out of bed together, and his wife called upon him to take their daughter in his arms, and she would take the boy. They then went out, and woke Mr. Robertson and the servant girl, and in doing so, the smoke was so oppressive as nearly to deprive them of their senses. Notwithstanding this Mrs. Satchell displayed great presence of mind; told them where to escape, and stopped the servant-girl, who, but for her, would in her fright have run headlong into the flames of the burning staircase, and put her through the trap-door leading to the roof. On ascending the ladder to the trap-door the smoke was intense; and Mr. Satchell found himself almost suffocated, when a current of air relieved him, and he managed to gain the roof. It was not until that moment that he missed his wife, and his impression was that she had escaped. On looking round, he saw a female lying prostrate on the leads of the roof, and in the belief that it was Mrs. Satchell he dragged her on to the roof of the house adjoining and got her over the wall, where he was assisted by some one. This female, however, instead of being Mrs. Satchell, turned out to be the servant, but of this Mr. Satchell was not cognizant until he reached the street, when to his great horror and distress of mind he discovered that his wife and one of his children were not with him. Mr. Satchell's legs were burnt, and when he reached the street he was almost black in the face, as if from suffocation. The feet of his wife were also slightly burnt. It was not until near 5 o'clock that the flames were sufficiently subdued to enable a search to be made for those said to be missing. At that time, however, Mr. Braidwood gave directions for the scaling-ladders to be placed against the front of the building, in order that some of the firemen might ascend to the third floor, a portion of which had not as yet fallen in. Two of the brigade men were the first to ascend the ladders, which were placed against the western window, where Mrs. Satchell had been observed with her child by the crowd during the early progress of the fire. They there found the remains of Mrs. Satchell and her child lying by and blackened immediately under the window. The unfortunate mother was in a sitting posture with her head leaning against the wall, and her infant lay by her side as if she had dropped it from her arms when falling backward from the window. An inquest on the bodies was held on Tuesday, when the various facts stated above were brought under discussion. The jury inquired of one of the witnesses how it was the brigade engines were not first called instead of the parish engines? The witness replied that it was because the police had an interest in the rewards, and, in many instances, kept the keys of those engines themselves. The Coroner said this was very wrong, for one of the brigade engines was worth all the parish engines put together. He regretted that the inhabitants, who knew there were fire-escapes, did not, out of humanity, buy and procure them. The saving of life ought always to be considered before property. The foreman of the jury considered the police had not done their duty. A long discussion ensued upon the point, the Coroner being of opinion that the police were not entitled to so much blame as was attributed to them. The jury ultimately returned a verdict of "Accidental death," adding, "that it was their determination to petition the corporation to establish efficient fire-escapes throughout the city, and that they be placed under the control of the police."

Provincial.

Cambridge.—The subjoined address of resident members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge, in favour of the proposed grant to Maynooth College, which has been called forth by the one presented last week, expressive of repugnance to that measure, has been presented to the representatives for the university. The address was signed by residents only; and among them by eight professors and 18 principal tutors of colleges; the remainder of the 78 names appended consisting almost entirely of fellows and officers of the different colleges and of the University. The address was in circulation in Cambridge for only four days, and the Right Hon. H. Goulburn, M.P., and the Hon C. Law, M.P. The undersigned resident members of the Senate of the University of Cambridge, desire to intimate to you, its representatives in Parliament, that the proposed grant to Maynooth College is viewed by them with no feelings either of apprehension or repugnance, and that they deprecate most strongly the agitation now in progress against it." Another address to the same effect, with 300 signatures, has been presented to the same gentleman by the non-resident members of the Senate. The 300 signatures were procured in six days, without any public meeting or advertisement; and among the non-resident signatures in favour of the grant are found the names of the Deans of Ely and Durham, of Archdeacon Hare, Sir Edward Ryan, Mr. Amos, Q.C., Mr. Cowling, deputy high steward, Mr. Babbage, Dr. Kennedy, head master of Shrewsbury School, and of many professors in the University of Glasgow, the University of London, King's College, University College, and the East India College, Haileybury.

Portsmouth.—On Friday last, it was ascertained that Mr. Seton, who was wounded in the late duel by Lieut. Hawkey was gradually getting worse, and that an aneurism had formed, showing that one of the large arteries had been injured by the ball. Mr. Liston, the surgeon, was summoned from London, and after a consultation with the surgeons who had previously attended Mr. Seton, it was resolved to tie the external iliac. The operation was performed by Mr. Liston, on Friday, and was borne with the utmost fortitude. At the conclusion of the operation Mr. Seton shook hands with Dr. Liston, and expressed himself in the following terms:—"Doctor, the moment I get well I will come to London and see you; however, if, on the contrary, it shall be my misfortune to die, I am quite prepared; but, by God, I am ignorant of the cause of my being called out and shot at in the way I have been." Mr. Seton appeared to be going on very comfortably after the operation, until Monday morning, about two o'clock, when a decided change for the worse took place. It soon became evident that he could not long survive, and Mrs. Seton took leave of him, as also did his sister and mother. He appeared quite sensible until within five minutes of his death, which took place without a struggle on Monday evening. The Hampshire Advertiser contains the following in reference to this duel:—"We are informed that some improper expressions respecting Mrs. Hawkey were made use of by Mr. Seton at the soirée, which were overheard by a gentleman in the navy, and which being communicated to Lieut. Hawkey caused the language used to be applied to Mr. Seton. Mrs. Seton states, that about 11 o'clock on the night of Monday, whilst at the soirée at the King's-rooms, Mr. Seton was grossly insulted by Mr. Hawkey, who called Mr. Seton a blackguard and a villain, and told him if he would not fight him, he would horsewhip him down the High-street of Portsmouth, at the same time kicking at Mr. Seton as he passed him. This conduct compelled Mr. S. to seek an explanation, but Mr. Hawkey would not give one, and repeated his language; upon which a meeting was resolved upon. Mrs. Seton further states, that Lieut Pym was second to Mr. Hawkey; that at the first fire Mr. Hawkey's pistol missed, upon which he demanded another shot, which was not opposed by the seconds. At the second fire Mr Seton fell dangerously wounded. He was immediately conveyed on a shutter on board a yacht near the spot and taken to the Quebec hotel, where he has since lain in a dangerous state. Mrs. Seton further says, that Mr. Hawkey behaved in a most ungentlemanly manner, although he has been hospitably entertained on several occasions by Mr. Seton." To this statement Mrs. Hawkey gives an unequivocal denial, and in a letter published in the Morning Post, says, "Whenever Mrs. Hawkey shall have any communication with Mr. Hawkey, or his friend, and to receive from them the authentic matters of fact, a counter-statement will be given, which will, perhaps, alter materially the character of the affair. Meanwhile the press and the public at large should, in common justice, suspend their opinion, and not pass a verdict of condemnation on two unfortunate gentlemen, who by their necessary and unavoidable absence are penniless, and not able to defend themselves. The original and real cause of quarrel is known but to three individuals, excepting, by the way, to the conscience of Mr. Seton himself, and these three individuals are Mr. Hawkey, Mr. Pym, and myself." These are the statements of the two ladies, and are given without comment.

Railways.

The Standing Orders Committee have come to the following decisions:—Durham, Sunderland, and Auckland—Standing orders not dispensed with; Birkenhead, Manchester, and Cheshire—Standing orders not dispensed with; Chester, Manchester, and Liverpool—Standing orders not dispensed with. The Committee on the Cornish Bills has decided that the preamble of the Cornwall Railway has been proved, and that of the West Cornwall not proved. Upon this decision, the St. Ives Junction was withdrawn. The Committee on the Scottish Midland Junction has decided that the preamble has been proved. The Committee on the two rival schemes promoted by the London and Birmingham, and the Great Western Company respectively, have, after a long investigation, decided in favour of the latter; and this having been a contest between the wide gauge and the narrow gauge, the result is of much importance, more particularly as the decision of the Committee is in direct opposition to that of the Board of Trade, which, on a mature examination of the subject, declared itself most strongly for the adoption of the narrow gauge in the district in question. The following Bills were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time in the Lords on Friday:—Exeter and Crediton; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth; Leeds and Bradford (Shipley to Colne); Manchester and Leeds; Burnley, Oldham, and Heywood Branches; Chester and Holyhead; Shrewsbury, Ormesby, and Chester; Leeds, Dewsbury, and Manchester; Huddersfield and Sheffield; Huddersfield and Manchester; Bristol and Exeter.—An agreement has been just concluded between the London and Birmingham Company, the Birmingham and Shrewsbury Company, and the Old Birmingham Canal Company, for the formation of a railway at their mutual expense between Birmingham and Wolverhampton; the two railway companies not to receive a dividend till the Canal Company, from their own resources, united with the railway, declare a dividend of 5*l.* per share. After this provision, the profits to be divided among the three companies; the line from Wolverhampton to Shrewsbury to be made by the Shrewsbury Company.—The Great North of England Railway has been purchased by Mr. Hudson on behalf of the Midland and Newcastle and Darlington and York and North Midland Companies, which is the secret of the great rise in prices of these shares within the last week. The terms are 250*l.* for every 100*l.*, and this rate is applicable to new shares as well as the old, where the calls have been paid up and the shares become productive. It is considered that by this stroke of policy Mr. Hudson will have secured the chief of the lines of the country running in a north and south direction, and complete the continuity of traffic between London and the heart of Scotland, secured by what some of the railway papers call "the great northern alliance."—On Saturday another artery in the great system of railway communication in England was opened on the Northampton and Peterborough Railway. This new line, comprising only a single line of rails between Northampton and Peterborough, has been completed in 15 months, at a cost of about 10,000*l.* per mile, considerably under the estimates.—The distance between London and Birmingham was lately performed in 1 hour and 45 minutes; 110 miles in 105 minutes!—The new schemes of the week amount to 10. They are—the Severn Vale, Blackburn, Clitheroe and North Western Junction; Great Western of Bengal; Blackburn, Ormskirk, and Liverpool; West Metropolitan and Hungerford Market Terminus; Birkenhead and Holyhead; Chester, Whitchurch, Wem, and Shrewsbury; Gloucester, Aberystwith, and Central Wales; Mold Junction; Great Central. The capital proposed to be embarked in these undertakings amounts to between six and eight millions.

Ireland.

Dublin.—The Repeal Levee in commemoration of the anniversary of the imprisonment of Mr. O'Connell and his fellow-traversers took place on Friday the 30th ult., in the Rotunda. The proceedings commenced with a procession of the trades of Dublin, headed by their representatives in carriages drawn by 6 horses, and followed each by its respective band. The tops of the houses along the line of the procession were occupied by spectators, the great majority of whom were females. The only novelty in the affair was the display of lances, in military style, borne by the bricklayers and another body of the trades. The leaders of the poulterers carried battle-axes as their batons. The chimney-sweepers were headed by an equestrian who wore a fac simile of the pointed Irish crown in green and gold. The coal-porters mustered in considerable numbers, and in the morning cleared the quays of persons who were inclined to work. Shortly before 12 o'clock the members of the '82 Club, dressed in their green and gold liveries, assembled in the Rotunda, to adopt an address to be presented to Mr. O'Connell and his fellow-traversers at the levee, and to appoint a deputation to present it. There were about 150 members present, and Sir C. O'Loghlen, Bart., was called to the chair, when the address was proposed by Mr. Kelly, M.P.; seconded by Counsellor Clements, and adopted; after which the Chairman and Messrs. O'Brien, M.P., Grattan, M.P., &c., were nominated to present it. When this meeting was dissolved, a second and general meeting of the several deputations (including the repeal members of the Dublin Corporation, who had arrived from the Mansion-house in state) was held in the same room. Mr. Maurice O'Connell, M.P., was called to the chair, when, upon the motion of Mr. S. O'Brien, M.P., seconded by Mr. H. Grattan, M.P., a resolution was adopted unanimously together with the following pledge:—"We, the undersigned, being convinced that good Government and wise legislation can be permanently secured to the Irish people only through the instrumentality of an Irish Legislature, do hereby solemnly pledge ourselves to our country, and to each other, that we will never desist from seeking the repeal of the Legislative Union with England, by all peaceable, moral, and constitutional means, until a Parliament be restored to Ireland. Dated this 30th May, 1845." The proceedings at these meetings terminated about half-past 12, and in a short time afterwards, Mr. O'Connell (accompanied by his son Mr. J. O'Connell, and Messrs. Barrett, Duffy, Ray, and Dr. Gray), arrived, and immediately proceeded to the Round-room of the Rotunda, where the presentation was appointed to take place, leaving Mr. T. Steele (who was mounted on horseback, having a green branch in his hand) outside, to preserve order, in his capacity of "Head Pacificator." Mr. O'Connell and his fellow-traversers took up their position on the platform, and were loudly cheered by the ladies present, who occupied one-half of the room, which was decorated with lances and banners, having the usual repeal mottos. The first presentation which took place was that of the Lord Mayor and corporation of Dublin. His lordship (Alderman Butler) read the address which had been adopted in council, and handed it to the traversers, upon which Mr. O'Connell separately shook hands with the members of the deputation, and announced his intention of responding to it and the other addresses when they had been all presented. Addresses were then presented by various deputations from "The Repeal Association," "The '82 Club," The Corporations of Limerick, Cork, Waterford, Kilkenny, Clonmel, Sligo, and Drogheda, by the Mayors of those towns; and from the Town Commissioners of Galway, Cashel, Nenagh, Claremorris, Tuam, Wexford, Ennis, Callan, Kells, Navan, Trim, Balbriggan, Loughrea, Kingstown, Athlone, Newry, Dundalk, and Athy. There were also deputations from the inhabitants of Manchester, Clonmel, Kilkenny, Carrick-on-Suir, Limerick, Galway, Belfast, Sligo, Londonderry, Kilcullan, Gormanstown, Carrickmacross, Wexford, Tullow, Clare, Blackrock, &c., all of whom were supplied with addresses, which they handed to the traversers. The repealers of the several Dublin Wards and all those who were to be presented having been introduced with the prescribed ceremony, Mr. O'Connell came forward to the front of the platform, accompanied by the other traversers in the late state prosecutions, to address the assemblage, and was received with loud cheers. After dwelling on the usual topics, he said that conciliation was a mockery, for all those persons who were engaged in our prosecution were still in office, and some of them in a position to be elevated to the bench. That was not concession. They had had, however, already got a great deal, not from conciliation but from agitation. Yet they had been told that agitation in Ireland was subsiding. The proceeding of that day would give an answer to the assertion. The man who did not see that the cause of nationality could not be carried on but by agitation was not worth having or working for; therefore, I call on the old to countenance our exertions, and the sturdy and strong to second them, and rally with us until public opinion becomes so powerful that the English Legislature will no longer attempt to withhold from Irishmen what they have a right to—the repeal of the Union—a Parliament in College-green."—When the learned gentleman had concluded, deputations from the several trades of Dublin were presented to him, on which one of their body read a lengthened address, couched in the usual terms of congratulation. Mr. O'Connell briefly responded to it, observing that every hour the Irish people were deprived of Repeal the tradesmen were being plundered of their wages. The proceedings having then terminated, Mr. O'Connell and the other traversers retired from the reception-room, resumed their seats in their carriages, and joined the procession, which re-formed and passed through Sackville-street to his house in Merrion-square, where he was loudly cheered. It arrived there at 5 o'clock, and drew up before it, when Mr. O'Connell alighted from his carriage, entered his house, and addressed the assembly from the balcony. At half-past 5 o'clock the procession and the mob withdrew, and before 6 the square was comparatively tranquil. During the evening several of the Repeal and Temperance bands walked about the city, playing various airs, and followed by numbers of children shouting for O'Connell and Repeal.

The Weekly Meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday, in Conciliation Hall, the Lord Mayor of Dublin, who had just returned from his mission of invitation to her Majesty, in the chair.—Mr. O'CONNELL commenced by warning those who had convened meetings to oppose the Maynooth Bill, for Wednesday and Thursday next, at the Rotunda, that they were acting illegally, inasmuch as they proposed an assembly of Delegates, contrary to the Irish Convention Act. He also gave notice of an address to the Roman Catholic clergy of the north, requesting them to use their influence to prevent collision between the Roman Catholics and Orangemen on the approaching 1st of July. He next lamented the doings of Ribbonmen calling themselves Molly Maguires, in the counties of Cavan, Leitrim, and part of Fermanagh. Their nightly assassinations and crimes were most awful, and he would submit it to consideration whether they ought not to send down another missionary to try to recover those deluded persons from the error of their ways.—Mr. STEELE intimated that he had done his best among them, and would now be disposed to leave the guardianship to the Roman Catholic clergymen and the Repeal wardens, who were quite competent to fulfil that duty.—Mr. O'CONNELL then made the speech of the day, and adverted to the delight he experienced at the Levee on Friday, saying it would now be impossible to dissever Irishmen from Repeal; all nature seemed now to cry aloud "Repeal, repeal."—Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN, M.P., followed, and dwelt with satisfaction on the "Levee," and the declaration of "No surrender" so solemnly taken on that occasion by members of the '82 Club and others. He concluded by discussing the new Banking Bill, and complained of restrictions which it would lay on some banks in Dublin.—Mr. O'CONNELL agreed that the new Banking Bill had much that was objectionable in it. It did not fulfil Sir R. Peel's promises or statement, and he (Mr. O'Connell) now retracted all that he had said in its favour. If this Bill passed, he warned the farmers and others that prices would fall.—Mr. STEELE moved the insertion on the minutes of a resolution in favour of the Maynooth Grant, by certain members of the Senate of Cambridge.—Mr. O'BRIEN seconded the proposition. Both he and Mr. Steele stated themselves to be members of the Senate.—The rent for the week was 642*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*

A FRIGHTFUL CASE OF A BAD LEG CURED BY HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS!

Mr. Thomas Clarke, a retired Captain from the South Sea Trade, residing in Globe-lane, Mile-end-rd., had a bad leg for five years. There were about twenty holes in it; several pieces of bone had come away. The limb was often the size of a child's body, and it frequently caused the most excruciating pain. The Captain was told that his leg must be amputated; but he, like hundreds of others, has just got it soundly healed by means of these surprising remedies, which are infallible in the cure of all Wounds and Ulcers. Sold at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment, 244, Strand (where advice may be had gratis); and by all respectable vendors of medicine throughout the civilised world.

MEEN FUN, the celebrated Chinese Cosmetic, Patronised by the Queen and the Royal Family.—The great value of this Cosmetic is, that the ingredients being solely herbaceous, the most delicate complexion can apply it without injury, while rough, red, and moist skins speedily experience beneficial results. Travellers and residents in warm climates, subject to the enervating influence of tropical heat, will, when the skin becomes moist and heated, experience inconceivable comfort by resorting to this Cosmetic, as it will both allay and avert discoloration and coarseness. News of the Week.

ON Monday Lord Stanley introduced in the House of Peers the new Bill for the purpose of granting compensation to tenants in Ireland. This measure is brought forward by Government as the result of the Landlords and Tenants' Commission, and is intended to meet the suggestions of the Report lately submitted to Parliament by the Earl of Devon. Lord Stanley, in introducing the Bill, contended that the main thing requisite in Ireland was capital, obtained either from the Crown, the landlord, or the tenant. His lordship admitted that it might seem absurd to talk of the capital of Irish tenants, but he assured the House that the Irish tenant possessed more money than he was willing to admit in the present excitement of political agitation—to say nothing of capital of another kind in the shape of his labour and industry. On these grounds, therefore, Government proposed to establish a commission in Dublin, the expenses of which will be defrayed by a tax levied on the tenants, and whose office it will be to award compensation for three kinds of improvement effected by tenants—viz., building, draining and fencing. Lord Portman expressed his disappointment at the measure, and announced his intention to introduce a Bill for the more clearly defining what he considered to be a tenant's right. This Bill was introduced on Thursday by Lord Portman, who stated that its object is to give compensation to tenants for permanent improvements made on the land. The Bill proposes that any tenant of any land, holding such land with or without a lease, at any time within six months prior to the expiration of his lease, or prior to his quitting the land, may claim compensation, not exceeding the amount of three years' rent for tillages and for permanent improvements. On Tuesday, the Duke of Wellington moved the committal of the Maynooth Bill. The Earl of Clancarty moved as an amendment that the House go into committee on the Bill that day six months. The Earl of Wicklow supported the Bill, and expressed his hope that it was a preliminary measure to the connection of the Roman Catholic Church with the State by means of an endowment. He objected to charge this endowment on the Consolidated Fund, because such a step would rouse the Protestant feeling of the country, and he also objected to take it from the property of the Irish Church; but he thought it might with perfect justice be placed as a rent charge upon the land. Earl Fitzwilliam concurred in these views, and Lord Wharncliffe admitted that long before he joined the Ministry, he had been a supporter of the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy. He thought, however, that the people were not yet prepared for it, and said that Government had therefore no intention, at present, of proposing such a measure. The amendment was then negatived without a division, and the Bill passed through committee without alteration.—In the House of Commons, on Friday, Lord Ashley introduced two important Bills for regulating the treatment of lunatics in England and Wales. Both Bills were seconded by Sir J. Graham, who stated that the Government considered them most important measures, and intended to give them their best support. On Monday, after a long discussion, and a fruitless opposition, the Irish Banking Bill passed through committee, with some trifling amendments. On Tuesday, Mr. Villiers brought forward his annual motion for a repeal of the Corn-laws, which gave rise to a long and animated debate on the subject of free-trade. Sir J. Graham declared that the prosperity of agriculture must depend on the prosperity of other branches of native industry; and that the substitution of protecting for prohibitory duties is the key-stone of Sir R. Peel's policy. He confessed that he had no confidence in Lord J. Russell's fixed duty of 4s., and said that if we get rid of the present Corn-law, we had better assent to a total repeal. At the same time he condemned all sudden changes, and gave his decided negative to the motion. Lord J. Russell argued that the fall of the present Corn-law was indicated by the feebleness of the defence made for it; and after a reply from Sir R. Peel, the House divided, and negatived the motion by a majority of 132. On Wednesday, Mr. Liddell's Dog-Stealing Bill was read a second time by a majority of 67 to 23; and Sir J. Y. Buller's County Rates Bill was supported by Government, and read a second time without a division. On Thursday a long debate took place on the Scotch Poor Law Bill, which was read a second time, with the understanding that it would undergo mature consideration in committee, so as to meet the objections and suggestions of Scotch members. The Irish Banking Bill was also the subject of a discussion; and after some resistance from Mr. Smith O'Brien, who had come over from Dublin to oppose it, the report of the Bill was received.

Home News.

COURT.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Nemours and the Prince of Leiningen, left Buckingham Palace on Monday for Windsor Castle, travelling to Slough by a special train of the Great Western Railway. The Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and the Princesses, also left town on the same day for Windsor. On Tuesday the Queen and her royal visitors took an airing in the new droshkys which arrived at Windsor last week as presents from the Emperor of Russia to Prince Albert. Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Duke and Duchess of Nemours, with a numerous suite, afterwards went to Ascot races, and on their return a state dinner was given in St. George's Hall. On Wednesday, the Queen, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Duke of Nemours, inspected the Royal Horse Guards and the regiment of Coldstream Guards in the Great Park, and in the evening Her Majesty gave another state dinner in St. George's Hall. On Thursday, after taking their usual morning walk in the grounds of the Castle, the Queen and her royal visitors proceeded to Ascot to witness the race for the Emperor of Russia's Cup. In the evening the Queen gave a state dinner in St. George's Hall. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the royal family, the Duke and Duchess of Nemours, left the Castle yesterday for town, travelling by a special train from Slough to Paddington. Her Majesty gave a grand banquet and evening party at Buckingham Palace last night.

The Queen's Fancy Ball.—The Queen gave a bal costumé on Friday evening, at Buckingham Palace, at which all the guests appeared in the costume of the period between 1740 and 1750. The company numbered about 1200, and included the diplomatic corps and the principal foreigners of distinction at present in the metropolis, all of whom adopted the foreign costumes of that date, appearing in the uniform of their respective nations. The nobility and gentry in numerous cases adopted the costumes of members of their families living at that period, the dresses being copied from family portraits with the greatest exactness. Most of the gentlemen appeared in velvet coats—crimson, black, or blue—most richly embroidered with gold or silver, or trimmed with gold lace; powdered wigs were universal, and the style of coiffure was so complete as to render recognition, except among intimate friends difficult. Gentlemen holding military commissions appeared, as nearly as possible, in the uniforms of their respective services at the period selected for the fete: thus, the Duke of Wellington appeared in the uniform of the Duke of Cumberland of that day; the Earl of Cardigan in the uniform of the 11th Dragoons at the battle of Culloden, and the Marquis of Londonderry in the dress of a cavalry officer of the time; Lord Forester appeared in the dress of captain of the honourable corps of Gentlemen Pensioners; the Duke of Rutland was dressed in the full costume of a Knight of the Garter a century back; the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the dress of his predecessor in office of the period; the Duke of Beaufort, the Earl of Wilton, Earl Fitzhardinge, Lord Shelburne, Lord Morpeth, Lord Stanley, and Viscount Alford were distinguished by the richness of their costumes. The Earl of Liverpool, Earl Delawarr and Lord Ernest Bruce, the great officers of the household, appeared in the dress of their respective offices, and were distinguished by the magnificence of their dress. Sir R. Peel wore a black velvet court dress, and Lord John Russell looked twice his usual size in the full wig and capacious coat of the period. Many Scottish gentlemen wore the Highland costume of the time which, though retaining all its peculiarity, yet was sufficiently identified with the age, in the coat and high-heeled shoe, so as to harmonise completely with the rest. Among the most beautiful Scottish dresses were those of the Marquis of Breadalbane, the Master of Strathallan, and Captain Gordon Cumming. The officers who wore infantry dresses displayed the long white gaiters which remained in vogue, even up to the reign of George IV. The cavalry all wore high military boots, and some of them the crimson silk sword-belt fringed with gold, which gave them very much the appearance of a modern Grand Cross of the Bath. The cavalry were also distinguished by the three-cornered hat, while the infantry displayed the old-fashioned high-peaked Grenadier cap. The dresses of the ladies did not display an equal variety with those of the gentlemen; the style of all was the same, the only difference being in the costliness of the material, the taste in the choice of colours, and the display of jewels in decorations. A few appeared in little velvet hats, with one or two feathers, but they were exceptions. The general head-dress was the hair powdered, a ridge of curls round the forehead and face, and the hair falling back with curls on the shoulders, or else wigs which came still closer to the fashion of the day. Some of the ladies made a difference in the fashion of wearing their trains; instead of starting from the waist, it fell at once from the shoulders, not being confined at all at the waist, but descending at once to the bottom of the skirt. The material of which these were composed was generally old brocaded silks and satins, many of them embroidered in gold and silver, or worked in needlework; the trains were looped up with golden clasps, bunches of flowers, and bouquets of brilliants and precious stones, displaying dresses of old point, Valenciennes, or Guipure lace, not too long to conceal the high-heeled, sharp-pointed, and diamond-ornamented white satin shoe. The ladies wore hoops, which very much extended the dress on each side, without adding to the rotundity of the figure. The effect of powder rendered the complexion of the younger ladies much more brilliant, and added not a little to the splendour of the fête. Among the dresses most distinguished were those of the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Ailesbury, the Marchioness of Douro, and Miss Burdett Coutts. The pages of honour were dressed in the complete costume of the period in miniature, and having a large white satin bow, or shoulder-knot, on the right shoulder. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Nemours, by the members of the Royal Family, and attended by the ladies in waiting and the officers of state, left the drawing-room at half-past 10 o'clock, and passed through the saloon to the ball-room where they received the company. Her Majesty and the Royal Family taking their usual stations at their platform, the ball commenced with a Polonaise, danced by the Queen and Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Nemours, followed by their distinguished guests. The dance extended through all the state apartments, all the bands striking up the same tune. After this dance the assembled company passed slowly before the Queen. Her Majesty then left the ball room, and proceeded to the throne room. The first minuet was then formed, consisting of :—The Queen, Prince George; Duchess of Nemours, Prince Albert; Lady Douro, Prince Edward; Lady Mount Edgecumbe, Prince Leiningen; Duchess of Roxburgh, Duke of Beaufort; Duchess of Buccleuch, Lord Leveson; Lady Waterford. Lord Exeter; Lady Sydney, Lord Douro. A quadrille followed. The company, who had arrived in the interim, then passed before the Queen. The second minuet was then danced by—the Queen, Prince Albert; Lady Ailesbury, Prince George; Lady Dalmeny, Prince Edward; Duchess of Buccleuch, Lord Exeter; Lady Seymour, Lord Clanricarde; Lady Blandford, Lord Granby; Lady Canning, Lord Douglas; Lady Villiers, Lord Abercorn. At the conclusion of this dance, the royal party returned to the ball-room. The Countess of Jersey's minuet was then formed and danced. This was followed by the Marchioness of Breadalbane's strathspey. The Countess of Chesterfield's minuet was the last dance before supper. At 12 o'clock the Queen and her guests passed to supper, which was served in the great dining-room, in a style of royal splendour. After the return of her Majesty from supper, the Queen's Third Minuet was formed in the Throne-room, and was danced by the Queen, the Duke of Nemours; the Duchess of Beaufort, Prince Albert; the Duchess of Nemours, the Prince of Leiningen; the Marchioness of Douro, the Earl of Shelburne; the Countess of Wilton, the Earl of Wilton; Lady Ernest Bruce, the Marquis of Douro; the Countess Bruce, Viscount Sydney; Lady Leveson, Earl Bruce; Viscountess Canning, the Marquis of Douglas; the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Marquis of Exeter, The old English country dance, Sir Roger de Coverley, having been danced in the Picture-gallery, the Royal party returned to the Throne-room, where a quadrille was danced, and then a minuet (which concluded the ball), in which the Queen danced with the Prince of Leiningen, Prince Albert with the Countess of Wilton; Prince George with the Duchess of Nemours; the other couples being the Duchess of Buccleuch, Marquis of Douglas; Lady Cremorne, Earl of Wilton; the Duchess of Roxburgh, Marquis of Granby; and two other couples. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and their illustrious guests, the Duke and Duchess of Nemours, and the Prince of Leiningen, retired at half-past 2 o'clock from the state rooms, and the general company took their departure.

Parliamentary Movements.—A new writ has been issued for the county of Edinburgh in the room of Mr. Ramsay, who has accepted the Chiltern hundreds.

The Corn Laws.—An interesting return, as regards its bearing upon the operation of the laws affecting the importation and consumption of corn, grain, meal, and flour, has been printed by order of the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. W. Miles, M.P. It appears from this paper that during the year 1844, ending the 5th Jan., 1845, the gross total quantity of wheat and wheat-flour imported into this country amounted to 1,381,875 quarters; viz., 1,145,883 quarters of foreign, and 235,992 quarters of colonial, produce and growth. The quantity entered for home consumption during the same period amounted to 1,026,976 quarters, of which 791,385 quarters were of foreign, and 235,591 quarters of colonial growth and produce. The quantities remaining in the warehouse at the close of the year 1844 amounted altogether to 439,823 quarters. The largest importations of wheat and wheat-flour appear to have taken place in the months of May, June, July, August, and September, and the smallest in the months of February and December. The quantities thrown upon the market, or, in other words, entered for home consumption, amounted in the month of July to 427,623 quarters, and in that of August to 187,504 quarters, or about two-thirds of the whole quantity entered for home consumption in 1844. The monthly average price of wheat in England and Wales was, in January, 1844, 51*s.* 1*d.*; in February, 53*s.* 5*d.*; in March, 56*s.* 3*d.*; in April, 55*s.* 4*d.*; in May, 55*s.* 6*d.*; in June, 55*s.* 8*d.*; in July 54*s.* 4*d.*; in August, 50*s.*; in September, 46*s.* 4*d.*; in October, 46*s.* 2*d.*; in November, 45*s.* 11*d.*; and in December, 45*s.* 3*d.* per quarter: thus showing that the price of wheat was never higher than 2*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, nor lower than 2*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* per quarter, giving opportunity for a difference between the two extreme prices of only 11*s.* a-quarter. The total quantities of barley imported in 1844, amounted to 1,022,076 quarters, of which 1,029,021 quarters were entered for home consumption; the total quantity of oats and oatmeal imported to 304,757 quarters, of which 264,854 were entered for home consumption; the total quantities of rye and rye-meal imported to 26,591 quarters, and the total quantities entered for domestic consumption to 28,779; the total importation of peas to 109,176 quarters, and the quantities entered for home consumption to 122,984 quarters; and the total importation of beans to 154,582 quarters, and the total quantities entered for domestic consumption to 225,680 quarters. It further appears, according to this return, that the total quantity of corn, meal, and flour, the growth of Ireland, imported into Great Britain from the former country, amounted to 2,801,206 quarters, of which 440,153 quarters consisted of wheat and wheat flour, and 2,242,310 quarters of oats and oatmeal alone.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The Minister of Marine presented to the Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday the demand of a credit for reinforcing the squadron stationed on the western coast of Africa, in virtue of the convention lately concluded for the repression of the slave-trade. M. Guizot entered the hall while his colleague was reading the exposé des motifs of the bill, and was surrounded and complimented by his friends. The Minister of Marine next deposited on the table copies of the convention, signed in London on the 29th May last, and of the instructions to be given to the superior officers in command of the respective stations. M. Thiers afterwards ascended the tribune, and reminded the Chamber of its recent decision relative to the enforcement of the laws against the Jesuits, and trusted that the Ministry had taken it into serious consideration. The Minister of Justice replied, that no new fact had occurred in the interval to require the enforcement of those laws. He felt all the importance of the question, and would give it a prompt solution when necessary. The Chamber next proceeded to discuss the various chapters of the budget providing for the maintenance of the clergy, which were voted without any opposition. M. Dubois only complained of the number of congregations which had of late established themselves all over France; to which the Minister of Justice replied, that the Government had prepared a statistique of all those establishments, and would suppress those that existed in opposition to the laws. M. Delarochejacquelin here interrupted the Minister, and asked if there were no laws prohibiting labour on Sundays, and why they were not carried into execution. The Minister, however, returned no answer; and the Chamber, having voted the supplies demanded by the Minister of Justice, commenced the discussion of those of the Foreign Department. Towards the end of the sitting the question of reducing the Five per Cents. was again revived. Being reminded that he had engaged to present a Bill to that effect in the course of next session, and asked whether he still had the same intention, the Minister of Finance said that the recent vote of the Chamber of Peers had modified the Cabinet's dispositions, and that, for the present, he could not return any positive answer. Thereupon, an Opposition Member moved that the question be referred to the budget committee, for the purpose of enabling them to reconsider their report on the public debt, and to obtain of the Minister of Finances more explicit information. On a division taking place, the incidental motion was rejected by the small majority of nine. M. Billault then attacked the foreign policy of the Cabinet, which M. Guizot defended with masterly eloquence, and the foreign Budget was passed without amendment.—A meeting of the leaders of the Opposition took place on Sunday, at M. Thiers' house, to consider what was to be done with regard to the new slave treaty, and after a long discussion, in the course of which it was admitted that the treaty did not offer any favourable point of attack, as more had been obtained from England than could possibly have been expected, it was resolved that no opposition should be made to the grant of ten millions of francs, to be demanded by the Government, for the increase of the fleet. M. Billault, however, expressed a hope that the opportunity should not be lost of claiming for the Opposition the honour of having obtained the treaty, because it was the Opposition which had forced the Government to make it, and he expressed his intention of speaking on the subject, and undertook to show that the English Government had not given up the right of search from respect and consideration for the French Cabinet, but from fear of the Opposition. It was known from this that there would be no division on the question of the treaty, but that the Opposition would make use of the budget to bring forward, for the last time during the present session, the questions of Tahiti, Texas, and Spain.—Some of the Paris papers state that Admiral Dupetit Thouars is to be appointed to the command of the fleet which is to be sent to the coast of Africa, to carry the new treaty into execution, and that the appointment has been submitted to the approbation of the English Government, which has made no objection. The papers add, that Captain Bouet, who was in London during the negotiations, will be the second in command. The Chamber of Deputies voted, on Saturday, the Paris and Lyons and the Lyons and Avignon Railroad Bills by a majority of 230 to 4. The duration of the [illegible] sion of this latter line was fixed at 50 years. The [illegible] pany will have to execute at its own expense a [illegible] Grenoble. The committee appointed to examine the [illegible] and Strasburg and the Tours and Nantes Railroads had nearly finished its labours. Slight modifications had been introduced into the original project.—The Minister of Finance had a long conference on Saturday with the committee on the estimates. The principal question discussed between them referred to the proposed reduction of the postage of letters. The Minister objects to the establishment of an uniform rate of postage, because the deficit, however inconsiderable, could not be at present replaced by any other revenue. He, nevertheless, pledged himself to suppress in 1846 the additional tax of one penny per letter delivered in the rural districts of France.—The Paris Opposition journals raise a loud outcry against the French Government for consulting (as was reported) the British Cabinet on the demand of passports by Don Carlos. "The reply to the communications respecting the abdication of Don Carlos arrived from London on Monday," says the Constitutionnel. "The English Cabinet sees no objection in granting passports to the Spanish Prince and his family, and approves the resolution of the French Government to consult the Madrid Cabinet on the subject previous to the adoption of a definitive resolution. Consequently, the moment the intentions of the Government of Queen Isabella shall be known, passports will be delivered to Don Carlos for Rome, where the Prince and his family intend to fix their residence for some time."

SPAIN.—Madrid papers of the 2d inst. state that on the previous day the Esperanza, the organ of the Carlist party, had all its impressions seized just as it was about to issue a supplement containing the news of the abdication of Don Carlos in favour of his eldest son. This was an ill-judged measure on the part of the Government, as it has thereby shown fear, and given increased importance to the whole affair, knowing, at the same time, that, in a day or two, every one in Spain would be thoroughly enlightened through the medium of the Paris papers. It is the opinion in the best informed political circles of Madrid that the abdication of Don Carlos must eventually be followed by civil war or a marriage between the Prince of Asturias and Queen Isabella.—Myriads of locusts are devastating the province of Toledo. The authorities allow so much per lb. for these destructive insects. In the district of Madridlejo upwards of 300 arrobas, or 7500 lbs., of locusts are daily collected.—The Queen reached Valencia on the 29th, in excellent health. Her Majesty's first care on arriving was to proceed to church, and offer a prayer at the shrine of the Virgin of the Forsaken. On the 2d the Queen was to continue her journey to Barcelona, where she was only expected to remain till the latter end of June, it being her intention to visit the Basque provinces, passing through Sarragossa, Tudela, and Pampeluna.

GERMANY.—A letter from Berlin of the 26th ult., in the Observateur du Rhin, says:—"Our Government has come to a resolution on the subject of the German Catholics, and has addressed the following circular to the regencies and the consistories. As religious liberty exists in Prussia, the movements of the German Catholic Church cannot be arrested, nor can the German Catholics be prevented from following the exercise of their mode of worship. Nevertheless, the time has not come for deciding whether this church shall be acknowledged, because the direction of this movement is not yet clearly established. It is upon these principles that the authorities are to act. Thus, they are not to give officially to the German Catholics the appellation of community, nor the title of president to the directors; neither is the new church to be designated the German Catholic Church, because this may offend the Roman Catholic Church. It is forbidden to grant to the German Catholics the use of evangelical churches for the performance of their worship. The acts of their priests shall have no legal effect. They may baptize and bury, but these births and deaths must be inscribed in the registers of the nearest evangelical church. They cannot solemnize marriages, because such marriages would not be legal. But this does not apply to the Rhenish provinces, where civil marriages still exist. Consequently, marriages of German Catholics must, with permission of the consistory, be celebrated by a Protestant pastor, who will inscribe them in the register of his church." These regulations are expected to be followed by others.—The papers announce the death of the Princess Louisa Henrietta, daughter of the late Prince Charles William, of Nassau Usingen, and aunt of the Duchess of Cambridge. The Princess had nearly attained her 82d year.

SWITZERLAND.—Letters from Berne state that the small cantons which supported the Jesuitical Government of Lucerne in its late struggle have formed free corps to be marched to the Freyampt, the Catholic part of the canton of Argau, in order to support with force of arms the plan which is arranged as follows:—1. The overthrow of the existing Government; 2. The formation of a new canton, of which the chief town is to be Baden; 3. The restoration of the suppressed convents. The authorities of Zofingen have given orders to its contingents to hold itself ready to march at the first beat of drum. They have likewise established advanced posts round the town, and fortified the positions by which an army might approach, but no hostile demonstration had yet taken place. A grand military review was held at Lucerne on the 1st inst., on the occasion of the solemn thanksgiving which was to be simultaneously celebrated by all the cantons of the ultramontane league for the victory gained over the free corps. A number of the inhabitants of the Freyampt were present at the solemnity. The Sardinian Government, less scrupulous than Austria, had acceded to the propositions of the authorities of Lucerne, relative to the confinement of Dr. Steiger in one of its fortresses.

Russia.—Accounts from Tiflis to the 20th April inform us that Count Woronzoff had entered on his office as Commander-in-Chief and Governor of the army and province. His first measure was to order the erection of a number of new fortresses and smaller forts on the coast and along the line, whence it is inferred that the defensive system will still be the basis of the operations; while, on the other hand, offensive operations are to be on a more extensive scale. The governor while on his journey issued several proclamations to the mountaineers, many thousand copies of which translated into Turkish, Persian, and Armenian, have been distributed. He speaks in them of the benevolent intentions of the Emperor for restoring the peace and prosperity of the country, and promises the Caucasian tribes that their religion, laws, and customs, as well as their property, shall be respected; whereas if they will not hearken to wholesome advice, Russia will be obliged to do its utmost. Allusions are made to the ambitious and perfidious intrigues of those who have abused the confidence of the mountaineers to mislead them.

New Zealand.—The New Zealand Company have received accounts from Wellington of the 19th February. The general tenor of the intelligence is not at all of a favourable complexion, no better understanding having as yet been come to between Captain Fitzroy and the company's agents; in consequence of the company's agent at Plymouth not having the means to pay about 400*l.* in money for the purchase of some land from the natives within the time limited, the governor had sequestered the company's property at that place, an act of severity which had been protested against by the principal agent at the capital. There was also reason to apprehend that a collision with the natives would be inevitable.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday.—The Earl of Clancarty gave notice that, on the motion to go into committee on the Maynooth Bill, he should move its committal that day six months.—Lord Wharncliffe, on the part of Mr. Barry, the architect, denied the justness of the accusations made by Lord Brougham on Friday evening last. The President of the Council said Mr. Barry disclaimed all wilful intention of delaying the completion of the new House of Lords, and expressed his ignorance of what Lord Brougham meant by "certain high protection out of the House."—Lord Brougham repeated his several accusations. Of Tully it was said by Quintillian that he was not an orator, but eloquence itself: and Lord Coke said of Lyttleton that he was not a lawyer, but the law itself. So they might say of Mr. Barry, not that he was a gothic architect or a dilatory man, but that he was delay itself. In explanation of the insinuation about "certain high protection out of their Lordships' House," Lord Brougham said:—There was a certain fine arts commission; and it seemed that this fine arts commission was a very important body, and Mr. Barry, ingenious as he was in delay and in getting rid of his assurances, knew that it was a very important body, and he (Lord Brougham) called it an important body, because His Royal Highness Prince Albert was at its head. There could be no doubt about his meaning now—he meant it in so many words.—The Marquis of Clanricarde joined with Lord Brougham in attributing culpable delay to Mr. Barry, and concurred in every word spoken by Lord Brougham on the subject.—Lord Campbell also concurred, and instanced the dispatch used in completing Lincoln's-inn new hall, and said if the architect (Mr. Hardwick) had been employed to construct the new Houses of Parliament, they would be now ready for occupation, though, perhaps, not so distinguished for gothic ornament.—On the motion of Lord Brougham the Small Debtors Bill was read a third time and passed.—Lord Stanley then rose to move the first reading of the Bill for Compensation to Tenants in Ireland. He believed that there was no one who would not concur in the opinion that the grand remedy for some of the most prominent evils under which Ireland laboured, was to provide remunerative labour for her surplus population. There were only two modes by which this could be effected—either by emigration, which would reduce the amount of population within the limits of employment, or by increasing the means of employment so as to make it commensurate with the amount of the population. For his own part he did not think that emigration, which in itself was for many reasons objectionable, would be any sufficient remedy for the evil, especially as Ireland had space enough and to spare for her population; but what she did want was capital for employment, which could only be got either from the Crown, or from the landlord, or from the tenant. The third source, however absurd it might seem to some to talk on Irish tenants' capital, was the most important of all, and to it the Government now proposed to turn their attention. That class of persons in Ireland were often possessed of more money than they were inclined to admit, and besides of another capital—their labour and industry. He compared the average size of farms in England and Ireland, and after mentioning some of the more prominent evils of the Irish system, explained that the Government proposed by this Bill to secure compensation for three principal kinds of improvements effected by the tenant—building, draining, and fencing. The noble lord then entered into a minute detail respecting these improvements, and the amount of compensation to be allowed for them, and proceeded to state that such compensation would only be secured to the tenant who was ejected by his landlord. He proposed to limit the amount of composition to be given, viz., 3*l.* an acre for improvements in building, 1*l.* for repairing fences, and 3*l.* for draining; but the aggregate of an acre in no case to exceed 5*l.*, supposing the three improvements to be executed. It would also be necessary to provide inexpensive means of settling these claims between landlord and tenant; and for this purpose it was proposed to establish an officer in Dublin, with the title of Commissioner of Improvements, to whom all claims of compensation should be addressed in writing. This officer should then have the power of appointing Assistant Commissioners, who would be sent down to examine into cases, and make awards, by which means tenants would not be put to the expense of a journey to Dublin.—The Marquis of Clanricarde said no one could be expected to pass an unhesitating opinion on a measure which treated the subject in such detail, but rejoiced at the Bill, as a means of relieving the Irish landlords from much of the obloquy that now attached to them, and saving them the trouble of finding agents for their estates, whose place would be supplied by the Commissioners. In his opinion, the Bill would do very little towards remedying the evils complained of.—Lord Portman expressed his disappointment at the measure. He should himself consider it necessary to lay on the table of the House in a few days a Bill, the object of which would be to define what really was a tenant's right—a term which had frequently been much misapprehended, and to entitle this to be done before arbitrators, instead of in a Court of Law.—The Earl of Wicklow expressed his conviction that the Bill was founded on justice, equity, and good faith.—Lord Rosse thought the principle of the measure very objectionable.—The Earl of Devon said, it was a great mistake to suppose this measure was meant as a panacea for all the ills of Ireland. It was intended to meet a particular class of distress, and he besought the House to consider it simply as applying an effectual remedy to a great practical evil. He rejoiced in the Bill, as one easy of application, and fair towards both landlord and tenant.—The Bill was then read a first time. Lord Ravensworth then moved the second reading of the Bastard Children Bill, and briefly stated that the principle of the existing law was bad, as giving to designing women the power of ensnaring the unsuspecting, for which reason he hoped the House would consent to some alteration.—Lords Wharncliffe and Carnarvon both opposed the Bill, on the ground that so short a time had elapsed since the amendment of the law, that it was quite impossible to pronounce how it would work.—On the question being put by the Lord Chancellor, that the Bill be read a second time, Lord Wharncliffe moved that it be read that day six months, which was carried.—On the motion of Lord Hatherton, the Canal Companies Tolls and the Carriers Companies Tolls Bills were read a second time.

Tuesday.—Lord Portman gave notice that, on Thursday, he should lay on the table a Bill for compensating tenants in England in certain cases.—The Duke of Wellington moved the commitment of the College of Maynooth Bill.—The Duke of Leinster supported the motion.—The Earl of Clancarty moved as an amendment that the House should go into committee on the Bill that day six months. He said that, by passing this Bill they would establish a principle which would operate more strongly to the overthrow of the Church than any pledges or individual support noble lords could give would contribute towards its maintenance. This Bill established the fact that the State was willing to support and encourage the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. It was also a presumption that Parliament considered the Roman Catholic Church worthy of being continued in Ireland, and it evinced a disposition to support the disputed claims of the Church of Rome over this country. The proposal to endow Maynooth implied a doubt of the soundness of the principles of the Anglican Church—a Church which rested not its claims on the authority of Parliament, but on its own scriptural character and purity of doctrine.—The Earl of Wicklow expressed his obligations to Government for the wisdom and courage they had displayed in devising and proposing this measure, but trusted that he might regard it as an index of an intention to connect the Roman Catholic Church with the State by means of an endowment. This was now only a question of time and mode; the former was as propitious now as ever it would be, but the latter was still one of difficulty. He objected either to charge the endowment upon the Consolidated Fund, or to take it from the property of the Irish Church, but thought that if it were placed as a rent-charge upon the land, neither Parliament nor the landlords would have a right to complain. He showed that the plunder of the Irish Protestant Church within the last 10 years would have amply sufficed for this endowment, and concluded by urging Government, if they meant to preserve tranquillity, to pursue their present measure, and be prepared next session with one for the endowment of the Romish Church.—Lord Fitzwilliam concurred in the opinion that, after endowing Maynooth, an endowment of the Romish clergy would be absolutely indispensable. He agreed also generally in the views of Lord Wicklow as to the source from which the necessary funds should be provided; but thought that, to avoid an appearance of degradation, the ministers of both religions should be placed upon exactly the same footing.—Lord Clancarty having withdrawn his amendment, Lord Wharncliffe denied that the present Bill was any earnest of the future intentions of Government. He had himself in former days expressed an opinion that the Catholic clergy ought to be endowed, and he and some of his noble friends near him had, in the House of Commons, voted in favour of a measure for the payment of the Catholic clergy by the State, when that measure was proposed by Lord F. Egerton. But, though such was his opinion, as formerly expressed, he would fairly state that until the people of England were favourably disposed towards such a measure, it would not be prudent for any Government to propose it. It would be necessary that, on this point, the feeling of the people of England should undergo a change, and he hoped the time would come when that change would take place. At present there were so many difficulties in the way that he could not see how anybody could conceive that Government had any intention of proposing such a measure. Before they did so they must watch how the feeling of the country tended. At present all they said was, that they proposed the present measure as an important one, and as an earnest to the people of Ireland that everything which Government could do to soothe their feelings would be done.—The Marquis of Breadalbane said he trusted the speeches of the two noble earls who had just addressed the House would have that effect upon the country which they ought to have. He believed the people of England were not gulled by the present measure, and that they did not look upon it as an isolated one. They looked upon it as one that got in the large end of the wedge, and they knew that the small end would soon follow. They knew that the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy would soon follow the present measure—but the people of this country would bear in mind that such a measure was intimately connected with the fundamental principle of the constitution, and with the safeguard of the liberties of the country established at the revolution, an endeavour to invade which had never till now been attempted. He could not let the present opportunity pass by without recording his opposition to the Bill before the House. The motion was then negatived without a division, and the House went into committee on the Bill. The Bill passed through committee without any alteration or amendment, the report was brought up, and the Bill ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

Thursday.—On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, the Bail in Error Bill was, with some verbal amendments, read a third time and passed.—On the motion of Lord Lyttelton, the Death by Accidents Compensation Bill went through committee, and was ordered to be read a third time on Tuesday next.—On the motion of Lord Campbell, the Deodands Abolition Bill was reported with amendments.—Lord Portman brought forward his Bill to provide compensation to tenants for improvements made by them in certain cases. He conceived it was necessary to make provision that tenants should be compensated for improvements effected by them on the estates of minors, on the estates of ecclesiastical corporations, on estates managed by the Court of Chancery, and on estates recently sold. Means also, he thought, should be taken to counteract the evils consequent upon leases for years, of which remarkable examples might be found in all parts of the country, but more especially in Somersetshire. The plan by which he proposed to remedy the injustice of the present system was to make it lawful for any tenant, with or without a lease, at any time within six months of the expiration of his term, to give notice to his landlord that he intended to make a claim for compensation; that that claim should not exceed in its amount three years' rent; that the claim might be made for tillage or permanent improvements, of which the tenant might not have had such enjoyment as the terms of his contract or the custom of the country affixed, deducting from that amount of compensation the value of such enjoyment of the improvements as the tenant might have had after the works were completed. He also proposed that it should be lawful for any landlord or his agent, within six months prior to the expiration of the tenancy, to claim compensation from the tenant for any injury done to the land by neglect, or undue cropping, or otherwise. He further proposed that if there was any disagreement as to the amount of compensation, the same should be settled and determined in conformity with the terms of the contract, or the custom of the country, by two arbitrators, one to be appointed by the landlord and one by the tenant, and if either party failed to appoint arbitrators, by the justices at petty sessions. He proposed, also, that the amount of compensation awarded should be either added to or deducted from the rent, as the case might be; or that the performance might be recovered in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record. It might be thought desirable, instead of using the term "custom of the country," to determine by the schedule of the bill what remuneration ought to be made; but he thought their lordships must see that it would be most difficult to frame any schedule which could be universally applied. As there were existing customs in various parts of the country possessing the force of law, there could be no difficulty on the part of the arbitrators in carrying out the custom of the country in different counties. He believed that the bill of Lord Brougham for simplifying leases would materially tend to promote the object he had in view.—Lord Beaumont remarked that it was found in committee that his noble friend's provisions were totally impracticable where desirable.—The bill was read a first time.

Friday.—The Earl of Aberdeen brought down a message from Her Majesty, which was read by the Lord Chancellor from the woolsack, amidst loud cheers, and was to the following effect: "That Her Majesty, being desirous of conferring a signal mark of favour and approbation on the Honourable Sir Henry Pottinger, K.C.B., for the eminent services rendered and particularly for the zeal and judgment displayed by him as Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in effecting a treaty of commerce with the Emperor of China, recommended to the House of Lords to concur in enabling Her Majesty to make provision for granting to the hon. baronet a pension of 1500*l.* per annum for the term of his natural life."—The Earl of Arbuthnot then gave notice, that on Monday next he should move that her Majesty's gracious message should be taken into consideration.—The Marquis of Normanby, in allusion to some observations which fell from the Bishop of Cashel during the debate on the second reading of the Maynooth Bill, with reference to the Rev. Mr. Mackessey, whom the right rev. Prelate accused of an overweening estimate of himself, stated that he held in his hand the testimonials which had been produced in favour of Mr. Mackessey's claim to the vacant benefice, in the diocese of Cashel, and that they gave him the highest character for the manner in which he discharged the duties of his sacred office for a period of a quarter of a century. He had also received a letter from the Reverend W. Hope, in which that gentleman stated his impression to be that a severe censure was passed by the right reverend Prelate on Mr. Mackessey, for being connected with the National Board of Education in Ireland.—The Bishop of Cashel denied that he had ever rebuked the Rev. Mr. Mackessey, for having connection with the National Board of Education, but he admitted that he had said that every clergyman in his diocese ought to have a school in his parish connected with the Church Education Society, for training up the youth in the way they should go. This he admitted having said, and if it were a crime he was quite ready to plead guilty, but that he used any severe language he utterly denied.—The Marquis of Normanby.—Did the right reverend prelate deny having rebuked Mr. Mackessey in the presence of the assembled clergy at the visitation at Lismore?—The Bishop of Cashel.—I do deny it.—After a few words from the Marquis of Westminster, and the Earl of St. Germains, the matter was dropped.—[Left sitting.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—Lord Ashley moved for leave to introduce two Bills for regulating the treatment of insane persons in England and Wales. By those two Bills he intended to repeal many existing acts, and to substitute such other enactments in their stead as time and circumstances had rendered necessary. He explained to the House the effect of the existing statutes respecting pauper lunatics, and showed that they might be divided into four classes—the first consisting of those acts which related to county asylums; the second, of those which related to licensed asylums, public asylums, and their visitation; the third, of those which related to persons found lunatic by inquisition; and the fourth, of those which related to criminal lunatics. Now, he did not intend to touch more than the two first of those classes. He meant to amend the several acts contained in the first class, and to amend and combine the acts contained in the second class, and to consolidate the whole into one act, entitled, "An Act for the Regulation of the Care and Treatment of Lunatics in England and Wales." After adverting to the lax and inefficient state of the law previous to the 14th of George III., he declared his intention of bringing under the consideration of the House the establishment of a permanent commission, who would have power to make more detailed and frequent visitation of hospitals or subscription asylums than existed at the present time, and who would require them to submit to the same orders and certificates as were now required in licensed houses, and to the same visitations as were now made into county asylums. He then described the additional securities which he intended to take against the improper detention of pauper patients, and to obtain returns respecting the mental and bodily condition of every patient when first admitted into these establishments. He also stated that his Bill would give the Chancellor power to protect the property of lunatics against whom a commission had not issued by a summary and inexpensive process, and would subject all workhouses in which lunatics were kept to regular visitation. His second Bill was called for by the facts which he produced in his statement of last year. To remedy this state of things he should extend the Act of the 9th George IV., c. 40, and make several changes in it. The principal of these changes were—that every county and borough which had no asylum, instead of being permitted, should be compelled to provide one either for itself or in union with some other county and borough; that in erecting new asylums regard should be had to the proportion of curable and of chronic lunatics: that separate buildings should be provided for each class; that parts of workhouses, with the consent of the Poor Law Commissioners, should be separated from the other part of the building, and should be deemed county asylums: that the time for the repayment of money borrowed for building such asylums should be extended from 14 to 30 years: and that the general rules for the government of such asylums should be submitted for approbation to the Secretary of State. He also proposed to enact that all recent cases of lunacy should be sent immediately to an asylum, and to provide for the apprehension of all lunatics, whether wandering or not, and for their reception into some asylum, whether their friends could pay for them or not. He also proposed that a quarterly inspection of all lunatics who were not in asylums should be made by a medical man, who should return lists of them, describing their condition, to the Commissioners in Lunacy. The noble lord then went into a lengthened statement respecting the deplorable state of the existing institutions for lunatics, especially of those for paupers, for the benefit of whom his Bill was chiefly meant, and concluded by calling on the House to co-operate with him in his philanthropic labour.—Sir J. Graham seconded the motion, and, after passing a glowing eulogium on Lord Ashley's indefatigable benevolence, declared that the measures which his noble friend sought to introduce had been carefully considered and approved of by Government. They had also come under the view of the Lord Chancellor, whose official duty it was more especially to attend to a subject of this kind, and had received his approbation. He did not say that some of the details of the Bill might not require alteration, but, generally speaking, the Government were parties to the measures, and intended to give them their most cordial support. Leave was given to bring in the Bills.—Mr. WYNN moved that the debate on the privilege question, which stood adjourned to Monday next, should be adjourned to Monday week, which was agreed to.

Monday.—Lord E. HILL took his seat for Dorsetshire.—Mr. WILLIAMS gave notice to move, on Monday next, for the correspondence between the Home Secretary and Mr. Twyford, the police magistrate, relative to Mr. Meyer's committal.—Mr. WAKLEY gave notice to move, on its next stage, the postponement of the Medical Bill.—Sir R. PEEL laid on the table the treaty concluded between her Majesty and the King of the French for the suppression of the slave-trade; and in reply to questions from Lord PALMERSTON, declined to produce the evidence of the officers upon which the treaty was based, on the ground that it would reveal the devices of the slave-traders and the means used for counteracting them. The right hon. baronet then fixed Friday week for discussing the postponed articles (butter and cheese) of the tariff.—In reply to Mr. S. WORTLEY, Sir R. PEEL stated that no negotiation of any kind is now pending between this country and Portugal.—The House went into committee on the Banking (Scotland) Bill, and the remaining clauses and the schedules were agreed to.—On the motion to go into committee on the Banking (Ireland) Bill, Mr. Ross and Col. CONOLLY complained of the restriction which would be put on the circulation in Ireland by the mode of taking the average adopted by this measure; and called on Government to make some modifications in its details.—Sir R. PEEL wished that he could impress on the minds of Irish members, who seemed to believe that capital consisted in an excessive issue of paper, the conviction that no country in the world would derive greater benefit than Ireland from an improved system of banking. No country had suffered so much from a bad system as Ireland had. He knew from his own experience that the most heart-rending and wide-spreading distress had arisen in the west and south of Ireland from the simultaneous breaking of the banks in those districts some 20 or 30 years ago. It was, therefore, necessary to found the currency on the certain and immediate convertibility of its paper into gold. Even its joint-stock banks —which were more recent institutions—had not been well conducted. For instance, the Agricultural Bank, by the innumerable branches which it had established, and by the excessive issue of its paper, had affected every local bank in that country. There was one joint-stock bank in Ireland, which had been most admirably conducted. That was the Provincial Bank; and yet that bank had been most injuriously affected by the Agricultural Bank—for it had been obliged to be always ready with a considerable quantity of gold for a run. In 1837 the Provincial Bank had in its coffers a quantity of gold greater than its issues. All that gold came from the Bank of England, and was principally supplied from London and the branches of Liverpool and Bristol. He showed that at that time the banks of Ireland were compelled by the conduct of the Agricultural Bank to provide themselves with two millions of gold, merely for the sake of protecting their own credit. He was going to relieve by this Bill those banks from the constant necessity of being provided with that immense amount, not to guard against their own incaution, but against the incaution of others, and from the dreadful suspense and anxiety in which all banking concerns in Ireland had hitherto been involved. He then proceeded to defend the details of the Bill, and to point out the advantages which it would confer upon Ireland by abolishing the exclusive privileges of the Bank of Ireland, and by opening to all the other banks the power of competing within the hitherto restricted limits. All that he asked was, that if there was in Ireland that increasing prosperity which required an increasing circulation, they would provide for the security of it by assigning some portion of the banking assets to the provision of a certain portion of specie.—Mr. E. B. ROCHE observed, that though he was not going to throw any impediment in the way of this Bill going into committee, he could not refrain from stating his opinion that there was no necessity for the interference of Government with this subject, and that Sir R. Peel had made out no case for it.—Mr. RADINGTON complained of the manner in which this Bill took the average of the circulation of Ireland, and contended that it must operate injuriously upon that country.—After remarks from Sir R. FERGUSON, Lord CLEMENTS, Mr. S. CRAWFORD, and Mr. WYSE, the House went into committee.—On the 1st clause, Sir W. SOMERVILLE moved an amendment to the effect that the Hibernian Joint Stock Banking Company and the Royal Bank of Dublin should be exempted from the operation of the Bill.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER refused to make any exemption from the general principle of the measure, in favour of these banks. The committee divided—For the amendment, 43; against it, 103; majority, 60. The Bill passed through committee with some trifling amendments.—The Serjeant-at-Arms acquainted the House that in the case of Howard v. Gossett, in which judgment had been pronounced against him, an execution was on Saturday levied, including costs, for the sum of 436*l.* 12*s.*—On the motion of Sir R. PEEL the communication was referred to the select committee.

Tuesday.—Lord PALMERSTON gave notice for the 5th July, to move for extracts of the evidence given by the French and English commanders relative to the Slave-trade.—Mr. H. BERKELEY gave notice for the 1st July to move for a committee to consider the propriety of addressing her Majesty to confer some further compensation on the officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines, engaged in the late operations in China.—Mr. VILLIERS, in a speech of two hours' duration and upwards, proposed that the House should go into committee to consider three resolutions, to the effect that the existing laws enhanced the price of food to all classes, and that therefore they should be at once abolished. The farmer—who had been declared on high agricultural authority to be a man of very contracted views—had been deluded into the support of these laws by the fiction that price meant profit. He had therefore given his vote in support of those gentlemen who told him that high prices meant high profits, and against those who told him that if he trusted in such a fiction he would find himself wofully disappointed. He wished to call the attention of the farmer to this question—who were his friends and who were not? He wanted the members of the Agricultural Protection Society, and more particularly Mr. S. O'Brien, who had its resources at his command, to explain how it was that the farmer was in his present distressed condition, considering the protection which had been so long afforded him, and how it happened that the farmer differed from any other capitalist. He thought that Mr. O'Brien was precluded on this occasion from saying two things at least —first, that it was owing to the recent measures of Government that the farmer was in distress, for he had been subject to similar distress at different periods during the last 35 years; and, secondly, that the landlord and the farmer were swimming in the same boat together, for the landlords were in general well off, and had not made any reduction in their usual luxuries and establishments. A very intelligent farmer had told him that the agricultural body would be well satisfied if he could draw from any member of the Protection Society an explanation of what was the matter with the farmers, and why they were so often indisposed. He then proceeded to ridicule the language used by speakers at agricultural meetings in different parts of the country, and to show that such meetings were now dividing themselves into two classes—one consisting of landlords claiming from the Government further legislative protection, and the other of farmers claiming from their landlords something very different from legislative protection. Great improvements in our system of agriculture were said to be required, but it unfortunately happened that before they could be made, the landlords required further protection from the Government, and the tenants further consideration from their landlords, and neither the Government nor the landlords would grant what was required of them. Those who were anxious to provide a further supply of food for the population were told to wait, and therefore they were obliged to inquire whether the improvements for which they were to wait had any chance of being accomplished. He entered into a long argument to show, that so long as the present system continued there was not the slightest chance of those improvements being accomplished. There was no likelihood of providing from domestic sources that adequate supply of food which the population required. What, then, was the reason that precluded us from providing it from foreign sources? Those who were interested in the maintenance of the Corn-laws had been guilty of a premeditated attempt to deceive the people on this subject, by stating in sundry publications that this foreign supply would make food cheap, and that if food were made cheap, it would reduce the wages of the people and injure them accordingly. He hoped that those who cheered that statement would come forward that evening and refute the speech of Sir J. Graham, who had triumphantly shown on a recent occasion that the poor were better off, and that pauperism and crime had materially diminished, owing to the recent decrease of prices. The fact was, that when you rendered the price of food high, you threw two-thirds of the labouring population of Great Britain out of employment. A scarcity was said to be a curse inflicted on a country by God; but ought we, when we create a scarcity by our faulty and imperfect legislation, to attribute it to the operations of Providence, who has "filled the earth with good things?" The existing Corn-laws and the Canadian Corn Bill had not been passed to increase the supply of food for the people, but for special reasons, and they had nothing to do with the present agricultural distress. Sir J. Graham had told the House that there was an annual increase of 380,000 souls in the population of Great Britain every year, and had admitted that some relaxation must be made in the Corn-laws in proportion to the future increase of the population. Sir J. Graham now said that he did not make that admission with that view. Be it so. Then he (Mr. Villiers) would say, that it was not the annual increase in our population, but the enormous amount of destitution and distress in the country —evinced by the fact mentioned by Sir J. Graham, that we had 1,500,000 paupers last year—which required the alteration he proposed in the Corn-laws. He showed that, if an unfavourable harvest or a period of scarcity should recur, there were circumstances which would make the pressure of them more severely felt by the country than it had ever been formerly, inasmuch as the standard of living had been much exalted both at home and abroad, and as many countries, France and Belgium for instance, which had been exporters, were now importers of corn. Besides, their legislation had discouraged agriculture in every country in Europe, and there was not a grain of corn grown upon the Continent at present with a view to the English market. Moreover, the recent alteration in our banking system would render the revulsion more severe on the manufacturing interest, whenever it should become necessary to export bullion; and whenever they were first compelled to send for corn, they must send bullion, or else submit to a most ruinous fall of prices in their manufactures. He was at a loss to know what plea would be urged by Government in reply to his demand, on behalf of the people, for free access to the means of subsistence. If Government should either plead the pressure of local taxation, or the peculiar burdens on land, he would reply, "Bring us in at once an account of what is paid on those scores, and we will show that it is far less than the loss which the people sustain every year, owing to the restrictions on their supply of food." He called upon Government to indemnify the landlords in any way they pleased except that of making the food of the people dear.—Mr. OSWALD seconded the motion.—Mr. CHRISTOPHER opposed it, on the grounds that the principle of protection had been fully discussed during the last 20 years, and had recently been modified in an enlarged and liberal spirit: and likewise, under the existing Corn-law, all kinds of agricultural produce at this moment was afforded to the consumer at a reasonable price.—Mr. MITCHELL and Mr. M. PHILIPS spoke in favour of the motion, and Mr. BUCK against it.—Sir J. GRAHAM said, that notwithstanding the sneers to which he had been exposed for the speech he had lately made, he would again declare, that the prosperity of agriculture must depend on the prosperity of the other branches of native industry, and that this prosperity would be most effectually promoted by giving an uninterrupted course to the natural flow of native industry. He would not deny that it was his opinion, that by a gradual and cautious policy, it was expedient to bring our system of Corn-laws into a nearer approximation to those wholesome principles which governed our legislation with respect to other industrial departments. It was, however, his conviction that suddenly and at once to throw open the trade in corn would be inconsistent with the well-being of the community, and would give such a shock to the agricultural interest as would throw many other interests into a state of convulsion. The object of every Government, without distinction of party, for the last 20 years, had been to substitute protecting for prohibitory duties, and to reduce gradually protecting duties where it had them to deal with. He approved this as a safe principle, and showed that it was the key-stone of the policy of Sir R. Peel. Mr. Villiers had stated that the Corn-law of 1842 had not been introduced with any view of diminishing the protection attached to the agricultural interest; but he read an extract from the speech of Sir R. Peel in proposing it, to prove that he proposed it explicitly as a decrease of the protection which the home-grower previously had. Mr. Villiers had talked of the delusions practised on the farmers; but he reminded Mr. Villiers that there could be no greater delusion than to hold out to the people that they would on the long run gain any considerable advantage in the price of food from the repeal of the Corn-laws. He also combated the doctrine of Mr. Villiers, that under a system of protection no improvement had taken place, or could possibly take place, in the agriculture of the country. He showed that England, with a population double that which it possessed 50 years ago, now provided food for it with greater ease than it did formerly for half the number. If Mr. Villiers could show him that free trade with open ports would produce a more abundant supply to the labourer, he would make him a convert to the doctrine of free trade in corn. He confessed that he placed no value on the fixed duty of 4*s.* proposed by Lord J. Russell; it would be of no avail as a protection, whilst it would be liable to all the obloquy of a protecting duty; and he therefore agreed with Mr. Mitchell, that if we got rid of the present Corn-law, we had better assent to a total repeal. He thought that the probable quantity of corn received with open ports was greatly underrated, and argued from statistics that it would displace one-eighth of the produce of Ireland, and in England the clay land, which was most costly in cultivation. The displacement of the labour expended on that land would in itself be very disastrous; but it was also the oldest land in cultivation; it had been cultivated for Wheat, and it was therefore liable to a very heavy annual charge for tithe. If it were converted into pasture, its value would be very inferior, and the tithe imposed upon it would be more than its rental. He proceeded to demonstrate at considerable length other injurious consequences which would result from the sudden change proposed by Mr. Villiers. It would produce not only great panic among the agricultural interest, but also a great diminution in the demand for agricultural labour. If 500,000 or 800,000 labourers should be thrown out of employment by it, all the machine of Government would be so thrown out of order, crime and pauperism would increase to such an extent from destitution and distress, that the shock must be of a most convulsive character. He concluded by giving his decided negative to this motion.—Mr. BRIGHT was at a loss to discover whether the speech which Sir J. Graham had just delivered was intended to give more hope to the Opposition, or more consolation to the Ministerial side of the House. Sir James had evidently been endeavouring to say one thing in one part of his speech, and to unsay it in the next. In the commencement he had been a furious free-trader—in the close he had brought forward in a mass all the fallacies of the Protection Society. It was time that this imposture should cease; for so long as it prevailed, the country would be involved in a perpetual agitation. The question of the repeal of the Corn-laws was now only one of time. He would score off every part of Sir J. Graham's speech after that sentence of it which contained the annunciation that free-trade was the keystone of Sir R. Peel's policy. Let the county members reflect upon that, and let them remember that if Sir R. Peel gave the word for the repeal of the Corn-laws, they had no power to prevent it. He then gave a history and eulogised the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-law League, the annual contributions to which had increased from 5000*l.* in the year of its birth to 110,000*l.* in the present year. He knew that when they went to a division they would be in a minority, but minorities in that House had often become majorities; and he did not despair of seeing that result produced again, knowing, as he did, that the Corn-law created nothing, and blighted everything.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN observed, that although Mr. Villiers had challenged him to rise and defend the publications of the Protection Society, he was too old a fish to rise at that fly. He merely rose to show that he was not unwilling to do justice to the great taste and skill displayed by the manufacturing classes in the arrangements of the bazaar recently opened in Covent-garden. The agricultural legislation of Her Majesty's Government was not sufficiently popular with the farmers to induce a county member to stand up in its defence. The last person, however, whom the county members could blame for it was Sir R. Peel, whom they had placed and still kept in office.—Dr. BOWRING supported the motion, as did Mr. CAVENDISH and Lord EBRINGTON, who briefly explained the reasons which induced them to abandon their former opposition to it.—Mr. COBDEN proceeded to prove that the present system of Corn-laws was not only injurious to the community at large, but also to every portion of it. He denounced it as rash and perilous, inasmuch as it had left us with no more than 200,000 quarters of corn in bond at a period when Europe was drained of corn, and we had the prospect of a backward, not to say a failing harvest. If those laws were repealed at once, he believed that rents and mortgages would be better paid than they were at present, and that fresh land would be taken into cultivation, instead of old land being thrown out of it.—Mr. G. BANKES defended the existing Corn-laws, and exposed what he called the historical errors into which Mr. Cobden and Mr. Villiers had fallen. They had declared that for the last 30 years the state of the labourers had been growing worse and worse. To that declaration he replied, that for that period exactly protection to agriculture had been growing less and less. He also showed that the fluctuations in the price of corn in England had been still greater when the trade was free than they ever had been under a restricted system. He attributed the burdens which now pressed upon the landed interest to the expenses of the wars which William the Third had carried on to increase the glory and to promote the commerce of England; and considered it very unfair in the manufacturers to seek to take away from the landed proprietors that protection which they had now enjoyed for many years.—Lord J. RUSSELL indulged in several pleasantries upon the speech of Mr. Bankes, but commented with some severity on his admission that the condition of the labourers of Dorsetshire was still most deplorable, and deserving the commiseration of the House. He then pointed out the inconsistencies of which Sir J. Graham had been guilty in his speech of that evening. Sir James had told them that industry ought to have its own course—that what was true of manufacturing was also true of agricultural industry—and that protection was injurious to the landowner. He had therefore expected that Sir J. Graham if he did not go along with him in his proposition for a moderate fixed duty, or with Mr. Villiers for a total repeal of the Corn-laws, would at any rate propose some scheme by which the existing protection would be diminished, and by which some advances might be made in that approach to free trade which all parties deemed so desirable. There was nothing in Sir J. Graham's past conduct to render such a supposition unnatural, or such an alteration of his policy impracticable. From that point however he suddenly started off, and used against the motion all the arguments which had ever been urged in behalf of Corn-law protection. With regard to the motion of Mr. Villiers he had only to observe that his first two resolutions were in accordance with those which he (Lord J. Russell), had proposed a few nights ago; and as his hon. Friend proposed to consider in committee his third resolution—"that it is expedient that all restrictions on corn should be abolished," he (Lord J. Russell), felt himself at liberty to go into committee with him, and to consider in what way a relaxation of the Corn-law should be made. The Corn-law, as it now stood, was vicious in principle, and could not be long maintained in its present condition. He saw its fall indicated not only by the vigour of the attacks made upon it, but also by the feebleness of the defence offered for it; and he therefore warned the country gentlemen to pause before they allowed an impression to be made to their disadvantage in the minds of their fellow-countrymen, by the constant repetition of the remark that it was only kept up to enable them to keep up their rents.—Sir R. PEEL, after some remarks upon Lord J. Russell's intended vote, proceeded to observe that experience proved that the high price of corn was not accompanied with a high rate of wages; for the rate of wages did not vary according to the price of corn. If he could believe in the predictions of Mr. Cobden, his objection to an immediate repeal of the Corn-law would be greatly alleviated; but he could not and therefore he must proceed in pursuance of his own policy to reconcile the gradual approach of our legislation to sound principle on this subject with the interests which had grown up under a different state of things. He then proceeded to defend the existing Corn-law and tariff, and to maintain that under their operation there had been a great revival of domestic industry and foreign commerce. He did not think that the existing Corn-law was liable to the objections urged against it. He did not think that the predictions of its failure had been verified, and therefore he was unwilling to accept the proposition of Mr. Villiers. He did not defend the Corn-law on the ground that it was a protection to any particular interest. He admitted that it would be impossible to maintain any law on the ground that it was intended to keep up rents: but looking to the obligations of the landlords, he thought that any such change as that which Mr. Villiers suggested, would, if suddenly produced, tell injuriously on them, and still more injuriously on the large and numerous class of the cultivators of the soil, and others connected with them.—Lord HOWICK called attention to the fact that not one word had been said that evening by Government in contradiction to the first two resolutions of Mr. Villiers condemnatory of the principles and policy of the present Corn Law. If the last resolution had been thus worded, "that is expedient that all restrictions on corn should be gradually abolished," the speech of Sir R. Peel would have been an admirable one in support of it.—After a brief reply from Mr. VILLIERS, the House divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 122; against it, 254: majority against it, 132.—The report of the Banking (Scotland) Bill was received.

Wednesday.—A great many railway and private Bills were forwarded. On the motion of Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, the Arrestment of Wages (Scotland) Bill was read a first time.—Mr. LAW postponed, until the third reading of the Irish Colleges Bill, his proposed amendment on that measure. His object was to pledge the House to reject any educational measure which did not involve provision for religious education. The Statute Labour (Scotland) Bill passed through committee. Mr. LIDDELL moved the second reading of the Dog Stealing Bill.—Mr. HUME moved its second reading that day six months.—Sir J.

Graham supported the second reading, though not prepared to agree to all the details of the Bill.—Major Beresford, Capt. Berkeley, and Mr. Aglionby supported the Bill; Mr. Warburton, Mr. Watson, Mr. Ricardo, Mr. B. Escott, Sir G. Strickland, Mr. Hawes, and Mr. Bright opposed it; the latter contending that if dogs deserved the protection of an Act of Parliament, cats ought also to have a similar privilege. After some further discussion and a division, the second reading was carried by 67 against 23.—Sir J. Y. Buller moved the second reading of the County Rates Bill.—Mr. M. Gibson objected to amateur legislation on such a subject. He thought Government ought to have taken up the question.—Sir J. Graham complained that whereas Lord J. Russell lately reproached Government with discouraging legislation by private Members of Parliament, Mr. Gibson now reproached Government with undertaking this question out of Sir J. Y. Buller's hand. The Home Secretary said this was a measure which would benefit the counties to a considerable extent, and therefore he was favourable to its principle; at the same time he felt bound to observe that the whole subject of local taxation should, ere long, be taken into consideration by Government. The Bill was read a second time.—The House went into committee on Mr. Mackinnon's Smoke Prohibition Bill, and, upon the first clause, was very soon counted out.

Thursday.—On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Banking (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion for the second reading of the Poor-law Amendment (Scotland) Bill, Mr. Rutherford objected at great length to many of the details and to some of the principles of the Bill, and pointed out several alterations which he desired to see made in it. His object, he said, was not to defeat the Bill, but to have it referred to a select committee, in order to insure to it, when it passed into a law, due and deliberate consideration.—The Lord Advocate said he would be quite willing to consider most attentively the objections and suggestions made by Mr. Rutherford whenever the Bill should go into committee. He entertained a confident hope that the Bill would be productive of great advantage to the people of Scotland, and that there would be no difficulty when it was passing through the committee to adopt its clauses to such modifications as might be suggested, so that it might completely accomplish the purpose for which it was intended.—Mr. Hume believed the motion to be so surrounded by difficulties that it had better be postponed to next session. Mr. Colquhoun thought it might be so amended in committee as to effect some of the ameliorations that all parties had in view.—Mr. S. Crawford, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Col. Wood, Mr. E. Ellice, Mr. Scott, and Mr. P. M. Stewart, criticised the machinery and enactments of the Bill.—In reply to Mr. S. Crawford, Mr. Loch entered into a statement of particulars respecting the management of the Sutherland property in the north of Scotland. The statements lately published by the Times were grossly exaggerated as to the "clearing" of Glen Calvie. Two years ago the tenants had agreed to quit, the stock was to be taken at a valuation, and the land was let. At the expiry of the period of notice they had refused to quit, in violation of their own contract, and measures were taken to compel them. The hon. member also went into copious details, in order to show that the new system adopted in Sutherland since 1815 had been attended with the largest benefit to the tenantry themselves; that they had been transformed from miserable paupers into an active and industrious population, largely exporting herrings and other articles of produce, and enjoying comforts previously unknown.—Sir J. Graham argued that if the Bill was really defective in point of principle, it was the duty of the House to reject it on the second reading. But after the extensive inquiry which had been made into the Poor law system by the commission appointed for that purpose, and whose report was so long before them, any farther postponement of legislation, on pretence of additional inquiry, would be a mockery. The Poor-law of Scotland was excellent in itself, and defective only from mal-administration, to remedy which the present Bill was introduced, and the provisions of which he defended in detail, and in the introduction of which he affirmed that the Government had exercised the greatest care and caution. All objections would receive mature consideration when the Bill was discussed in a committee of the whole House.—Mr. Fox Maule concurred in the proposition that the Bill should be referred to a select committee, not to inquire into facts, but to shape the Bill so as to secure for it the confidence of the people of Scotland. As a landlord he might have no objection to the passing of the Bill: but taking a more liberal view, he feared that in Scotland it would be regarded as a measure by which the interests of the poor were to be sacrificed to those of the rich. No injury would arise to the postponement of the Bill for another session, as time would be afforded for rendering its details less objectionable to the class for whom it was supposed more particularly to be framed.—Mr. P. Borthwick, Mr. Edward Ellice, sen., Mr. Miles, Mr. Aglionby, and Mr. Collett, took part in the discussion; after which the Bill was read a second time.—Mr. Fox Maule then moved, as an amendment, the reference of the Bill to a select committee, not with a view to delay the progress of the measure, but in order to bring it under the supervision of those members most competent to deal with it.—After some remarks from Mr. Cumming Bruce, Mr. Hume urged, after the promise of Sir J. Graham, that all objections would be well considered, that the amendment for reference to a select committee should not be persevered in.—Sir J. Graham joined in the recommendation, and said that he would fix the committee on the Bill for Monday week, and mean time all objections would be taken into deliberate consideration.—On this assurance Mr. Fox Maule withdrew his amendment, and after remarks from some other members, the subject dropped, and the Bill was ordered to be committed on Monday week.—The report on the Irish Banking Bill was received; after which various amendments raised considerable discussion. A clause proposed by Mr. Redington, for taking off the restriction on the Bank of Ireland of lending money on the mortgage of landed property, was rejected by 51 to 12.—Mr. Smith O'Brien, who appeared in the House for the first time this session, next moved the recommittal of the Bill, but the motion appearing to be informal, he moved the adjournment of the House for a fortnight. This motion, after a brief discussion, was negatived without a division, and the report of the Bill was received.

Friday.—After a great deal of Railway business had been transacted, the Lunatics Bill was on the motion of Lord Ashley read a first time and ordered to be printed.—Sir R. Peel brought up a message from her Majesty, stating that her Majesty recommended the House of Commons to enable her to reward Sir H. Pottinger for his services in China, by making a provision for him to the extent of 1500*l.* per annum for the term of his natural life.—The Right Hon. Baronet then gave notice that on Monday next he would move that her Majesty's most gracious message should be taken into consideration.—Dr. Bowring inquired whether the Government had received any official accounts of the destruction of persons and property in Syria, and whether any measures had been taken to put a stop to these outrages.—Sir R. Peel said that very alarming accounts had been received from Syria, but her Majesty's representatives had done all in their power to arrest the progress of the outrages in that quarter. A meeting took place at the house of Sir S. Canning, and representations were in consequence made, not separately, but collectively, by the Ministers of France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, urging on the Porte the necessity of resorting to more effectual measures to repress those outrages. The latest accounts received were to the 20th May, at which period general hostilities had ceased, and he hoped the collective representations of the Ministers had produced their intended effect. In reply to Mr. Labouchere, Sir R. Peel said, the Spanish Government had made application to the Government of England to admit the sugar grown in the Spanish Colonies on the most favourable terms, according to the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht, which was of very long standing. The answer had not yet been given, but when it should be, he would not object to lay the papers on the table.—Mr. Forster asked whether there are any documents in possession of Government confirmatory of the participation, direct or indirect, of British subjects in the slave-trade, charged in Mr. Tyler's message to Congress, dated the 19th February, 1845; and if so, whether there is any objection to the production of such documents? Also, whether Government can furnish to the House the names and description of any of those vessels alleged by Mr. Tyler to have been loaded with goods for the slave-trade, by or on behalf of any British capitalist, merchant, or manufacturer in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.—Sir R. Peel was not prepared to deny the facts stated by the President, but if the facts were so, the parties were liable to legal proceedings. The information upon the subject in the possession of the Government was equally open to the hon. gentleman. If the facts could be brought home to the parties, and if the law could reach them, Government would feel it to be its duty to put it in motion.—Mr. M. Gibson said he was authorised by the parties alluded to to give the most unqualified denial to the statement.—In reply to Mr. Roebuck, Sir J. Graham said that circumstances had occurred respecting the administration of Justice in the Channel Islands, which had induced him to write to the Lord President of the Privy Council, with a view to having an inquiry into the whole subject.—In reply to Lord J. Russell, the Solicitor-General said that the Report of the Committee of Privilege (Howard v. Gossett) could not be ready on Monday owing to the illness of the chairman (Mr. C. W. Wynn), and he would therefore postpone the adjourned debate which stood for Monday, until Thursday fortnight.—Sir J. Graham moved the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a committee of the whole House on the Colleges (Ireland) Bill. His object was to move the insertion of the money clauses.—Sir R. Inglis said his opposition to the Bill was unchanged, but he would not divide the House upon the present occasion.—Mr. W. S. O'Brien then proceeded to state to the House the opinions of the people of Ireland upon the measure. [Left speaking.]

Metropolis and its Vicinity.

A New Comet.—On Monday Sir James South communicated to the Times the following letter, announcing that a magnificent comet is now visible in the metropolis. "Last evening, at a few minutes after 11 o'clock, Mr. Joshua Jeays, of Green-street, Marlborough-road, Chelsea, called here to inform me that he had discovered a comet. With my 5-feet equatorial I observed, at 31 minutes after 11 o'clock, its approximate right ascension about 5 hours 18 minutes, and its north declination about 45 degrees 21 minutes. It is one of the brightest comets which we have had since that which appeared in the autumn of 1825. It is very near the bright star Capella, but no one looking within 40 or 50 degrees of it can help seeing it. At 10 o'clock it is a few degrees west of north, and at midnight is due north, having an altitude of about 8 degrees.—J. South."

The Condemned Sermon at Newgate.—The Rev. W. Russell, Inspector of Prisons, has made his report to Sir J. Graham on the circumstances attending the recent execution of Hocker and the delivery of the condemned sermon in the chapel of Newgate. He states that the chaplain delivered a written sermon, and had since submitted it to Mr. Russell's inspection. That the chaplain states most positively that he did not address the prisoner Connor. He alluded to his case in the course of the sermon, but not in the manner which had been stated in the public papers. On this occasion either 49 or 50 visitors were present, of whom six or seven were ladies. The visitors were admitted by orders signed by one of the sheriffs, by one of the under-sheriffs on behalf of the other sheriff, by the other under-sheriff, by one of the visiting magistrates for the month, by an alderman, and by the governor and ordinary, under the sanction of one of the sheriffs. The governor states most distinctly that, with the exception of the prison and police authorities already mentioned, and their official attendants, and the reporters for the public press, no visitor whatever was admitted into the interior of the prison to witness the execution of Hocker. Mr. Russell, after stating some other details, submits the conclusions which his inquiries have led him to form. He states his opinion that the practice of admitting visitors at the condemned sermon is highly injurious to the visitors, to the fellow-prisoners of the culprit, and to the public, who have a morbid taste for the reports of such scenes. Indeed, he states his opinion that, "under no circumstances, is a condemned sermon productive of good effects, and he fears that its tendency is ever injurious. But, if it be thought proper to continue it, it is most desirable, on every account, that it should be as private as possible, and that none but the prisoners and the proper authorities should be present at it." Mr. Russell also strongly objects to the practice of seeking for confessions from condemned criminals, because "the very fact of its being so sought for implies a doubt of the completeness of the case, and of the justice of the verdict and of the sentence; and public confidence in the verdict, which ought to be final and satisfactory, is thereby shaken." Mr. Russell also objects to the admission of reporters from the public press at the execution. He says that "the presence of the sheriffs, the under-sheriffs, the governor, the ordinary, and the subordinate officers of the prison, is an amply-sufficient guarantee to the public that the necessary proceeding of pinioning and otherwise preparing the prisoner for the scaffold will be conducted with all due consideration for the culprit, and without the infliction of any unnecessary suffering or delay. I am therefore of opinion, that on the occasion of an execution, as well as that of a condemned sermon, all persons except the authorities of the prison and of the police should be strictly excluded."

The Rev. Mr. Oakeley's Case.—The suit in the Arches Court, instituted by the Bishop of London against Mr. Oakeley, came before Sir H. Jenner Fust, on Tuesday. Previous to the hearing, Mr. Oakeley had addressed the following letter to the bishop:—

"My Lord,—The circumstances of the last few months have forced upon me a painful but overpowering impression of the difficulties which actually beset my position and my path as a clergyman ministering in the Church of England. And many of these difficulties are of a kind which even the termination in my favour of the suit which your Lordship has caused to be instituted against me in the Court of Arches would not serve to remove. After giving, then, to the subject the full and mature deliberation which its importance demands, I have determined that I am not justified in conscience in being a party to the continuance of that suit, which, as I understand from those best qualified to instruct me, is not likely, from the shape which it takes, to issue in any formal settlement of the question upon which, both in public and in private, I had expressed myself to your Lordship anxious for an authoritative judgment; and the actual indeterminateness of which is sufficiently attested by the fact of your Lordship having made my published letter to you the ground of a legal inquiry. The prosecution of the cause, under these circumstances, could be productive of no advantage to the Church of England sufficient to counterbalance the mischief of the excitement attending it. I have accordingly taken upon myself, though in opposition to the judgment of my legal adviser, the responsibility of declining, in the actual state of the case, to defend myself in the Court of Arches. And I feel it the necessary consequence of this resolution to tender to your Lordship the resignation of my licence as minister of Margaret Chapel, with the view of putting an end, both for your Lordship and for myself, to those embarrassments which have arisen out of my connexion with your Lordship's diocese. I have, &c., Frederick Oakeley."

In answer to this letter, the Bishop intimated to Mr. Oakeley, through his proctor, that he intended to persevere in the suit instituted in the Court of Arches, and declined, in consequence, to receive the tendered resignation of Mr. Oakeley's licence. The case accordingly came on for hearing on Tuesday, when the Queen's Advocate and Dr. Bayford opened the case on behalf of the Bishop of London, stating at great length the facts of the case as deduced from Mr. Oakeley's well-known letter to the Bishop in reference to the case of his friend, Mr. Ward. No counsel appeared on behalf of Mr. Oakeley. After a very long argument, showing that Mr. Oakeley assented to all the doctrines of the church of Rome, the Queen's Advocate referred to the ordination service, in which Mr. Oakeley had taken vows, one of which was, that he will "banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrines," and then adverted to the attempts made by Roman Catholic writers to reconcile the doctrines of the church of England with those of Rome; in particular, that of Dupin, in a communication with Archbishop Wake, but which entirely failed, owing to the inconsistency of one with the other. He then cited the testimonies of all the Archbishops of Canterbury (with the exception of two, Juxon and Sheldon), for 200 years, to the utter repugnance of the doctrines of the English church to those of Rome; and concluded by observing that the opinions promulgated by Mr. Oakeley, if adopted, would take away from the Church of England the means of justifying herself for her separation from the Church of Rome. Sir H. Jenner Fust said, he must take time to consider his judgment. The learned judge again expressed his regret that he had to determine this case without the benefit of an argument on behalf of a party proceeded against, which was the more to be lamented as there were questions of form in this case. The articles against Mr. Oakeley were general; and if the act of Elizabeth (13 Elizabeth c. 12) were relied upon, he should have to call upon Mr. Oakeley, in the first instance, to revoke his error. After some cases were referred to (including that of Whiston) respecting the form of proceeding, the Court said, the question did not turn upon the quo animo Mr. Oakeley had subscribed the articles, but merely whether the doctrines he had published were or were not repugnant to those of the Church of England; and this question would necessarily require deliberate consideration before pronouncing judgment.

The Case of Mr. Ward.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Tuesday, the case of Mr. Ward was brought under consideration, Mr. Ward having previously obtained a rule calling upon the University authorities to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them to restore Mr. Ward to his academical degrees, from which he has been removed under circumstances which are so well known to the public. The Solicitor-General, who had been retained to show cause against the rule, observed that, as it seemed very unlikely that the Court would decide the case ultimately upon affidavits, it had been considered more desirable by the counsel on the part of the University that the writ should issue, in order that the whole facts of the case might be stated upon the return, and that materials might be thus furnished for arguing the case in the most solemn manner. Lord Denman assented to this arrangement, and the rule for the mandamus was, therefore, made absolute.

Miss Linwood's Exhibition is advertised for sale by private contract, by Messrs. Christie and Manson. The will of this lady has been proved by her nephews, Messrs. Markland, two of the executors. Her personal property within the province of Canterbury is sworn under 10,000*l*. By the will the picture of "Salvator Mundi" is left to the reigning Sovereign as an heir loom; and should her pictures not be purchased as a collection, she gives to her brother William any four pictures that he may select. The will directs that the whole of her property of every description may be sold either by auction or private contract, wholly or in lots; the produce arising therefrom, with all other residue of her estate and effects, to be divided into 17 parts, and distributed among her nephews and nieces.

Museum of Economic Geology.—The institution at Craig's-court, Charing-cross, has been so successful that the specimens and models have far outgrown the means for their accommodation. The Government have, therefore, secured a piece of ground between Jermyn-street and Piccadilly, on which an adequate building for the museum and the repository of mining records is to be erected.

Sale of the Autograph of Shakspere.—On Saturday a sale by auction took place in Mr. Fletcher's rooms in Piccadilly, of numerous autographs; amongst them was one attributed to Shakspere. The auctioner stated that the book containing the autograph belonged to a gentleman named Taylor, who had it in his library from 1823 till November 1843, when it was abstracted by some unknown person. About three months ago a gentleman bought the book for 1*s*. at a stall, when for the first time the signature of "William Shakspere" was observed upon it; two lines were written above the name, but their purport could not be discovered. The book, after some competition, was knocked down to Mr. Pickering, of Piccadilly, for 21 guineas.

The Arctic Expedition.—H.M.'s steam-sloop Rattler, Commander Smith, arrived at Sheerness on Monday, from the Orkney Islands, after having towed the Erebus, Capt. Sir John Franklin, and the Terror, Capt. Crozier, to Cape Wrath, and thence to the islands Barra and Rona, situated 60 miles north-west of the Orkneys, where the ships composing the Arctic expedition took their final departure about noon on the 4th inst., under the auspices of as favourable a wind as could be well desired.

Metropolitan Improvements.—The Commissioners of Metropolitan Improvements have just presented their report to Her Majesty, in which, after detailing the progress made in the new streets at the east end of the town, they recommend immediate measures for the formation of a new street from Spitalfields Church to the station of the Eastern Counties Railway in Shoreditch; and also that at the earliest possible period, this important line of communication be extended to Old-street and the City-road. The estimated net cost of the first-mentioned of these improvements is 40,209*l*., and of the second, 112,000*l*.

The Bank of England, &c.—A return of the weight of light gold coin purchased by the Bank of England in each month from the 1st January, 1844, to the 1st May, 1845, was ordered to be printed by the House of Commons a few nights since, on the motion of Mr. Williams, the member for Coventry. It hence appears that the total weight of the light gold coin so purchased during the above period amounted to 777,449 oz. 11 dwts. 3 grs., the value of which, at the rate of 3*l*. 17*s*. 6½*d*. per oz., amounted to the sum total of 3,014,236*l*. 14*s*. 4*d*. There were purchased in January, 1844, 151,560 oz., value 587,614*l*.; in February, 166,831 oz., value 646,818*l*.; in March, 77,974 oz., value 302,311*l*.; in April, 48,477 oz., value 187,953*l*.; in May, 56,983 oz., value 220,927*l*.; in June, 28,121 oz., value 109,028*l*.; in July, 56,670 oz., value 219,715*l*.; in August, 34,471 oz., value 133,647*l*.; in September, 26,983 oz., value 104,617*l*.; in October, 13,214 oz., value 51,232*l*.; in November, 17,678 oz., value 68.539*l*.; and in December, 36,434 oz., value 141,259*l*. The operations of the Bank during the present year have hitherto consisted of the following purchases, viz.—in January, 19,646 oz., at a value of 76,170*l*; in February, 10,431 oz., at a value of 40,433*l*.; in March, 21,684 oz., at a value of 84,874*l*.; and in April, 10,286 oz., at a value of 39,882*l*. All these purchases were made by the Bank of England on its own account, at the rate of 3*l*. 17*s*. 6½*d*. per oz.

The National Gallery.—A new Holbein, a portrait, has lately been added to the gallery. It was formerly the property of Mr. Rochard, and has been purchased by the trustees for the sum of 800*l*. It is apparently the portrait of a professor of anatomy, from the furred doctor's gown and the skull on which the hand rests. As there is a coat of arms in the left hand corner of the canvass the identity of the portrait may be traced.

Artesian Wells in Trafalgar-square.—During the past week the water from these wells has been laid on to the new Houses of Parliament, and most of the Government-offices in Parliament-street and Whitehall, the supply from the Chelsea water-works having been discontinued. Four different mains have been opened for the supply of water for watering the streets, two being placed in St. James's Park, one at the Horse Guards, and the other in Great George-street. The water to the Government-offices is supplied from the upper cistern at the engine-house in Orange-street, by which, in case of fire, they can be at once inundated.

Departure of the Great Britain.—This extraordinary steamer left the river on Thursday afternoon, with 250 passengers, who availed themselves of a passage to the ports of Cowes, Plymouth, Dublin, and Liverpool, at which she will touch previous to starting for New York.

The Wood Pavement in the Strand.—In consequence of the numerous accidents that have taken place upon the wood pavement in that portion of the Strand from Bedford-street to Charing-cross, the paving commissioners have agreed to have it removed immediately, and granite paving laid down in its stead.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending June 7:—West Districts, 133; Northern, 166; Central, 135; Eastern, 180; Southern, 225; Total, 839; males, 427; females, 412. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1319; males, 673, females, 646.

Provincial.

Ambleside.—The launching of a steamer upon one of our northern lakes is not only a novelty in the lake district, but a circumstance hitherto without a precedent in any of the lakes either in England or Ireland. Henceforth, however, Windermere is destined to bear a steamer upon her waters. She was built at the foot of the lake, a little above Newby-bridge, and on Saturday last was launched in the Windermere, and received the appropriate name of "The Lady of the Lake."

Bromley.—Considerable dissatisfaction continues to prevail at Bromley, in Kent, with reference to the case of Harriet Monckton, who as our readers will recollect was found in an outhouse attached to a dissenting chapel in that place, quite dead, and upon whose remains an inquest was held upwards of 15 months ago, which up to this day has not been closed. The coroner, Mr. J. C. Carttar, has been applied to since the last adjournment, and five weeks ago the jury were promised that the investigation should be re-opened. No period however has yet been fixed by the coroner for resuming the inquiry, so that the most painful opinions are freely circulated as to the cause of the young female's decease. Rumour is busy in attributing her death to a highly respectable gentleman in the neighbourhood, who committed suicide shortly afterwards, and who was in the habit of attending the same chapel as Miss Monckton.

Liverpool.—The "monster gun," manufactured at Liverpool for the American war-steamer Princeton, was tried on Friday and Saturday week on the sands near that town. The gun carried a ball of 219 lbs., and was charged with 45 lbs. of powder. The report is represented to have been terrific, and the ball was seen to richochet on the sea at a distance of three miles.

Manchester.—Last week, in accordance with a resolution of the public parks committee, the mayor of Manchester wrote to Sir Robert Peel, stating that the committee had come to the conclusion, that it would be proper for them to accept the sum of 3000*l*. which the right honourable baronet had promised to give out of the amount voted by Parliament for such purposes. Sir R. Peel has stated that he will give directions for the issue of 3000*l*., in aid of the voluntary contributions raised in Manchester and its neighbourhood, for the purpose of providing public parks and places of recreation; but he does not feel himself justified in giving any assurances on the subject of an additional grant.

Oxford.—At the Convocation on the 4th inst. the Professor of Civil Law presented to the Vice-Chancellor the following gentlemen to be admitted to the honorary degree of Doctor in Civil Law, observing on the distinguished merits of each as eminently qualified to have his name enrolled as a member of the University:—Sir Charles Mansfield Clarke, Bart., M.D., F.R.S.; Sir William Jackson Hooker, K.G.H., F.R.S., late Regius Professor of Botany in the University of Glasgow; and Edward Goulburn, Esq., Serjeant-at-Law, one of the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy. The Bishop of Columbo was admitted ad eundem to the degree of Doctor in Divinity.

Plymouth.—Accounts have been received from Gibraltar, stating that Mr. Walter, of this town, who was overseer of the convicts at Gibraltar, was murdered on the 21st ult. by a man named Thomas Anson, whom he had reprimanded for neglect of duty. The murderer fractured Mr. Walter's skull with a crowbar, and stabbed him with a glazier's knife. He was instantly apprehended, and committed for trial on the capital charge.—Accounts have also been received from Sierra Leone, stating that Mr. Harmer, a midshipman of H.M.S. Wasp, who had been placed in charge of a slaver captured by that ship, has been murdered by the crew. Unfortunately, Mr. Harmer allowed a strong party of the slave crew to remain out of irons, and at night they rose and murdered every Englishman on board; and when daylight broke, exchanged signals with and fired at another prize, captured by the Wasp, and then bore away. In a day or two afterwards she fell in with the Star, Commander Dunlop, who took her, and brought the whole of her piratical crew to Ascension.

Portsmouth.—After numerous sittings, and the examination of several witnesses, the Coroner adjourned the inquest on Mr. Seton until Tuesday next, the 17th, in order to give the police time for further investigation. So far as the medical evidence went, it appeared to prove that although the aneurism caused by the pistol-ball was the primary cause of danger, and would ultimately have terminated fatally, still the operation for the reduction of the aneurism was the immediate cause of death.—The squadron at Spithead will, in the course of next week, be a great point of attraction; eight finer ships never swam than will be found [illegible] lines; Admiral Parker's division, consisting [illegible] cent, Trafalgar, Queen, and Albion, and [illegible] Willes's division of the Vanguard, Rodney, [illegible] Canopus, with the Vulture steamer, and [illegible] or two others. They will go to sea about the 20th, and doubtless Her Majesty will visit Spithead prior to their sailing. The Royal steam-yacht is quite ready for Her Majesty's reception, and is a picture of elegance, convenience, and neatness.

Reading.—The following conviction is recorded in the Berkshire Chronicle of the 24th ult., as having taken place at the Abingdon petty sessions on the 20th ult.:—"W. Beauchamp and R. Saywell were brought before the Rev. N. Dodson and Mr. Phillips, by virtue of warrants against them, for trespassing with others to the number of five, in search of game on land called Whitney Copse, the property of the Earl of Abingdon, on the 18th April. It was proved that no less than 50 pheasant-wires were found set in the cover. Defendants were convicted in the penalty of 5*l*. each and costs, and in default of payment were sentenced to two months' imprisonment with hard labour at the House of Correction at Reading." It is now announced that both prisoners were last week released unconditionally by order of the Home Secretary.

Ripon.—The Duke of Devonshire, at his last rent audit held at Ripon, which was the last previous to the Noble Duke's Yorkshire estate being sold, acted with that princely liberality for which his Grace is proverbial. The estate, which is occupied by an industrious tenantry, was reported by his Grace's agents to be in such a state of cultivation, and the improvements in building, draining, &c., to be of that extensive and permanent description as to have greatly enhanced in value since the original letting. His Grace at once determined not to appropriate any of these advantages to himself, and directed that full and ample compensation should be made to all who had in any way contributed to so satisfactory a result. A whole year's rent was also distributed among the tenantry by the Noble Duke's orders.

Railways.

In the House of Lords the Standing Orders Committee have decided that in the following bills the standing orders had been complied with:—The Ely and Huntingdon; Shrewsbury, Oswestry, and Chester; Manchester and Leeds (Burnley, Oldham, and Haywood); Lynn and Ely; Berks and Hants; Midland (Syston to Peterborough); Lowestoft Harbour; Leeds and Dewsbury; Huddersfield and Sheffield; the Blackburne and Colne; and the Huddersfield and Manchester. The Standing Orders Committee have specially reported to the House the following bills, and leave has been given to proceed with them; viz., Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth; Dunstable and Birmingham and London; York and North Midland; Bedford and London; York and Scarborough (deviation); Eastern Counties (Ely and Whittlesea deviation); Exeter and Crediton; Midland (Nottingham to Lincoln). The Standing Orders Committee reassembled yesterday, when the North of England and Richmond; Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings (Keymer branch); Edinburgh and Glasgow; and the Belfast and Ballymena Bills were submitted to their lordships, and evidence gone into with respect to the standing orders. The Whitby and Pickering Railway Bill still awaits the Standing Orders Committee. As stated in our last the Committee of the House of Commons have decided in favour of the broad gauge of the Great Western. In accordance with this decision, they reported that the preambles of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, and the Oxford and Rugby Bills were proved; and that the preambles of the London, Worcester, and South Staffordshire, the Dudley and Sedgley Branch, and the Birmingham and Gloucester (Worcester deviation) were not proved. This decision is considered to be of so much public importance that the House has ordered the evidence to be printed. The Committee on the Railways to York after hearing the evidence of Mr. Rendel, the engineer, who admitted, that by an error of the surveyors, at a distance of 16½ miles from Cambridge the Cambridge and Lincoln line, according to the deposited plan, would cut away to the depth of 10 feet the banks of the Great Wash, and would thus completely inundate the surrounding country, have decided that this error in the Datum line is fatal to the execution of the works, and have reported accordingly to the House that the preamble has not been proved; but at the same time they recommended that the railway should be entertained as a project. Other committees have decided that in the following cases the preamble has been proved:—Chester and Birkenhead, Manchester, South Junction, and Altrincham, Liverpool and Bury, Newport and Pontypool, York and North Midland (Goole branch), Cambridge and Bury, Lynn and East Dereham, Manchester and Birmingham (Ashton Branch), the Ardwick branch of the Ashton and Liverpool Junction, the Horsham branch of the London and Brighton, the Limerick and Waterford, the Pontefract and Goole, the Middlesborough and Redcar, the London and Richmond, the West London, the Preston Brook, and Runcorn, the Irish Great Western (Dublin to Mullingar), and several unopposed bills. The preamble has been declared not to be proved in the case of the Newark and Sheffield, the Chesterfield and Sheffield, the Brayton and Goole, and the Wexford and Carlow, the ground of this decision being, that it was not advisable to sanction any railway until the harbour of Wexford was

…proved to accommodate the traffic.—…on the South Devon, Tavistock, and Sut… Branches, and on the South Devon and Laun… received to postpone their further con… until July, but without prejudice to either … the committee simply feeling that they … to decide in favour of either of the … Branches at present. They consider further … necessary to show the efficacy of the atmo… principle; and, although the committee have no … of its ultimate success, yet they do not think … justified in passing so many bills for lines on … until the experiments now making have … concluded.—The committee on Irish Bills have re… to the House that no sufficient ground exists for … ation of the standing orders applicable to Irish railway Bills, as distinct from those of England and Scotland.—A curious return has just been laid before Parliament, in relation to projected railways now before Parliament. It thence appears that the railways of … plans and sections have been deposited with the Railway Department of the Board of Trade amount in length, for Great Britain and Ireland, to no less than … miles, being thus nearly 24 times the length of England itself! The following are the proportions of the lines:—England has, as her share, 6086 miles and a fraction; Scotland has about 1-10th the quantity, being only 595 miles; Ireland, however, has no fewer than 1101 miles. These statements have regard only to the projected lines which are this session before Parliament. They do not include any portion of the numerous lines that have since and are weekly, or rather daily, being brought forward, but merely give the length of railways for which plans were deposited with the Board of Trade towards the close of last year.—The total number of accidents on railways, reported to the Board of Trade, for the quarter ending April 1, 1845, was 39, being 22 deaths and 17 injuries.

Dublin.—A meeting of electors of Trinity College was held at the residence of Archdeacon Magee on Saturday, when a resolution was adopted to address Her Majesty, praying her to dissolve Parliament before giving her Royal assent to the endowment of Maynooth.—The local papers mention that the 13th Light Dragoons, while en route from Exeter to Cahir, had a halt on Sunday at Maryborough, Major W. D. Hamilton in command. The major stopped at the Hotel, and not having called for any attendance during the forenoon, suspicion was excited, the more so as his bedroom had been made fast on the inside. The proprietor of the hotel with others forced open the door at 2 o'clock, when they found the major lying on his back weltering in blood. It seems that the unhappy gentleman had cut the veins and arteries of his sword arm with a razor. Surgical aid was immediately procured, and the arteries were tied up. The major is a native of Bath, and attained the majority only a few months ago.—The state of Leitrim still gives rise to much uneasiness, and a large party of the 34th regiment and a troop of the 2d Dragoon Guards are now encamped in a meadow, within a few hundred yards of Mohill. It is hoped that tranquillity will soon be restored to the disturbed district, although so lately as last week two outrages were committed within half a mile of the camp.

The usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday, in Conciliation-hall, Mr. Devitt, ex-justice of the peace, in the chair. Owing to the absence of Mr. O'Connell the attendance at the meeting was scanty. Mr. J. O'Connell, M.P., brought forward a petition to Parliament against the clauses of the New Irish Colleges Bill, which provide for the rights of appointment and removal of professors, and constitute Her Majesty and successors the sole visitors. He stated that the Irish Repeal Members of Parliament had resolved upon a strenuous opposition to the clauses, and intended to go to England to defeat it. He vindicated the propriety of the demand made by the Roman Catholic bishops for six separate professorships, and read extracts from a letter recently published in the Freeman's Journal by a Roman Catholic priest, the object of which is to demonstrate that not only Catholic doctrines and principles, but the most Christian creed, are treated with contempt and ridicule by some of the most eminent writers upon geology. It might be said that in these attacks on Catholics, affected their common Christianity, Protestants would be as earnest in opposing their dissemination; but he would ask what guarantee they had for this? Individual condemnation and opposition there might be, but the right of private judgment, which was the foundation of the Protestant religion, deprived its church of that authority which would compel unity of opinion.—Mr. O'Brien, M.P., concurred in the opposition which the association had determined to give to the 10th clause of the Bill, but was not prepared to admit the correctness of the assertion that it was impossible that the science of geology could be communicated to Catholics by a Protestant. The discussion of that question was unnecessary at present, as they had concentrated their opposition to the measure, and brought it to bear upon this 10th clause exclusively, which would have the effect of making these new seminaries sties of political corruption instead of seats of learning. He condemned the precipitation with which Ministers had brought forward the measure, and announced his determination to attend in his place in Parliament on Friday to oppose the Bill in committee.—Mr. GRATTAN, M.P., having deprecated the introduction of topics much too nice for discussion by laymen, spoke at great length in support of the petition brought forward by Mr. J. O'Connell, and in opposition to the proposed measure. The petition having been adopted, Mr. W. S. O'Brien addressed the meeting at considerable length on the land question and absenteeism. The rent for the week was 370*l*.

Cork.—The Monster Repeal Banquet, for which preparations have been long in progress, took place on Monday last, at the Imperial Clarence Rooms. About 600 persons were at the table, and more than 800 ladies were present as spectators. The mayor of Cork presided. According to the reports in the Cork journals, the banquet far eclipsed any similar proceeding. Mr. O'Connell, emboldened by recent events, delivered a speech characterised by a more than ordinary share of eloquent vehemence, rejecting with scorn the conciliatory advances of the Minister as "mean and paltry attempts to swamp the great ends of agitation." He also told the city members—one of whom, Mr. Callaghan, was a guest—that they must go out at the next election, unless they are prepared to discharge their Parliamentary duties by a close attendance at Conciliation-hall. "Federalism," or any other "ism," he said, would no longer be endured. This last declaration was a hit at Serjeant Murphy. Later in the evening the chairman having alluded to Mr. Callaghan in rather offensive terms, that gentleman retorted on the "brawlers" of Conciliation-hall, whereupon a scene of crimination and recrimination ensued, not very conducive to the harmony of the entertainment. However, as Mr. Callaghan declared it as his resolve to retire from the representation at the next election, the quarrel was made up to the satisfaction of some of the parties. Mr. Hodges, the Government reporter, was present throughout the proceedings, as well as at those of Tara, Navan, and such of the renewed monster-meetings as have been already held. Mr. O'Connell on Tuesday proceeded down the river in one of the steamers; on Wednesday he attended an open meeting, and in the evening made a speech at the People's Hall, and on Thursday morning he left Cork.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—Habeas Corpus—in re Carus Wilson.—This was an application in Mr. Wilson's case, for a habeas corpus, directed to the viscount and gaoler of Jersey. The Court, and the counsel in support of the application, seemed very much at a loss to determine how and when the writ of habeas was to be made returnable. The Court at length intimated a desire to hear the application on its merits before the Court rose, and after the other business was gone through. The application having been then renewed, the Court expressed its satisfaction at having had an opportunity of looking into the affidavits on which the application was founded. From these it appeared that even if Mr. Wilson was right in assuming that the Court in Jersey was not competent to try the action brought by Mr. Letourer against him, yet it was a competent Court for the trial of other causes, and had the right of other competent jurisdictions, to protect themselves from contumacy. Mr. Wilson was committed for behaving insolently in Court. The warm language used by him in his affidavits rather suggested that he might not have treated the Court with due respect, and the Court was fully competent to, and probably justified in, committing him. As Mr. Wilson, if brought up on the writ, would have to be remanded, the Court thought it advisable not to allow it to issue, and therefore refused the application.

The Jockey Club has been occupied in the investigation of several cases of fraud. Among these was a charge brought by Mr. Gully against J. F. Bloodsworth and William Stebbings, of having conspired to be against Old England for the Derby, in connexion with William Day, and through information clandestinely derived from him, and subsequently to June, or by other means to prevent the said horse running for that race. The stewards (Lord Stradbroke, Lord Rossiyn, and Colonel Anson), having heard the confession of William Day, and the evidence of William Barrett, jun., and of John Day, sen., are satisfied that Messrs. Bloodsworth and Stebbings did conspire to bet against Old England; that communication was kept up by Stebbings writing letters through Bloodsworth to William Day, which letters were sent under cover to William Barrett, jun., of Stockbridge, for several months. The stewards have therefore ordered that J. F. Bloodsworth, William Stebbings, and William Day be warned off the course at Newarket, and out of the Coffee-room yard there; and that William Day be not permitted to ride in any race at Newmarket. They have also recommended the proprietors and stewards of all race courses where the rules of the Jockey Club are in force to prevent them appearing on such courses. Previous to Ascot races, in consequence of some remark in a sporting paper, Lord G. Bentinck called upon the stewards to have Perkin Warbeck examined before starting. The evidences of a four-year old mouth were too palpable for the most ignorant to have been mistaken. Zanoni's mouth was also looked at, and in this case it was clear that an attempt had been made to extract the teeth; both were broken and jagged, and blackened on the surface by the application of caustic.

Miscellaneous.

The Isthmus of Panama.—The Journal des Débats publishes a summary of a report lately given into the French Government by M. Garella, an engineer sent out by the Government to examine into the practicability of making a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. M. Garella reports in favour of the practicability of the scheme. He found the lowest elevations between the two oceans to amount to from 120 to 160 metres (from 400 to 500 feet), and as this is too great an elevation for a ship canal, he proposes an enormous tunnel, capable of allowing frigates to pass through. He thinks, from an examination of the soil, that a tunnel of 100 feet in height above the surface of the canal would be practicable, and might be made within a reasonable outlay of money. The length of the tunnel would be 5350 metres, and he estimates the expense of the tunnel alone at 44 millions of francs.

Cheap Trip Round the World.—There will soon be no such thing as an unexplored country. The rage for travelling, with more or less speed, has seized "each man and mither's son," and ere long the world will own no such thing as a novelty, unless it be an untravelled Englishman. All classes may now move to all quarters of the globe, and the grand tour already confers no distinction, when it may be made by the humble denizens of fortune in thousands. We have cheap trips of all sorts, and those to London, Birmingham, Bristol, and Hull, are common and "plenty as blackberries." Similar projects in the direction of Portugal, Spain, Italy, and Greece, will now become equally so, a jaunt to Paris having already opened the way in this direction. But why do we speak of such small affairs as these, when, as we have heretofore announced, an enterprising individual of Hamburgh has arranged for a cheap trip round the world? This, no doubt, is but the beginning of a series of circumnavigations which will carry hordes of curious, eager, and inquiring Europeans into every corner and nook of the globe, civilised and uncivilised. If the nations will but have the sense to keep from war, the vast and wonderful changes in manners, modes, and customs effected in the past 25 years will probably be greatly exceeded by the advances of a quarter of a century now before us. The Hamburgh expedition, we may observe, leaves that city on the 15th of August. The route has been so arranged as to secure a continual summer to the voyagers.—Liverpool Albion.

A New Manure.—The German papers give currency to the statement that M. Liebig, the celebrated professor of Chemistry at the University of Giessen, has discovered a mineral substance, which, when combined with guano, will produce one of the most fertilising manures known. It is added that a joint-stock company, with a capital of 120,000*l.* sterling, composed for the most part of leading English capitalists, was immediately on the discovery being made, formed for the purpose of carrying on upon a large scale the manufacture of the new compound. Among the subscribers are, however, several eminent professors of agriculture, who, according to the Impartial du Rhin, give out that the application of this substance to the culture of lands will produce an entire revolution in the agricultural system.

Migrations of Salmon.—About a year and a half ago, Lord Glenlyon, with the object of deciding the long-agitated question as to whether the salmon, after returning to the ocean from its spawning-ground, again resought the same river on another return of the season, caused a number of kelts, or foul fish, to be caught and marked, by attaching a label, by a ring, to what is called the dead fin of each. Last summer, a number of these were captured on various stations in the Tay, but, so far as we have heard, on none in the Earn; and on Tuesday last, another, and the first this season, was caught at the Rashbush, a fishing-ground below Inchyra. This fish was in excellent condition, and weighed 21 lbs. The label bore as follows:—"Lord Glenlyon, Dunkeld, No. 129."—Perthshire Advertiser.

Merchant Steam Navy of England.—A return to an order of the House of Commons of the names and descriptions of steam-vessels registered in the ports of the United Kingdom, showing where and when built, the number of tons, horse-power, length, breadth, draught of water, and the amount of the armaments they are capable of carrying, has just reached us. Of the 870 ships enumerated in the parliamentary return, ten are from 1000 to 2000 tons burden, and of from 400 to 1000-horse-power—making an aggregate of 12,562 tons, and 4720-horse power; three are from 900 to 1000 tons, and of from 450 to 520-horse power—making an aggregate of 2819 tons, and of 1320-horse power; three of from 800 to 900 tons, and of from 400 to 520-horse power—making an aggregate of 2584 tons, and 1220-horse power; three of from 700 to 800 tons, and from 320 to 500-horse power—making an aggregate of 2322 tons, and 1320-horse power; five of from 600 to 700 tons, and from 260 to 440-horse power—making an aggregate of 3171 tons, and 1980-horse power; six of from 500 to 600 tons, and from 240 to 460-horse power; 17 of from 400 to 500 tons, and of from 200 to 400-horse power; 53 of from 300 to 400 tons, and of from 150 to 350-horse power—making an aggregate of 18,615 tons, and 13,563-horse power; 53 of from 200 to 300 tons, and of from 80 to 300-horse power—making an aggregate of 17,551 tons, and 11,970-horse power; 72 of from 100 to 200 tons, and of from 40 to 350-horse power—making an aggregate of 18,615 tons, and 13,563-horse power. The remaining 500 to 600 steamers are of a tonnage of from 99 to 4 or 5, and are propelled by a larger amount of horse power with reference to their tonnage than the larger steamers, already enumerated.

English Patents in France.—The French papers contain the decision of a cause of some interest to persons in this country holding patents in France. It was an action against a party in Paris for infringement of Messrs. Elkington and De Koul's patent for electro-plating and gilding. The patentees have obtained a verdict for establishing their rights, with damages and expenses against the infringer.

A HAND AND ARM COVERED WITH WOUNDS CURED by HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT and PILLS!—Thomas Main injured his hand two years ago in the yard at Northfleet, which, in a short time, began to swell to an alarming extent, and broke out from the fingers up to the elbow into several ulcers. Not only was this poor man incapable of doing anything for 18 months, but what was worse, he had been discharged as incurable from an hospital, after being there nine weeks. From this hopeless state has this person been radically cured by HOLLOWAY'S wonderful Ointment and Pills.—Sold at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment, 244, Strand; and by all respectable Medicine-sellers throughout the civilised world.

SILVER SUPERSEDED, and those corrosive and injurious Metals, called Nickel and German Silver, superplanted by the introduction of a new and perfectly matchless ALBATA PLATE. C. WATSON, 41 and 42, Barbican, and 16, Norton Folgate, aided by a person of science in the amalgamation of Metals, has succeeded in bringing to Public Notice the most beautiful Article ever yet offered; possessing all the richness of Silver in appearance, with all its durability and hardness—with its perfect sweetness in use, undergoing, as it does, a chemical process, by which all that is nauseous in mixed Metals is entirely extracted—resisting all acids—may be cleaned as silver, and is manufactured into every Article for the Table and Sideboard.

C. WATSON begs the Public will understand that this Metal is peculiarly his own, and that Silver is not more different from Gold, than his Metal is from all others—on its intrinsic merits alone he wishes it to be tested, and from the daily increasing eulogiums he receives, he is convinced that nothing can prevent its becoming an article of universal wear.

THE ATRAPILATORY, OR LIQUID HAIR DYE; the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-doing (but as the hair grows), as it never fades or acquires that unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence recommend the above dye as infallible, if done at their establishment; and ladies or gentlemen requiring it, are requested to bring a friend or servant with them to see how it is used, which will enable them to do it afterwards without the chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and some of their establishment having used it, the effect produced can be at once seen. They think it necessary to add, that by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.

News of the Week.

THE third reading of the Maynooth Bill was carried in the House of Lords on Monday by a very large majority. The Bishop of Llandaff denounced the measure as inconsistent with the principles of the constitution, and moved as an amendment that it be read a third time that day six months. A long debate ensued during which the amendment was supported by the Duke of Newcastle, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and the Earl of Clancarty, and opposed by the Earl of Ellenborough, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Wicklow, the Earl of Chichester, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and other Peers. The House then divided, when the third reading was carried by 181 to 50, being a majority of 131. The Earl of Winchilsea then moved that the sum to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund for the purposes of the measure should cease at the expiration of three years, but this amendment was negatived without a division, and the Bill passed. On Friday a desultory discussion took place in the House of Lords on the real grounds of the reversal of the judgment on the O'Connell trials. The Law Lords unanimously denied that the reversal had been pronounced on the merits of the case, and the majority declared that the decision was given on purely technical grounds. In the House of Commons, the long and important debate on New Zealand has been the leading topic of interest. The disastrous condition of that colony, and the history of the disputes between the New Zealand Company and the Colonial Office, were brought before the House on Tuesday by Mr. Charles Buller, and have occupied almost exclusive attention for three nights. Mr. Buller in a speech of four hours' duration, explained the actual state and position of the colony, and submitted no less than 18 resolutions on the subject. Of these resolutions the greater number related to the occupation of land in the colony, to the question of the title of the Crown to all land not actually occupied by the natives, and to the true construction of the treaty of Waitangi. The remainder referred to the means necessary to strengthen the local government against such aggressions as that of Wairoo, and to the propriety of adopting some fixed system of employing the natives in civil offices and providing for their educational improvement. The debate which followed was directed not so much to the measures suggested by the resolutions, as to the whole history of the colony; and it will be read with interest as developing the views of all parties on the last experiment of colonisation attempted by this country. The debate continued until Thursday night, when the House divided, and negatived Mr. Buller's motion by 223 to 172. Among the other Parliamentary incidents of the week, we may mention the reappearance of Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Smith O'Brien on the floor of the House of Commons, to oppose the Irish measures of the Government, and the appeal made to the House by Mr. Roebuck for protection from a challenge sent to him by Mr. Somers, for expressions used in a previous debate. The course thus adopted by Mr. Roebuck, for the second time, was applauded by Lord Ashley, Sir R. Inglis, and other members opposed to the practice of duelling, and a resolution was passed unanimously that Mr. Somers had been guilty of a breach of privilege. In consideration, however, of the ample apology offered by that gentleman, it was resolved that it was unnecessary to proceed further. On Thursday the resolution granting the money required for the proposed academical education in Ireland was agreed to, after a statement from Sir J. Graham that several amendments would be introduced in order to meet the objections of the Roman Catholic prelates and others to the non-religious character of the measure.

Our foreign news is not of great importance. The French Chambers are fast approaching the close of the session, and the discussion on the different chapters of the Budget has been the chief business of the week. From the United States we learn that Mexico has determined to recognise the independence of Texas, on the condition that Texas shall not be annexed to the United States, and that this resolution has been brought about by the interference of the French and British Governments. The intermediate Overland Mail has arrived this week, but with the exception of the Lahore disturbances, the news presents no topics to call for notice in this place.

COURT.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, left Buckingham Palace on Thursday morning for the Isle of Wight, travelling to Gosport by a special train on the South-Western Railway. On her Majesty's arrival at Gosport, she at once proceeded to the Clarence Victualling-yard, where the naval and military authorities were in waiting. From the Clarence Yard the royal party were conducted to the Victoria and Albert steam-yacht, and as soon as her Majesty was afloat, the ships in the harbour (Victory, Hibernia, Excellent, Siren, &c.), saluted and manned their yards; and as the yacht proceeded out of the harbour, she was saluted by the forts of the garrison. As the yacht proceeded on her course towards Spithead, the ships comprising the experimental squadron manned their yards and fired a royal salute. The yacht then passed between the line-of-battle ships, which were anchored in two lines. The St. Vincent, 120, with the rear-admiral's (Hyde Parker's) flag; Trafalgar, 120; Queen, 110; and Albion, 90, forming one line; and the Vanguard, 80; Rodney, 92; Canopus, 84; and Superb, 80, the other. A little to the eastward was the Vernon, 50; and the Carysfort, 26, which arrived on Wednesday from South America with specie, was also at anchor near the squadron. Many years have elapsed since such a number of line-of-battle-ships were at anchor together at Spithead, and never, either there or in any other part of the world, was there an assemblage of such splendid ships. Indeed, there has never been anchored together at any one time eight ships presenting such an amount of tonnage as the present fleet. The Albion is 3033 tons, the Queen 3099, the Trafalgar 2721, the Rodney 2625, the St. Vincent 2612, the Vanguard 2609, the Superb 2590, the Canopus 2257; making, for the eight ships, 21,596 tons, which is 1800 tons more than the 13 ships could count with which we gained the Nile victory. All these ships were decked with flags, and the men who manned the yards were dressed alike in every ship—white trousers and blue jackets. As the royal yacht passed slowly between the lines, proceeding from east to west, the seamen on the yards, and the marines, who were drawn up in array on the decks of the Albion and Superb, which were the two easternmost ships, loudly cheered Her Majesty and the Prince, who were on deck at the time, and acknowledged the enthusiasm of the crews by repeatedly bowing. The cheers of the sailors and marines of the Albion and Superb had hardly died away, when another shout was heard. This was the cheering from the Queen and Canopus, which were the next two vessels passed by the yacht. In like manner, when the cheering of these two ships had ceased, it was taken up by the crews of the Trafalgar and Rodney, and then by those of the St. Vincent and Vanguard. It is rumoured that Her Majesty intends to review the fleet. If so, it will be the first naval review since the time the allied sovereigns were in England, and visited Portsmouth. After passing through the fleet, the yacht proceeded on towards Cowes, and it being nearly high water, Her Majesty was able to land at Mede's Hole, where the royal carriages were in waiting to convey Her Majesty and the royal party to Osborne House.—The Duke and Duchess of Nemours left Buckingham Palace on Monday for Brussels, to pay a visit to the King and Queen of the Belgians. The Duchess of Kent also left town on the same day for Brussels, Coburg, and Vienna. On Wednesday the Grand Duchess Ida, of Saxe Weimar, arrived at Bushy House, from the Continent, on a visit to the Queen Dowager. Lady Portman has succeeded the Countess of Gainsborough as the lady in waiting. Lord Rivers has succeeded the Marquis of Ormonde as Lord in waiting; and Mr. Ormsby Gore has succeeded Colonel Berkeley Drummond as groom in waiting to Her Majesty.

The Waterloo Banquet.—The Duke of Wellington, on Wednesday the 18th inst., celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of the battle of Waterloo by his customary banquet at Apsley House. His Grace was surrounded on the occasion by upwards of 70 of his companions in arms, including nearly all the field officers now living who served at Waterloo. Prince Albert, attended by the Marquis of Exeter, was also present at the banquet.

Parliamentary Movements.—In consequence of the resignation of Mr. Ramsay, Sir John Hope, Bart., of Pinkie, will offer himself as a candidate for Mid Lothian on the Conservative interest. A vacancy has occurred in the representation of West Suffolk by the death of Colonel Rushbrooke. It is said that in consequence of Sir W. Clay's votes on the Maynooth question a deputation of the Wesleyans and other Dissenters of the Tower Hamlets, have had an interview with Sir Culling Eardley Smith, and requested him to stand for that borough whenever a vacancy shall occur, to which request he has acceded.

Official Changes.—It is rumoured that Mr. Milnes Gaskell, now a Lord of the Treasury, will be made Secretary to the Board of Control, in the place of Mr. Emerson Tennent, who is to be Colonial Secretary in Ceylon; and that Sir Charles Douglas, M.P., for Warwick, will succeed Mr. Gaskell.

The Church.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Rev. Richard Jenkyns, D.D., to the Deanery of Wells, void by the death of Dr. Goodenough.

The Colonies.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint Sir John Campbell, Bart., to be Lieut.-Governor of the Island of St. Vincent.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The French Chambers are fast approaching the conclusion of their labours for the session, and the details of their proceedings, though showing the unusual despatch of business which always precedes a prorogation, afford no occasion for anything but a mere summary of events. The Chamber of Deputies on Monday, after a warm debate, determined to discuss the following Bills before the conclusion of the session:—The Bill for establishing a correspondence by steamboats between France and the continent of America; the Bill for completing the works for improving the harbour of Toulon and that of Port Vendres; the Paris and Strasbourg and Tours and Nantes Railroad Bills; the Bills for an embranchment from the Rouen and Havre Railroad to Dieppe and Fécamp, and a branch to Aix from the Marseilles and Avignon; the Bill for establishing a branch of the Bank of France at Algiers; and the Bill for rescinding the 8th clause of the Railroad Bill passed on the 11th of June, 1842. The Paris and Rennes, the Dijon and Mulhausen, and Bordeaux and Cette Railroad Bills, will be adjourned to the next session.—The different items of the Budget have been the leading topics of discussion this week, the most interesting part, probably, being the credits for the War Department. On the demand of 17,000,000f. for the expenses of the staff, the committee proposed a reduction of 80,000f., which, though opposed by Government, was adopted. Another reduction of 10,000f. in the salaries of the commandants of military schools was also adopted. On the chapter relating to the expenses of the training of recruits, the committee proposed a reduction of 200,000f., which, though opposed by Marshal Soult, who would only consent to a reduction of 18,000f., was voted. A number of other chapters were then passed, almost without discussion. One of the chief points was the quarantine regulations, which several members inveighed against with considerable force, declaring that they were calculated to cause injury to the southern parts of France, by inducing passengers to pass by Southampton. The whole of the chapters of agriculture and commerce were passed, as were the articles of a Bill relative to the fêtes of July.—The Chamber of Peers adopted last week the Bill for arming the fortifications of Paris, by a majority of 94 to 18. The Chamber afterwards commenced the discussion on the project of law relative to the extraordinary credits of 1844 and 1845, the debate on which would have passed off without any interesting incident but for a speech from M. de Montalembert in defence of the Jesuits, in which he indulged in personalities against M. Thiers that excited the murmurs of the friends of that deputy.—According to La Presse, it is neither Admiral Dupetit Thouars nor Admiral de Moges, but Rear-Admiral Montaguier Laroque, who is to have the command of the anti-slave-trade squadron. The same print says that the Duke de Bordeaux is about to travel in the East, and that the Duke de Montpensier is shortly to leave Algeria for Egypt, whence he will visit Beyrout, Smyrna, and Constantinople, returning to France by Rhodes and Malta. M. Villemain, the Minister of Public Instruction, who had given to his numerous friends and the admirers of his talent so much cause for uneasiness, is, we are happy to state, completely recovered. He is now working assiduously at his history of Gregory VII., which will doubtless form a splendid addition to those works with which he has already enriched French literature. He also takes a share in the labours of the Chamber of Peers, of which he is so influential a member.—The papers of all parties advert to the speech delivered by M. Guizot last week in defence of his foreign policy, and do not hesitate to do justice to his marvellous eloquence. The speech, however, is as important to English interests as it was remarkable for its brilliant oratory and profound reasoning. In reply to a series of objections to his foreign policy urged by M. Billault, M. Guizot apologised to the Chamber for being "obliged again to refute allegations incessantly repeated by the Opposition. As respected Tahiti, he would confine himself to state how the question now stood. The principal difficulties belonging to it had been removed—the rights of France were acknowledged by all—the French protectorate was fully established—and the treaty of 1842 would be completely executed." He next described the conduct of France in the Texan affairs, and formally assured M. Billault that there was—

"No connexion between the policy he had followed with regard to Texas, and the abolition of the right of search. If Texas wished to renounce its independence, and enter the American union, nobody had a right to interfere or oppose the wish of the people. If the Texans, on the contrary, are desirous to preserve their independence, not only have we no right to oppose their resolution, but I do not hesitate to say that France would approve their conduct and acknowledge that they were right. We have recognised the independence of Texas: we considered it real, and we were interested in doing so. We not only recognised the independence of Texas, but we have concluded with that country treaties of commerce, which will cease to exist the moment it shall no longer be an independent state. France is interested in the duration and maintenance of independent states in America. There are in America three great Powers—England, the United States, and the republics of Spanish origin. France is not an American Power, but she has interests in that continent; she must consequently desire that independent states should continue independent; that a balance should subsist between the three great American Powers, and that none of them should obtain the preponderance. We do not mean to protest against the annexation of Texas to the United States, nor to engage in a struggle to prevent that annexation if it is to take place. We wish to leave the Texans at liberty to act as they please; if they are anxious to join the United States, let them do so: if not, they are free to remain as they are. France can only interfere by throwing the weight of her influence in the scale, and expressing her opinion in favour of the alternative which appears to her most conducive to her interests. She is not called upon to act a compromising part, nor to involve herself in future difficulties, but it behoves her to protect, by the authority of her name, the independence of states, and to maintain the equilibrium of the great political Powers in America."

M. Guizot next defended the policy of the Cabinet towards Switzerland; and, passing to Spain, observed that he had very little to say on the subject, except that the incident to which M. Billault had referred (the abdication of Don Carlos) would make no change in the situation or policy of France towards Spain. "To-day" he added,—

"As well as last week, the Sovereign of Spain, the Queen of Spain, is, for France, Queen Isabella II.—there is no other—there can be no other. As respects the question of the marriage, it is an essentially Spanish question, which Spain herself must solve. The policy of France on that head is well known; I repeatedly had occasion to proclaim it from the tribune. We do not presume to dictate to Spain. Her independence is as entire, as respected by us on that point, as on any other. We have every confidence in the good sense of the Spanish nation and of its Government; we are persuaded that they will bear in mind that the marriage of the Queen, so far from disuniting France and Spain, must, on the contrary, draw closer the ties between them—the ties of constitutional Spain with constitutional France—the France of July."

M. Guizot afterwards referred to the Syrian question, and contended that France had constantly maintained, at Constantinople, the necessity of replacing the population of Mount Lebanon under a Christian administration. The Porte, however, was opposed to that plan, and the Christian Powers were divided in opinion on the subject. Finally, a new obstacle had arisen—the principal member of the family to which that administration belonged, the Emir Emin, had become a Mussulman. This last circumstance had not rendered easier the task of restoring a Christian administration. It would not, however, prevent France from labouring to achieve that object.

"It is our opinion, it is our profound conviction," added M. Guizot, "that this is the best mode of administration for Mount Lebanon; but the Chamber will not be surprised that, in presence of such difficulties, we have not yet been able to effect the object of our endeavours."

In conclusion, M. Guizot justified the slowness with which the negotiation for the repeal of the right of search had been conducted. "If the Oppposition," he said,

"Could have been more expeditious and succeeded better, I regret that it was not charged with it. The King's Government deemed it its duty to temporise, because it was indispensable to show that the wish manifested was not a temporary impression, nor a mere caprice of the Opposition—that it was really a public impression—a wish of the Chamber and the country. It required time to seek and find means of conciliating with the abolition of the right of search, the efficacious repression of the slave-trade; to convince the English Government of the necessity of suppressing the right of search, in order to maintain a good understanding between the two countries, and, to arrive at such a result, two or three years were not, in his opinion, too long a period. He did not suppose that the Opposition could have obtained a speedier or more satisfactory solution of the question. Let them go to foreign countries, and they would hear their Governments and their inhabitants declare that the power and influence of France was, on the contrary, increasing every day. The Conservative party, the majority of the Chamber, might fearlessly continue the line of foreign policy which they had hitherto followed, and they would see by the effects that it would continue to secure the influence of France abroad, as well as her repose and prosperity at home."

The sudden and extraordinary increase of temperature had been accompanied by storms in almost every part of France. The cities of Nantes, Angers, Tours, Bourges, Arras, and Laon, have been visited by violent storms, during which, particularly at Tours, loud claps of thunder were heard. At Nantes the effects produced by the approaching storm were most extraordinary. The sky was covered with clouds, which descended to the earth, and cast a phosphoric hue over the city. The storm was everywhere accompanied or followed by torrents of rain and by a tempestuous wind. Fortunately, there was but little injury sustained from the lightning, except in the neighbourhood of Tours.

SPAIN.—Our accounts from Madrid, which extend to the 11th inst., are extremely unimportant. The Government print, El Heraldo, contains an article, the object of which is to appease the alarm excited by Don Carlos's abdication and the failure of the negotiations with the Court of Rome. It was rumoured that the Minister of the Navy Department had proceeded to Barcelona, in order to submit to the Queen and President of the Council a projected manifesto in reply to the documents connected with Don Carlos's renunciation of his rights. The capital continued undisturbed, but rumours of impending insurrections in the provinces were circulating, and the Tiempo notices with some gravity the report that the first revolutionary movement will break out at Alicante, Valencia, Barcelona, and Madrid. It was also whispered among Espartero's partisans that a manifesto would shortly be published in his name, wherein he would tender to Spain his sword and services, in order to prevent a marriage taking place between the Queen and Don Carlos's eldest son. Against the match several of the journals continue to inveigh in the strongest language. The last accounts from Barcelona are of the 6th, and represented the Queen's presence to have kindled enthusiastic demonstrations of loyalty. On the 8th the young Queen had reviewed the troops of the garrison. Her Majesty, whom Generals Narvaez, Concha, and Cotoner accompanied, was on horseback, and was vehemently cheered. After the Queen's escort came a carriage, in which her mother and sister sat; when it passed before the troops and assembled crowd, a sullen silence was remarked, and not a "Viva!" was uttered.—A tremendous tempest has devastated most of those fertile Pyrenéen districts which extend from Bayonne to Toulouse and Gers. The hailstones were of marvellous size, many as big as a duck's egg, destroying in their fall the roofings of cottages, sheep, and poultry, gardens, vineyards, and corn-fields. The unfortunate peasants may be seen in all directions cutting down their ruined wheat crops, and trying as a last desperate resource against the threatening famine, to replace them with Maize. The immediate neighbourhood of Bayonne has escaped this terrible visitation. At Balgarry, Irouleguy, Ispourre, and Oleron, several people have been wounded and killed by lightning and the hail.—It is said that the authorities have given orders to stop the persecution of the Liberal press, and that the editors of the Clamor Publico will not be sent out the kingdom as at first intended. This change of conduct, if it be realised, is said to be the result of their alarm about the Carlist manifesto.

GREECE.—We have accounts from Athens of the 30th of May. They give a deplorable account of the state of the country, which is fast falling into anarchy. The Athens Courier gives various details to show that even the most respectable inhabitants are not safe at night in the streets of the capital. One of the first merchants, M. Lazary, in returning to his house at night, nearly fell a victim to two assassins, who attacked him and would have finished him, if some people had not come to his assistance. Major Philemon has given information to the Government that he is threatened with having his house set on fire. Several others have received anonymous letters threatening them with death. This state of things creates great alarm, which is still further increased by the apathy of the Government, which, in place of repressing crime, either attempts to deny its existence, or blames the Opposition for it. Another event has caused great emotion in the capital. Colonel Stratos, commander of the frontier troops of western Greece, has been wounded in a nocturnal attack, which he attributes to General Grivas, inspector-general of the army, and to some amnestied wretches who form part of the latter's suite. At the same time, General Grivas accuses Colonel Stratos and his brother of having attacked him. Public feeling is in favour of Colonel Stratos, but the Ministry have taken part strongly with his assailant. In several parts of the city some partial collisions have taken place between the frontier guards and the soldiers of the line, and the state of the provinces is quite as afflicting. Robbery is gaining ground on all sides, and the agents of the Government that are charged to put it down, in place of fulfilling their mission, arrogate to themselves judicial attributes, and inflict torture on the wretched peasants.

TURKEY.—Accounts from Constantinople of the 27th ult., state that, after holding several conferences respecting the affairs of Syria, the Divan had despatched a steamer to Beyrout with fresh instructions for the Ottoman authorities, in which the Ambassadors of the five Powers were said to have entirely concurred. Subsequent advices from Syria state that the Turkish Pasha of Beyrout had replied to the note addressed to him by the five European Consuls resident in that city (referred to by Sir R. Peel in the House of Commons on Friday). The Pasha defends the Turkish Government against the charge of neglecting to suppress the disturbances that had taken place in the Lebanon, but pledges himself to carry out the instructions he had received to that effect.

RUSSIA.—Letters from Odessa of the 22d ult mention the receipts of news from Teflis, announcing that the expedition directed by Count Woronzoff in person against Chamil Bey had not been successful. After a warm engagement the Russian troops were compelled to retire, after sustaining a considerable loss. Chamil Bey had notified to all the Circassian Princes that he would treat as enemies those who did not take arms against Russia.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—Papers from the Cape to the 18th of April have arrived, which advise the discovery, in the neighbourhood of the Orange River and Angra Pequina of nitrate of potash and soda, in almost inexhaustible quantities. Although this news has only been known in London a few days, it has already formed a species of speculation on the part of several of our merchants, who have not hesitated to despatch a fleet of vessels in quest of these articles. Some parties have been fortunate enough to enter into contract with the masters of ships for directions to the particular spot on the guarantee of a certain amount of commission being paid if a successful voyage should be insured, and the cargo sell at a certain scale of prices named in the articles of agreement. To prove that the possessors of the secret are in no manner doubtful of the result of the enterprise, they have, it is understood, shipped several miles of a tram-road, with necessary carriages, for the conveyance of the product, upon which they propose to levy a duty of 2*s*. 6*d*. or 3*s*. per ton, in increase of the funds they hope to derive from their first commission. This new discovery has created a sensation among the merchants connected with the trade of the coast of Africa, and it promises in many respects to yield, like the late guano speculation, abundant employment for shipping. Copper ore and common salt also abound in the same neighbourhood; the question is whether other mineral discoveries may not enhance the trade of the coast.

UNITED STATES & SOUTH AMERICA.—We have dates by the Britannia, from New York, to the 31st ult. It now seems finally determined that Mexico will acknowledge the independence of Texas, coupled with the condition that Texas shall not be annexed to the United States. This announcement which had been put forth frequently of late in the American papers, is received as from authority, and its truth is said to be unquestionable. This tardy resolve of the Mexican authorities is said to have been prompted by the British and French Governments, an interference on the part of the latter which has given much umbrage in the United States. With respect to the mission to this country, there was a rumour that the President would send either Mr. Mason of Virginia, the Attorney-General, or Mr. Charles Ingersoll, of Philadelphia. Some alarm had been excited by the recent movements of the Mormons, who were constantly collecting arms and other munitions of war from all parts of the country where they have settlements, and depositing them in their holy city of Nauvoo, to which notable metropolis the disciples themselves were gathering as fast as they could. The Repeal Association of Norfolk, Virginia, had followed the example of the Baltimore Repealers, and dissolved their societies. Pittsburgh had again been the scene of a disastrous fire, which destroyed upwards of 50 dwellings. The entire loss is estimated at 30,000 dollars, and 60 labourers were rendered houseless. Mr. Fox, who has long filled the post of British Ambassador at Washington, being about to leave that city, has made the commissioner of public buildings a present of his plants, shrubs, &c., a graceful compliment, and one which has given much satisfaction, not from the value of the present so much as from the manner in which it has been bestowed.—The accounts from Canada state that no alteration has occurred in the health of Lord Metcalfe. In other respects the accounts from Canada are encouraging.—Captain Elliot, the British Chargé d'Affaires, in proceeding from Texas to the city of Mexico, had been robbed! The accounts from Central America state that the siege of Nicaragua was carried on at a reckless sacrifice of life. A thousand persons, it is said, were assassinated or burnt by General Malespin. The Chambers had declared the election of the latter void, and he had been excommunicated by the Roman Catholic Bishop for the murder of some of the priests.—The accounts from Hayti state that a battle had been fought between the Dominicans and the Haytians, in which large numbers were wounded on both sides, but to which party victory had given its favour the accounts do not state.—In California the authority of Mexico had been entirely disavowed, and the people informed the Governor that his exactions were so cruel that they could no longer bear them.—Official despatches had been received at Buenos Ayres from General Oribe, dated the 29th March, advising the complete defeat of Rivera by General Urguisa on the 27th, at a place called India Rivera, 90 miles north of Monte Video, after an action of two hours, with the loss of all his infantry, artillery, and baggage; 1000 men are said to have been killed, and 500 prisoners taken, including a great many officers. Rivera is reported to have escaped, with 8 men. Great rejoicings were made at Buenos Ayres on account of this triumph, from which results of importance would probably arise. It was rumoured that the blockade of Monte Video had been acknowledged by the French admiral.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The intermediate Overland Mail arrived in town on Wednesday, with accounts from Bombay, to the 12th, and from Calcutta to the 2d May. The chief subject of interest is the continuation of the intrigues at Lahore. Goolab Singh was a sort of State prisoner; for the troops were unwilling to murder him until he had disgorged the vast sums of money which he and his brothers and nephew had purloined from the treasury of old Runjeet Singh. A part of the troops were said to be in his pay. Since his coming to Lahore, whither, it is now said, he has been enticed by the manœuvres of the Queen, mother of the boy king Dhuleep, he has been under a sort of surveillance, and watched by the Queen's party; lest he should find means of bribing all the Khalsa, he has been called on to give up his fortresses and his wealth. He vows that his wealth is concealed in places known only to himself, and that unless he is allowed to return to his hill forts, he can only give a small sum. The Queen Mother's brother is said to be his decided enemy, while she herself treats him with marked respect, and has even conferred on him, with the sanction of the Khalsa troops, the title of "Laut General," that is, Commander-in-Chief of all the Forces in the Punjaub. This nomination is highly agreeable to the Sikh troops, who wish, under the command of this old warrior, to fight with the British army assembled on their frontiers, and will, it is said, make a movement during the rainy season. Goolab is said to have volunteered to lead them. The hatred of the Sikh troops against the British is only equalled by their love of money, and their thirst of plundering the provinces under the British rule. Of this feeling there have been given irrefragable proofs in their late attempts at invasion, &c. There is therefore a strong probability of a condict within a short period, for the Supreme Government cannot for its own sake remain a passive spectator of revolution, bloodshed, and massacres in a neighbouring state, and especially when the turbulent soldiery of that state is disposed to act in the most hostile manner towards India.—The news from Affghanistan is, that Dhost Mahommed and his son Akhbar are waiting until the events in Lahore will enable them to seize Peshawur. In the interior of India tranquillity prevails. The death of old Chundoo Loll, the Prime Minister of the Nizam, has taken place. The Mahratta country was quiet. The Court-Martial on Colonel Wallace had terminated, but the decision was not known. Scinde was tranquil and healthful: one or more of the Bombay regiments were expected to leave before the rains began.—The news from China comes down to the end of March. From a statement translated from the Pekin Gazette, it would seem that Ke-Ying having memorialised the Emperor in favour of the Christian religion, that Sovereign, after a careful examination of its tenets, declared that it was not only a harmless, but a commendable faith, and forthwith ordered the interdict formerly laid upon it to be removed. Lieutenant A. M'Donald, of H.M.'s 98th Regiment, had been tried by a Court Martial, for sending an insulting note to Maj. Caine, Sheriff of the colony, inciting him to fight a duel; he was sentenced to be cashiered; but on a revision, a milder punishment has been inflicted.—Major-General Sir T. Valiant died of spasmodic cholera, on 22d April, at Calcutta. Cursetjee Manockjee, a distinguished Parsee, died at Bombay, on 7th May, in his 83rd year. There were several frightful murders amongst the natives in Bombay. The remains of the 78th Highlanders, now in Poonah, amounting to about 350 bayonets, continue steadily to improve in health; and the invalids of the regiment, to the number of 104 men, 21 women and children, have sailed for England in the ship Columbus.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—After the dispute between the Marquis of Normanby and the Bishop of Cashel, noticed in our last, the Marquis of Clanricarde presented a petition from county Leitrim, complaining of the lawless state of the country. In his opinion, the best remedy was redress in the legal tribunals of the country, and to make it the interest of the people to support the law. He had heard it said that the late State prosecutions had had great effect towards checking agitation and the cry for Repeal: but if Government thought so, they were labouring under a gross mistake. It was thought by some that Government had been successful in the result of that prosecution, because the judgment had been reversed on technical grounds, but he must declare that it had been reversed on the merits of the case, and that was the common opinion in Ireland. He would take the liberty of saying that the whole course of the Government towards Ireland had been a series of mistakes; first in dismissing the magistrates, and next in instituting the State prosecutions; for those steps had only strengthened the Repeal party. He thought also the allusion lately made by Sir R. Peel to a danger arising in the west was most imprudent. In conclusion he wished to know whether Government were about to renew the Processions Act, as the Orange party were now active and arrayed against the Ministry. It was said that Government were in a state of strength, but he should say they were in a state of debility; he should not propose any resolution to the House, but content himself with saying that Ireland had never been less tranquil than at present.—Lord Brougham, as one of the judges who had pronounced judgment on the State prosecutions, said he must deny, in the strongest language of which he was master, the assertion that the decision had been made on the merits of the case. There were seven counts of the indictment, untouched by the arguments of the prisoners who had been convicted, which plainly charged them with conspiracy; if the four counts proved to be bad had been left out, no possible objection could have been taken to the judgment. As to the question of the array of the jury, upon which some, and amongst others Lord Denman, laid great stress, it had no bearing on the decision given by the House.—Lord Denman was bound to say that the decision of the House on the State prosecutions had been most accurately stated by Lord Brougham, with the exception of the challenge of the array, which he thought had been improperly overruled.—Lord Farnham hoped that Government would not think of renewing the Processions Act, which he thought a one-sided measure, though he was averse to processions as productive of discord.—Lord Campbell accused Lord Brougham of beginning an irrelevant discussion on the State prosecutions, and denied that the judgment was reversed on purely technical grounds. The imperfect state of the counts was not the only cause for objection—there was another, that of fraud in making up the jury list.—The Lord Chancellor did not think that Lord Brougham could be charged with opening this discussion, as he had only come forward to deny a statement often made, that the judgment was reversed on the merits of the case, and not on technical grounds. Lord Brougham's statement had been corroborated by Lord Denman, and in fact it was only necessary to refer to the facts to see that the reversal proceeded on grounds entirely technical. Lord Campbell indeed had said that the House had decided partly on the ground of fraud in the formation of the jury list, but he had omitted to state that the whole matter had been investigated by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, which had decided that no fraud was proved. It was with extreme reluctance that he troubled the House with his opinion, but he had investigated the matter thoroughly, and was confident that the law would bear him out in the decision he had given.—Lord Stanley thought the House could not doubt, after what had been said, that the decision pronounced was not based on the merits of the case. At that late hour he could not attempt to follow the Marquis of Clanricade through all the parts of his discursive speech. He was not prepared, when notice had been given of a question as to the intention of the Government to renew the Processions Act, to enter into the whole question of Repeal agitation; and as for the speech itself, he thought it would answer no practical purpose, and was likely to produce the worst effects in Ireland. It must be left to the Government to say when they would prosecute, and when not; and with regard to the county of Leitrim, every step had been taken to secure the public peace. As to the Processions Act it was not at present the intention of Government to renew it; it was, as Lord Farnham had said, a one-sided measure, but he agreed with that noble lord in his observations on the ill effects of processions, and hoped that there would be no need for renewing the Act if both parties were careful to avoid giving each other offence.—After a few words from Lords Wicklow, St. Germans, and Westmeath, the subject dropped. —On the motion of the Duke of Richmond, the Turnpike-road Bill passed through committee.

Monday.—The Earl of Aberdeen moved an address to the Queen, expressing the pleasure with which the House concurred with Her Majesty in conferring on Sir H. Pottinger a pension of 1500*l.* per annum for the very eminent services which he had performed in China. The noble earl having eulogised Sir H. Pottinger, stated that, since the conclusion of the treaty, the Chinese Government had acted with the greatest punctuality and good faith throughout; and he trusted that nothing would happen to change such a course of conduct on their part.—The Marquis of Lansdowne seconded the motion; and the Earl of Ellenborough passed high encomiums on Sir H. Pottinger, but thought that Sir William Parker was also entitled to some pecuniary reward.—The address was then agreed to unanimously.—On the motion for the third reading of the Maynooth Bill, Lord Campbell, at considerable length, explained his motives for supporting the Bill. He looked upon the measure not as an isolated one, but as the first of a series, and he declared the continuance of the Protestant Church in Ireland to be at variance with the peace and prosperity of that country.—The Bishop of Llandaff condemned the Bill, as utterly inconsistent with the principles of the Reformation and the true character and constitution of the Church of England; while, incidentally, it declared that the Sovereign on the throne sat there by an unsound title. Feeling it would be a parricidal act in him to sanction such a measure viewing it as inconsistent with the most sacred pledges of religion and loyalty—he proposed that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.—The Earl of Ellenborough was friendly to the measure, but could be no party to take from the Church of England any portion of its funds for the purpose of assisting the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Such a proposition would be fatal, not only to this measure, but to every other having for its object the peace of the empire.—The Earl of Shrewsbury supported the Bill, and gave the most emphatic and solemn contradiction to the charges brought against the system of education pursued at Maynooth. He applauded the liberal spirit in which this measure had its origin, and thanked the Government for bringing it forward.—The Duke of Newcastle inquired whether Government had held any communication with the Governor of Malta, with the view of countenancing the establishment of a Jesuit college in that island for the education of youth?—Lord Stanley informed the noble Duke that the brother of an hon. Baronet in the other House of Parliament had applied to the Governor for a license to establish a school in Malta for the education of the Roman Catholic population of the island. Such was the deficiency of the means of education in Malta, that the inhabitants were obliged to send their children to be educated in Italy and Sicily by persons not subjects of her Majesty. The question was still under consideration whether a license should be granted, although he must add such licenses were never refused.—The Duke of Newcastle wished to know whether the person making application for the license was a Jesuit?—Lord Stanley admitted that the gentleman was a member of that body.—The Duke of Newcastle next inquired whether the Government held any communication with the Court of Rome?—Lord Stanley said it was perfectly well understood that we had no direct diplomatic intercourse with the Court of Rome, but there was now, as for many years past, a gentleman employed in Italy connected with the Florence embassy, Mr. Petre, who was accustomed to carry on some communications with those who held high office in the Court of Rome.—The Duke of Newcastle at some length stated his reasons for opposing the Bill. He avowed his conscientious belief that the Roman Catholic religion was "idolatrous and superstitious," and it was criminal in the State to countenance it by permanently endowing Maynooth as an ecclesiastical corporation. The Duke of Wellington defended the Bill. The college was endowed by the act passed in 1795. The proposed increase of the grant was rendered necessary by the growth of the population, and in order to give a proper education to the Roman Catholic priests. He altogether denied that this was an ecclesiastical corporation; it was an eleemosynary collegiate corporation. He disclaimed all intention of making this the forerunner of other measures; it stood by itself, and had nothing to do with other measures; certainly not with any measures to endow the Catholic Church, founded upon the dismemberment of the Church of England established in Ireland. The Church of Ireland was not only secured by the oath of Her Majesty and that taken by their lordships, but by the oath in the act of 1829, which he took as the enunciation of a principle, an avowed determination to maintain the Protestant Church of Ireland. He felt satisfied this measure would be found worthy of the approbation it had received from the great majority of their lordships on the second reading.—The Earl of Wicklow said a few words in support of the Bill, and urged the Government to persevere in a course of conciliatory policy towards Ireland.—The Marquis of Breadalbane reprobated the measure as an invasion of the fundamental principles of the Constitution. Before they sanctioned such a measure it was the duty of the Government to dissolve a Parliament which had been elected on principles wholly opposed to those involved in this Bill.—The Earl of Chichester thought the opposition which had been raised on religious grounds to this Bill was founded on two fallacies—first, that of looking only to the errors of the Roman Catholic Church, against which he himself protested, but forgetting the great residuum of truth they must all admit to exist in that Church; and, secondly, that because it would be wrong to give support to a less pure form of Christianity in preference to a better, where they had any option, therefore, under all circumstances, it must be wrong to give any encouragement to one not altogether pure. In this matter they had no option. They must either teach the Roman Catholic population by means of their own priests and religion, or leave them altogether untaught. He thought this a wise measure, because it was one of justice and conciliation. If the Government followed it up in a liberal spirit, Ireland, instead of presenting the most difficult problem in British legislation, would become the mainstay and support of this country; but it would be impossible to govern her on principles of justice while they proscribed the religion of the vast majority of the people, and made exclusive Protestantism the rule and essence of all their policy.—The Earl of Rosse cordially supported the bill, and expressed his conviction that it would lead to great improvement in the education of the Irish priesthood.—The Earl of Clancarty declared his unabated opposition to the bill.—The Marquis of Lansdowne insisted that no distinction in principle could be drawn between a small and a large vote—between a vote for a short period and an endowment for all time. He took this measure by itself. He would not enter into the question of a Roman Catholic endowment; but if the time came when Parliament recognised the necessity of placing the Roman Catholic clergy on a different footing, the omnipotence of Parliament would find the means of carrying that salutary measure into effect. The immediate results of this measure he had every confidence would be most important. Time only could unmake the prejudices of a country; statesmen must attend on the progress of time, and watch its operations, and they might depend on it as new generations rose up for whom they had to legislate, they would reap the ample fruits of such measures as this, in the increased happiness and contentment of the country. —Their lordships then divided:—For the third reading—Content—Present, 104; Proxies, 77—181. Non-content—Present, 34; Proxies, 16—50: Majority for the third reading, 131.—On the question that the Bill do pass, the Earl of Winchilsea moved an amendment to the effect that, after three years from the passing of the Bill, no further sum should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund for the purposes of the measure.—After a few words from Lord Brougham, in opposition to the amendment, the proposed clause was negatived without a division, and the Bill passed.

Tuesday.—Lord Stanley gave notice that he should postpone the second reading of the Landlord and Tenants (Ireland) Bill from Friday to Tuesday next. On the motion of Lord Lyttelton, the Death by Accidents Compensation Bill was read a third time and passed. The Deodands Bill, the Canal Tolls Bill and the Canal Companies Carriers Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.—The Bishop of Cashel presented several petitions from the clergy of Ireland complaining of the system of education as practised in the National Schools. In his opinion the National Board of Education was a signal failure, and had only tended to increase the amount of ignorance in Ireland. The plan he should recommend was that of the Church Education Society, which provided for the spiritual instruction of children under the superintendence of the parochial clergy, and he trusted this plan would find favour in the eyes of Government.—The Earl of St. Germans defended the National Board. To say that ignorance had increased during the last 10 years in Ireland was a most extraordinary proposition, and one quite unwarranted by facts. He should oppose the proposition of the Bishop of Cashel, because it would give great offence to the Roman Catholics. The Marquis of Normanby bore testimony to the admirable system of the National Board.—The Earl of Wicklow, although he had been originally opposed to the national system, because he conceived it was calculated to interfere with the most effective system of education in Europe, that of the Kildare-street Society, felt bound to say now that nothing could be more injurious than to interfere with it.—Lord Montagle expressed his gratification at the statement made by the Earl of St. Germans respecting the National system, and deprecated the introduction of any new scheme of education into Ireland where it was plain that the plan now in force was the only one practicable. Lord Clancarty hoped the Government would attend to these petitions, as he knew of nothing more fatal to the interests of Ireland than the National system.—The Archbishop of Dublin hoped that the existing system would not be changed. Nothing could be more erroneous than the notion that it had failed, the time would come when the public mind would be disabused, and the merits of the National system acknowledged.—Lord Stanley declared the firm intention of Government to maintain the existing system, which had hitherto worked well, and from which he expected the happiest results. The Duke of Wellington explained, that, although he had many years ago been most adverse to a system for the joint education of Protestants and Catholics, he had ever since that system had been approved by the Legislature earnestly supported it, and, as a law, done his best to carry it out. He exhorted the Irish people to follow this example, and declared the impossibility of making grants of money to the other religious sects in Ireland if the Roman Catholic, which was well entitled to be called the national religion of Ireland, were excluded. The Noble Duke concluded his speech thus:—"I wish to say one word to the clergy of the Church of England—let them do what they will or what they may by their writings, their preachings, and their other influences, to interfere as much as they like with legislation: but let them remember that when once those measures become law, it is their duty to carry them into effect. Let them in their several parishes, in the discharge of their Christian duties, feel that it is one of their first duties to inculcate obedience to the laws under which they live."—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Thursday.—Lord Brougham brought in a new Small Debts Bill in lieu of that thrown out by the Commons because it contained a money clause. Lord Brougham took a passing fling at what he called the sensitive "privilegians" of the Lower House. —Lord Campbell referred to the rejection of his three Bills for the amendment of the Law of Common Process, and thought it uncourteous in the House of Commons to do so, without a discussion, after the Bills had received the sanction of their lordships.—The Lord Chancellor thought that Sergeant Murphy, to whom they had been entrusted, had never opened the Bills, and believed he had sacrificed them to some jokes made by Mr. O'Connell.—Lord Brougham recommended Lord Campbell to bring in his three Bills again, and to take care to entrust them to older hands than those of Mr. Sergeant Murphy.—The second reading of the Bishops Patronage (Ireland) Bill, was moved by the Archbishop of Dublin.—The Marquis of Clanricarde moved as an amendment, that it be read a second time on the 30th inst.—Their lordships divided—For the amendment, 19; against it, 33. Majority, 16. The Bill was read a second time, and its commitment fixed for the 30th inst.—The Real Property Conveyance Bill was read a first time, and the Oaths Dispensation Bill was read a second time.—The Schoolmasters (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—After the various routine business, noticed in our last number, had been got through, Sir J. Graham moved the order of the day for going into committee of supply to take the preliminary resolution, charging the Consolidated Fund with the sums necessary for defraying the expenses of the new Irish Colleges.—Mr. S. O'Brien rose to make what he called "a few friendly suggestions to the Government." He said that the people of Ireland were unanimous in thinking that provision should be made for the religious instruction of the students. On that point the clergy of all denominations felt that the Education Bill was defective, and public opinion in Ireland was most unfavourable to the proposition it involved. All parties were united in the opinion that it was disgraceful to make the appointments to the professorships in these institutions a Government job; and that such would be their character was evident if the tenth clause passed in its present shape. He denounced the measure as an attempt to corrupt the intellect of Ireland, and entered his protest against such legislation.—Mr. Colquhoun took Mr. O'Brien to task for the speech which he had just delivered. As the representative of public opinion in Ireland, Mr. O'Brien undertook to assert that a measure which Mr. Wyse recognised in the main as valuable was one which he as Dictator, or rather as Deputy Dictator of Ireland, could not approve. He came fresh from Conciliation-hall, and informed the House that this Bill would be made a base for fresh agitation. If that were true, Mr. O'Brien was not to be congratulated on the position which he was about to take. He had seen the amendments, which Sir J. Graham had got printed; and he wished to know whether Sir James meant to say that the students in these institutions should be compelled to attend some course of theological instruction?—Sir J. Graham replied, that his amendment had been drawn up for the purpose of removing all doubt on the subject.—Mr. M. Gibson was glad to find Government did not intend to allow these institutions to be used for the increase of partisans of any religious denomination whatsoever. Those who were getting up a cry against them were not representing public opinion, but the opinion of ecclesiastics. The priests of the Roman Catholic religion, and he was sorry to say the clergy of the Church of England too, regarded with jealousy the cultivation of reason and the pursuit of science and philosophy; and, therefore, it was the duty of Government to interpose between them, and to prevent these institutions from being converted into schools of proselytism. After a few words from Mr. V. Smith, Mr. Roebuck observed, that he was startled by a strange phenomenon on this occasion—he meant the appearance of Mr. S. O'Brien, who had made a vow that he would never again appear on the floor of the House of Commons. He repudiated the imputation that the House was endeavouring to corrupt the intellect of Ireland, and said he could not conceive what spirit had led Mr. S. O'Brien to go to Conciliation-hall to embitter religious animosities and national hate, and to foster narrow bigotry and vulgar prejudice; and then to come here, after spitting his venom there, to insult the House of Commons by repeating before it the trash which had obtained approbation in Ireland. Might he not ask—"Be there no motives for this? May not this conduct arise from disappointed vanity?" He could understand a man placing himself under the guidance of a man of superior intellect, and by these means seeking to emerge from an obscurity to which he would be otherwise destined. He then made a fierce attack on Mr. O'Connell, whose appetite for agitation was whetted, he said, by his appetite for rent, and observed that those who followed in his train were scarce worthy of respect.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN declared that Mr. Roebuck's philippic was "the accumulated venom of three months," and attempted to proceed further; but Sir R. INGLIS rose to order, and a most disorderly discussion took place, in which Capt. OSBORNE, Sir H. WINSTON BARRON, Lord J. MANNERS, and Lord J. RUSSELL spoke; but it was terminated at last by the House resolving itself into committee.—In the committee, Sir J. GRAHAM moved the following resolution:—"That a sum, not exceeding 100,000*l*., be issued out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to defray the expenses of establishing new Colleges for the advancement of learning in Ireland; and that an annual sum, not exceeding 21,000*l*., be also issued out of the said Consolidated Fund to pay the stipends, prizes, exhibitions, and other expenses of the said new Colleges."—Mr. S. O'BRIEN then said it was competent for him to reply, as the House was in committee. He observed that this was not the first time that Mr. Roebuck had thus attacked him. He had always endeavoured to behave like a gentleman, and never prepared elaborate invectives, or accumulated the venom of three months' concoction. He declared that, while he treated Mr. Roebuck's remarks with unutterable contempt, he felt for that hon. member the most intense pity.—Having been again called to order by Sir R. INGLIS, who doubted whether it was parliamentary for one hon. member, though an Irish one, to express for another unutterable contempt.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN anticipated the interposition of the Speaker by retracting any unparliamentary expression which he might have used, and said he was so free from personal animosity that he was ready to take Mr. Roebuck's hand. He defended himself from the charge of disappointed vanity, and explained that he had never made a vow that he would not attend that House, but had said that he would not until he could promote the interests of his country in it. He had said elsewhere that an Irish member could promote the good of his country better in Ireland than he could in the House of Commons. He defended the proceedings in Conciliation-hall, contrasted them with those in the House of Commons, and claimed a superiority for the former over the latter. The individual who imputed mean motives to Mr. O'Connell—a man who influenced the destinies, not only of England, but also of the whole world—must sink into the lowest depths of degradation. To say that Mr. O'Connell, who sought national rights, was only influenced by pecuniary motives was the language and the suggestion of a low, grovelling mind. He repeated his former proposition, that if this Bill should pass in its present shape, and if it should give to Government the power of selecting professors, who must of necessity exercise considerable influence over society, it would be an attempt to corrupt the intellect of Ireland.—Lord J. RUSSELL asked for an explanation of the way in which the sums of 100,000*l*. and 21,000*l*. (which had originally been only 18,000*l*.) were to be applied; also as to the alterations which Government proposed relative to the appointment of professors. The noble lord said he approved of the amendments of which the Government had given notice, and thought they would render the measure acceptable to the Irish people.—Sir J. GRAHAM promised to give the required explanations on Monday, when the Bill was to be proceeded with. The additional 1000*l*. a piece yearly to the colleges was intended to be applied to prizes and exhibitions, which had not been considered on the first proposal to Government.—After a conversation of some length, in which Mr. WYSE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. V. SMITH, Sir R. PEEL, Mr. P. BORTHWICK, and others, took part, the resolution was agreed to, the House resumed, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then moved the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a committee of supply.—Sir H. W. BARRON called attention to the state of the Irish fisheries, which led to no remarkable result, except the avowal of the Irish Secretary that the suggestions of Sir H. W. Barron were all good, but involved great expense.—Sir C. NAPIER called attention to the state of our naval ports and arsenals, and called on Government to take a large grant for the immediate fortification of harbours of refuge. He proceeded to show that at Falmouth the works were in decay, and the guns and gun-carriages rotten; that the citadel at Plymouth was insufficient to protect the dockyard; that there was nothing to prevent a French fleet from sailing into Portsmouth harbour; that there was only a battery of 23 guns to defend Pembroke, where we had always several ships on the slips; that the works at Sheerness which had cost the country 4,000,000*l*., were incapable of preventing an enterprising enemy from entering the Thames and burning the shipping of London; and that there was not a single harbour in Great Britain, with the exception of Liverpool, defended by its natural position, which might not easily be destroyed by a sudden irruption from France, which we could not prevent, even though we had a fleet blockading its ports. He pointed out the facility with which the whole of our mercantile marine might be made prize of or burnt from the want of harbours of refuge. He hoped that Government would commence without delay the erection of a system of fortifications in the south of England, and would place our different ports and dockyards in a proper state of defence while there was yet time to do it in security. There was a greater danger now than ever of a collision arising suddenly between England and France, owing to the convention which had been recently signed between the Governments of the two countries. To abandon the right of search and to retain the right of visit was, of all measures that could be devised, the best calculated to promote a collision between the commanders of the English, French, and American squadrons. He should not conclude with any motion, as he did not wish to inculpate the Government, but only to call its attention to this subject.—Sir R. PEEL observed, that Sir C. Napier might deem it consistent with his duty to point out how this harbour could be destroyed, and how that arsenal burnt; but he must know that it was impossible for Government to state how far his information was correct or erroneous. Had Sir C. Napier calculated the estimates which he would have to move for if he had his own way on this subject? They would amount at least to the sum of 25,000,000*l*. Though he could not agree with him in his conclusions, he would take, as he had taken, every precaution to prevent our being surprised in case of war. The necessity of providing harbours of refuge on our coast had not escaped his observation; but if there was any point on which precaution was requisite, it was in voting two or three millions for such purposes. The estimate of the cost of erecting a harbour of refuge at Dover alone was two millions and a half, and in a question not of hundreds but of millions, it was necessary to proceed with very great caution.—Lord PALMERSTON thought the motion required no answer from Sir R. Peel, for it was no inculpation of the conduct of his Government. The late budget of France placed the disproportion of the offensive and defensive means of that country and of England in a light which was not very favourable to the permanence and security of peace. Considering the great development of steam navigation which had taken place of late years, and the great facilities which now existed for transporting troops with great rapidity by railroads from one point to another, it was the duty of the Government to take greater precautions than in past times, and to go on building steamers and fortifying our dockyards, so as to enable them to repel any sudden attack. He concurred with Mr. Pitt in thinking that a very large expenditure in defending vulnerable points was money most economically expended, and often saved you in the end much larger sums than those which you originally laid out.—After some remarks from other members the conversation dropped.—Mr. HINDLEY moved for a return of the names of persons receiving the allowance granted to Protestant Dissenting Ministers in England, with the names of the trustees administering the same. It was to clear the Dissenters of England from the stigma of receiving money contrary to their professed principles that he moved for the returns. The hon. Member in the course of his speech said, it was said that a Member of the Cabinet did not pay any Income-tax, and the charge rested therefore against the whole Cabinet.—Sir R. PEEL: Who is it you mean?—Mr. HINDLEY, the report was that the Lord Chancellor, who receives a large income, paid no Income-tax.—The motion was resisted by Government, and the House divided on it. The numbers were—For the motion 3; against it 54; majority against the motion 51.—After a few words from Mr. C. BERKELEY relative to the changes proposed to be made in the clothing and remount fund of the two regiments of Life Guards, which led to nothing, the House went into a committee of supply, and a vote of 399,924*l*. for Ordnance stores was agreed to.

Monday.—Mr. ROEBUCK informed the House that he had received a letter from Mr. Somers, the Member for Sligo, desiring to know if he (Mr. Roebuck) acknowledged the words attributed to him by the journals, viz., "that those who follow such a leader as Mr. O'Connell deserve little respect either for their position or their intellect;" and, if so, was he prepared to justify his words according to the laws of chivalry. Mr. Roebuck further informed the House that he had written a reply to this letter, declining to abide by the laws of chivalry, and announcing his intention of appealing for protection to the privileges of Parliament. The hon. and learned member concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That John Patrick Somers, Esq., having sent a challenge to a member of this House for words spoken by that member in his place in Parliament, has been guilty of a contempt and breach of the privileges of this House." The motion was seconded by Lord ASHLEY, who expressed his warmest thanks to Mr. Roebuck for the moral courage he had shown in refusing to fight a duel.—Mr. SOMERS said that, seeing the House was likely to agree to the motion, he had only to withdraw the letter he had written to Mr. Roebuck, and express his regret at having done anything the House should consider a breach of its privilege. The hon. member finished his apology by saying—"I really must take the liberty of saying that the hon. and learned member's observations are not always accompanied with that degree of—I must say, truth, which ought to be the object of every public speaker."—Sir G. GREY applauded Mr. Roebuck for having come to the House for protection, instead of going to fight a duel, but he limited his approbation of Mr. Roebuck's conduct to that single act. He said that every hon. member who made a point of conscience not to accept a challenge, but who intended to bring any such case under the notice of the House, ought to be especially guarded in the expressions which he used in speaking of other hon. members, which Mr. Roebuck notoriously was not.—Sir R. PEEL suggested that, as Mr. Somers had made all the reparation in his power, Mr. Roebuck ought to be satisfied, and withdraw his resolution.—Mr. HUME thought that, having missed its opportunity, the House had now no right to try Mr. Roebuck's speech. It had now only to consider whether Mr. Somers had commited a breach of privilege.—Sir R. INGLIS applauded Mr. Roebuck's moral courage, and, after a conversation in which Lords HOWICK and PALMERSTON took part, as to the form in which the course taken by the House should be recorded upon the journals, Sir W. SOMERVILLE expressed a hope that after Mr. Somers's apology the House would allow his letter to be withdrawn.—Mr. ROEBUCK left it to the House to vindicate its own privileges, and denied that he had used any language which was not only strictly true, but gentle and guarded in comparison with that of Mr. S. O'Brien and his associates in Conciliation-hall.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN rose to defend himself from this fresh attack, and some further sparring took place, which was eventually checked by the interposition of the SPEAKER.—Sir H. BARRON instanced the case of Mr. O'Connell, who having sheltered himself under his "registered vow" against duelling, had been gravely cautioned to be careful in his language, and thought that the same lecture should be read to Mr. Roebuck, who used privilege as his shield.—Sir R. PEEL suggested that the same course should be adopted as in the cases in which Mr. Smythe and Mr. Hope had offended. He doubted also whether Mr. Somers's letter was a "contempt," although it was undoubtedly a breach of privilege.—Lord SANDON advised that the "previous question" should be moved, but Lord HOWICK's proposition, that some record should be put upon the Journals, was at last adopted. Mr. Roebuck's motion was affirmed (the word "contempt" being omitted), with a second resolution, that, in consequence of Mr. Somers's apology, it was unnecessary to proceed further.—On the motion of Sir R. PEEL, the House then resolved itself into a committee of the whole House to consider Her Majesty's message respecting Sir H. Pottinger.—Sir R. PEEL stated that Her Majesty had expressed a wish that a pension of 1500*l*. a year should be settled upon Sir H. Pottinger. He therefore proposed a resolution to that effect, and that the payment of the pension should commence from the day on which he ceased to receive pay as Her Majesty's plenipotentiary in China. He also intended to accompany this resolution with a stipulation that future employment in the public service should not disentitle to the receipt of this pension, which was given as a reward for past public services.—After some opposition to the resolution from Mr. WILLIAMS, and a warm support given to it by Sir G. STAUNTON and Lord PALMERSTON, it was passed nemine contradicente.—Sir R. PEEL moved the third reading of the Banking Ireland Bill, in which he said two important alterations had been made; the first, that the averages shall be taken for 13 weeks ending on the 1st April; the second, that the bankers shall be at liberty to take into the account of the specie in respect of the issue of which promissory notes above a certain amount is to take place, the whole of the specie which may be in their possession at four offices, of which not more than two shall be in one place.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN moved the addition of a clause to permit the Hibernian and Royal Banks to invest money in the Three-and-Quarter per Cents., and transfer the stock to the Commissioners of the National Debt, and thereupon to be allowed to issue promissory notes to the extent of the stock so transferred.—Mr. O'CONNELL, who made his first appearance in the House this session, supported the clause. He denounced Sir R. Peel's Currency Bill as the most injurious measure to Ireland that had ever been passed. It had ruined, he said, more families, it had beggared more people, who were living in comfort, than any political revolution that had ever taken place, and now the abolition of the 30*s*. notes would also produce great difficulties in that country.—The clause was rejected, on a division, by 77 to 24.—The Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the bringing up of the resolution granting the money required for the proposed academical education in Ireland, Mr. SHIEL reminded Sir J. Graham, that when the Bill was first introduced, he had warned the Government that they had done wrong in not consulting the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland upon its enactments. Since that time the Roman Catholic bishops had signed certain resolutions, in which they declared the enactments of the Bill to be dangerous to faith and morals, but gave credit to Ministers for good intention in introducing it. He now asked whether any change had been made in the Bill in the two important particulars to which he had just referred, and whether Government had taken advantage of the delay afforded them for the purpose of further communication with the Roman Catholic bishops, and if so, whether those prelates approved the alterations introduced into the Bill?—Mr. COLQUHOUN declared it to be most unbecoming in Government to ask the House to call into its councils any hierarchy, be they who they might, above all, a hierarchy who, in the whole course of their conduct—not disguised, but most open and avowed—had given every possible aid to the agitation of the hon. and learned Member for Cork for the dismemberment of the empire.—Mr. O'CONNELL would not agitate the question of Repeal on the present occasion. All he rose to say was, that the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland had never discussed the nature of the education which was to be given to Protestants; they had only discussed the nature of the education to be given to Roman Catholics. He claimed for them full right to interfere in the education of the youth of their own faith. He thanked Sir R. Inglis for having designated this Bill as a gigantic scheme of godless education. He had come over to the House of Commons for the express purpose of insisting that it should make religion an essential part of education, as in point of fact it was in its own nature. He hoped that they would be able to discuss that question with temper, and the best mode of doing so would be not to follow the example of Mr. Colquhoun.—Sir J. GRAHAM hoped that the discussion of this question would continue to be conducted, as it had hitherto been, with good temper. He gladly subscribed to the opinion that the judgment of that House ought not to submit to the dictation of any hierarchy whatever. He felt however that on the subject of the education of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, the opinion of the Roman Catholic prelates of that country ought to be treated with respect. He admitted that Lord Heytesbury had received a new memorial from them—nay more, that he had had a long conference with them. He had reason to hope that some of their objections to the Bill had been mitigated in consequence of the explanation which had then taken place, and some of his amendments had been made in conformity with their objections. Since that conference no further communication had taken place between Lord Heytesbury and the prelates. With respect to the further alterations which he had to propose upon the Bill, he would not say that they had been submitted to the Roman Catholic bishops, nor was it necessary that they should be. The plan of education would be to exclude religious education from the system taught within the walls of the college, and to afford every facility for furnishing it without the walls to every sect and religious denomination. He assured the House, that after the Bill had passed through committee, full time should be given before its third reading for the full consideration of it by the people of Ireland. Looking, however, to the state of public business and to the advanced period of the session, he felt that he should be betraying his public duty if he postponed the committee on the Bill to a later day than Thursday next.—After a desultory conversation, in which Mr. WYSE, Sir W. JAMES, Mr. JEPHSON, Mr. E. B. ROCHE, and Mr. HOPE joined, the resolution was agreed to. The committee on the Bill was then postponed till Thursday.—Sir G. CLERK obtained leave to bring in a Bill to continue for five years longer an act of Her present Majesty, for excluding certain bills of exchange and promissory notes from the operation of the laws respecting usury.

Tuesday.—Mr. S. WORTLEY gove notice that in committee on the Irish Colleges Bill, he should move the insertion of words securing to the students such means of religious instruction and worship as might be approved of by their parents and guardians.—Sir T. D. ACLAND gave notice that in committee on the same Bill, he should move the insertion of words which should secure from the professors satisfactory declarations that they were believers in the Holy Scriptures.—Mr. C. BULLER brought forward the affairs of the New Zealand Company in a speech of four hours' duration, and moved that the House should go into committee to consider 18 resolutions which he had to submit to it. The colonization of New Zealand, after it had been successfully commenced by the New Zealand Company, had been marred by the interference of Government, and a large body of emigrants had been in all cases cruelly and in some cases fatally treated. After pointing out the great importance of New Zealand in a national and political point of view, and the fair field which it afforded for the development of the capital and labour of England, he showed that at the time when it was first colonised, strong reasons existed for colonising it regularly, lest it should be colonised irregularly. The whole of the native population did not exceed 100,000 souls, and they were principally concentrated in the northern parts of the island. Was that a circumstance which ought to prevent any other country from colonising the southern parts of it, which were almost totally unoccupied, or the northern parts, which were almost all left uncultivated? It was wicked to deny the right of civilised man to cultivate the wilderness. He was bound, however, to treat the savage with kindness, and to communicate to him the advantages of his own civilisation. He showed that the company, in their attempt to colonise that island had never attempted to pillage the natives, but had made them an ample compensation for the land purchased of them by setting apart for them a certain reserve of land after it had been brought into cultivation. The Colonial-office, however, thought that its duty was discharged towards the savage when it got for him a large price for his land, and had not taken any measures to apply it to his future amelioration. He then entered into a minute history of the injudicious proceedings of the colonial authorities in New Zealand, from the time of the conclusion of the treaty of Waitangi down to the present time. He vindicated the conduct of the company, and showed that their settlements had been founded on a scale of liberality and munificence hitherto unknown in the history of English colonisation. The question of gain had always been a very subordinate consideration with them, as their principal object had been merely to protect themselves from loss, whilst engaged in diffusing the arts and industry along with the laws and language of England. Whatever jealousy they had expected to encounter, they never expected to meet any from the Imperial Government. He admitted that their letters to Lord Stanley had been very long, and perhaps somewhat deficient in respect; but Lord Stanley ought not on that account to have allowed his temper to have overcome his sympathy for so numerous a body of his countrymen as had embarked on a system of emigration in New Zealand. All that those people asked for was to be allowed to continue their toil unmolested; but official jealousy and petty resentment had so warped the mind of his lordship that he had given his approbation to measures which had marred their future prospects of success. He then entered into a discussion of the land question between Lord Stanley and the New Zealand Company. He contended, in the words of the Select Committee of last session, that the company had a right to expect to be put in possession by Government with the least possible delay of the number of acres awarded to them, and that the Company had that right as against the estate of the Crown, without reference to the validity or otherwise of its supposed purchases from the natives, all claims derived from which had been surrendered. After condemning in the most severe and pointed terms the conduct of Lord Stanley, in having repudiated the engagement into which Lord J. Russell had entered, and in having broken his own, he called attention to the fact that the company, after expending 300,000*l*. of its own, and 300,000*l*. more on credit obtained from the public, had not yet obtained the grant of a single acre of land. Its capital was exhausted; its proceedings were suspended; and, what was worse, the unhappy emigrants had been debarred from all access as owners to the land which they had purchased with hard cash in England. The crops which they had raised as cultivators, had been set on fire, and their lives had been menaced; and when they had applied for redress to the Colonial-office, that redress had been coldly and heartlessly refused. They now apprehend a general massacre: and Capt. Fitzroy, on whose eccentric conduct he animadverted with great vehemence, had prohibited them from arming to defend themselves. The policy of that officer, who ought never to have been sent out as the Governor of such a colony, had inspired the New Zealanders with overweening confidence, and our countrymen with fierce resentment: and the consequence would be that the first would perish under the attacks of the last, as they would be no more in the hands of Englishmen than mere children in the hands of full grown men. The war, of which no one could foresee the consequence, was already begun between the two races, and if it continued no long time would elapse before the country would hear news respecting it which would make humanity shudder. Having occupied nearly four hours in giving what he called the history of the war of the Colonial-office against the latest English colony, he expressed his deep regret that Lord Stanley had put down the most promising experiment of colonisation that had ever been attempted by England? It was just what he expected from that noble lord, but it was at the same time that which he called upon the House most decidedly to condemn. It was its duty to show the country that the despotism of the Colonial-office was not uncontrolled, and that the grievances of its children in foreign lands were certain of redress when regularly brought before it. He then moved that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House to consider his 18 resolutions.—Mr. M. MILNES seconded the motion, and contended that Mr. Buller had made out a case for the interference of the House. He eulogised the munificent spirit in which this attempt at colonisation had been made, and showed that it had excited the greatest admiration in foreign countries. When he saw that Lord Glenelg had discouraged this project of colonisation, as well as Lord Stanley, he could not think that it was from desperate wilfulness, but from some prejudice which haunted the Colonial-office, that this generous proceeding had been thwarted by the present Colonial Secretary. He read a letter from a gentleman of his own rank in life, and who had left Wakefield for New Zealand with all the appliances necessary to render emigration successful, in which he stated that his house and crops had just been reduced to ashes, and that he and his family were living in daily terror of their lives from the threats of the enraged savages around them.—Mr. HOPE commenced his observations by defending Lord Stanley from the unjust aspersions cast upon him by Mr. C. Buller. He denied that his lordship was influenced by any hostility either to colonisation or the New Zealand Company. His lordship had entered into the discussion of this subject with that company in the spirit of perfect fairness; and as a proof that he had done so, Mr. Hope read a resolution of its directors, signed by Mr. Somes as chairman, offering their acknowledgments for the generous spirit in which his Lordship had done justice to the objects of the company, and their cordial thanks for his readiness to concur in their measures for the government of New Zealand. He then defended the policy of the treaty of Waitangi, and contended that the right of the Crown to land in New Zealand did not arise so much from the right of discovery as from the cession of its chiefs. He next proceeded to vindicate Lord Stanley from the charges of fraud and deceit, and of direlection of duty, which had been preferred against him because he had made the company's title conditional on their proving the legal validity of their purchases of land from the natives before the island was a British colony. He showed that the construction put by Lord Stanley on the agreement of November 1840, was correct, and denied that Lord J. Russell had ever given an unconditional assignment of land to the company in pursuance of that agreement. He was not prepared to justify all the acts of Capt. Fitzroy, but he was convinced that in many cases Capt. Fitzroy did himself injustice by the scanty information which he sent home. He thought that Capt. Fitzroy had done his best to put the company's settlers in possession of their lands, and to justify that opinion he read several documents which had recently come into the possession of the Colonial-office. In reply to the allegation that the Colonial-office was chargeable with all the disasters of the colony, he insisted that they were mainly attributable to the hasty proceedings of the New Zealand Company in taking possession of that island without authority from the Crown. The unfortunate massacre at Wairau arose from the transactions forced upon their agent by the precipitate conduct of the company in seeking to obtain possession of a disputed piece of land. He then proceeded to give an account of the state of the colony according to the latest advices which the Colonial-office had received. It was true that Capt. Fitzroy had sent for troops, but he declared at the same time that he did not want them for active operations, but for the maintenance of order, considering that their presence would not only encourage the loyal, but would also discourage the disaffected. After admitting the responsibility of the Colonial Department for the actions of Capt. Fitzroy, and after regretting that in some instances he had shown himself deficient either in judgment or in temper, he mentioned it as a matter of just exultation to that gallant officer, that the colony was already able to support itself, and was even beginning to pay its own expenses. He then entered into a consideration of the various resolutions proposed by Mr. C. Buller, and said that he could not be induced to give them his support. If the assent of Government to this motion would pacify the different parties in New Zealand, he would willingly agree to it; but convinced as he was that a declaration on the part of the House that the Crown had a right to all the waste lands of that island would combine all the native tribes in one vast conspiracy against us, he must protest on behalf of Government against the course now proposed by Mr. C. Buller.—On the motion of Capt. ROUS, the debate was then adjourned.

Wednesday.—Mr. O'CONNELL adverted to certain Bills sent down from the House of Lords, three in number, relating to the common-law process of the United Kingdom. He asked if they had been brought in by Government, and if the Irish judges had been consulted as to their provisions?—Sir J. GRAHAM replied that Government were not responsible for these Bills, which were under the care of Mr. Serjeant Murphy.—Mr. O'CONNELL remarked that that was a very good reason for getting rid of them.—Mr. SERGEANT MURPHY said, amidst much laughter, that having heard the words "getting rid of," he was uncertain whether they applied to himself or the Bills. The Bills came down from the other House, and he had been asked to take charge of them. But observing that they were unpalatable to the other side of the House, he was desirous of washing his hands of them.—Mr. O'CONNELL then moved that the House should go into committee on them that day six months, which was agreed to, and the Bills were consequently rejected. —The adjourned debate on the resolutions proposed by Mr. C. BULLER respecting New Zealand was resumed by Capt. ROUS, who reviewed and condemned the entire proceedings of the New Zealand Company, and moved as an amendment on the resolutions, "That the treaty of Waitangi, in accordance with the directions of the Marquis of Normanby, approved of by Lord J. Russell, and confirmed by her Majesty, should be inviolably maintained; also that the conduct of the New Zealand Company in sending out settlers to New Zealand not only without the sanction, but in direct defiance of the authority of the Crown, was highly irregular and improper." Capt. Rous then proceeded to charge the company with having gained money from the public on false pretences. The members of it had formed themselves into a company in 1839, but did not receive their charter of incorporation until 1840; and yet they had sold land in New Zealand before they obtained that charter. After gaining in that manner a very large sum of money, and dividing among themselves a dividend of 10 per cent. till 1842, they then declared themselves insolvent, and incapable, in consequence, of performing their engagements to their servants. He charged them with having enticed labourers to go out to New Zealand on delusive representations. They told those parties, that if they could not find employment elsewhere, they would always find it in their service; and yet they had afterwards cruelly and heartlessly discharged them, after having first sent them 20 miles inland, in the hope that they would desert. He made these charges openly against the company, and should be glad to hear the directors of it explain them away, if they could. Notwithstanding the report of the committee of the House of Commons, he should certainly move his amendment, that the treaty of Waitangi ought to be inviolably maintained. Though that treaty might be inconvenient, yet as British gentlemen they were bound to maintain its stipulations. He hoped that the House would join with him in not allowing a lawless and tyrannical company, like the New Zealand Company, to trample upon the rights of the New Zealanders. He hoped that the House would address Her Majesty to withdraw their charter from them; for the sooner that company was extinct, the better it would be for society, for England, and for the world.—Mr. AGLIONBY described the circumstances under which the company had been formed and under which he had joined it. He sincerely believed that Capt. Rous would be delighted to hear the complete refutation of the very heavy charges which he had brought against the company; but the present was neither the time nor the place for entering into such a refutation. If he once entered upon it, his statements would be met by counter-statements from other quarters, and those counter-statements would be again met with rebutters by the directors of the company, and thus the interest of a debate would be lessened which ought to refer to the great interests of the colony and its future good government. The details of all the charges made against the company by Capt. Rous had been inquired into by the select committee of last session; and on every one of them the company received a verdict of acquittal from that committee.—Mr. BARKLY (Leominster) observed, that nothing could be more inexplicable and imprudent than the conduct of Capt. Fitzroy, from the first moment of his arrival in New Zealand. Most of the difficulties of his position might have been foreseen before he went out, and guarded against by specific instructions. He suggested to Government the propriety of considering whether it would not be politic to buy up all the interest of the New Zealand Company in New Zealand, and to make those whom it had carried out there the instruments of raising that island at a future period into a prominent position among the nations of the world.—Sir R. INGLIS said that the great fallacy contained in the speech of Mr. C. Buller was, that in dealing with the natives of New Zealand, whom he erroneously represented as savages and cannibals, we were dealing with a people with whom the people of England were not justified in dealing on terms of equality. If Mr. C. Buller's statement were correct, the treaty of Waitangi might be what he called it—a sham: but believing as he did, that the natives of New Zealand had such notions of property as enabled them to recognise dominion over it: and knowing, as he did, that this Government had deliberately made a solemn recognition of their right to exercise that dominion, he could not acknowledge Mr. C. Buller's principle, that every acre on which the New Zealander had not employed a plough was as much the property of the company, or of any other first comer, as if it were an uninhabited country. From the moment you recognised the independence of New Zealand, you lost the right of dealing with its lands as the New Zealand Company had done. He then proceeded to defend the conduct of the missionaries in New Zealand from the charge of Mr. C. Buller, that they had been its false friends; and, as a proof of the inestimable benefits which they had conferred upon its inhabitants, stated that, though in the year 1814 a white man could not land and walk alone in safety in that island, it was now so far civilised and Christianised that the present Bishop of New Zealand had walked 300 miles alone, in the visitation of his diocese, in districts to which there were no roads for any conveyance to carry him, and had everywhere found among the natives a degree of kindness and hospitality which would do honour to the inhabitants of the most civilised portion of the world. He contended that we had proceeded upon an entirely wrong course in our intercourse with New Zealand, and supported the opposition which Mr. Hope had given to the motion of Mr. C. Buller.—Mr. HAWES complained that the speeches of Capt. Rous and Sir R. Inglis had both been made for the purpose of diverting the attention of the House from the real question before it, which was the conduct of Government towards the settlers in New Zealand, and towards their most important interests,—by referring first to the conduct of the company, and afterwards to that of the missionaries, which had nothing in the world to do with it. He fully subscribed to the conclusions contained in the report of the select committee of last session; but he thought that, although Mr. C. Buller had incorporated them into his resolutions, they would require some modification now, inasmuch as our information on the subject was enlarged, the disasters of the colony were more rife, and its dangers more imminent. The speech of Mr. Hope had given him no satisfaction, as it did not hold out the slightest expectation that Government would attempt to remedy the evils which had arisen in New Zealand. He then entered into a minute criticism and refutation of the principal positions in Mr. Hope's speech, and contended that all the distress, danger, difficulty, and insubordination of the colony had arisen from the misgovernment of the Colonial-office, which could not perform any of its duties well, because it had too many duties imposed upon it.—Sir H. DOUGLAS supported the views which had been so ably explained by Mr. Hope and Sir R. Inglis. He contended that it was the duty of Lord Glenelg to have prevented the formation of this colony in the first instance under the auspices of the New Zealand Company, and insisted that the Marquis of Normanby, instead of indulging in strong writing, ought to have taken strong measures against their audacious proceedings by stopping the sailing of their vessels. Had he been the Governor of New South Wales, of which New Zealand was a dependency, he would have seized on all the emigrants sent out by the company to New Zealand, and would have sent them all to New South Wales, there to remain until the Crown had authorised their settlement. He contended that the treaty of Waitangi must be maintained. The New Zealanders knew its stipulations, and if the British Government intended to violate them, it would be as well for it to be prepared with the means. At present there was no other force in that island than the regiment which he had the honour to command, and it was not provided with a single field gun. Even with a greater force, the country must be prepared to meet with double loss and injury to its present exalted character. Something, however, must be done to remedy the present evils under which that colony was labouring. He suggested to Government to resolve New Zealand into that higher order of colonial establishments which were entitled to a free representative system, and to call upon the New Zealand Company to surrender their charter, and, in case of their non-compliance, to annul it.—Lord HOWICK agreed so far with Sir H. Douglas in thinking that the establishment of a free representative would be the best cure for the existing evils of New Zealand, but he would not follow him into his irrelevant reflections on the proceedings of the company. He passed by the dispute between that company and Government, because he conceived it to be impossible for any man to misunderstand the agreement of November, 1840, and proceeded to the real question involved in this motion—namely, whether the policy of the Colonial Department towards this colony was calculated to promote the interests either of England, or of the settlers, or of the natives. He then took a review of the policy of the different administrations in this country since 1831 towards this colony, and although he was Under-Secretary for the Colonies at the time, admitted that the recognition of New Zealand as an independent state in that year was a mistake. Of all the Colonial administrations, that which was least to blame was that of Lord J. Russell. His despatches bore traces of a more profound and liberal policy towards New Zealand than those of his immediate predecessors or his immediate successors. He admitted that all the difficulties of New Zealand arose before Lord Stanley came into power, and that noble lord had nothing to answer for, with the exception—a very considerable exception nevertheless—of the appointment of Capt. Fitzroy. He then contended that the policy pursued towards New Zealand might be judged of by its fruits: and the House knew well how bitter those fruits had been. In commenting on the conduct of the New Zealand Company, he expressed his exceeding joy and satisfaction that these magnificent islands had been saved to the British Crown by its exertions; for it was quite clear that without them they would have been lost to us, and appropriated by another country. He contended that the scheme of colonisation adopted by that company had been wisely conceived, and that its directors had shown great ability and disinterestedness in carrying it into execution. He then proceeded to refute, point by point, the different arguments advanced by Mr. Hope, and contended that this obstruction of settlement, which had given rise to all the evils of New Zealand, had been created by our having taught the natives the lesson that it was the best mode of raising money for their land from the settlers. He lamented the timidity and pusillanimity with which Captain Fitzroy had acted on several occasions in cases of collision with the natives, and which he considered as utterly unworthy of any representative of the British Government; he showed that they had led the natives, in the first instance, to cease to respect our authority; and, in the next, to despise and defy it. Injurious as such conduct must have been to the settlers, the Colonial-office had not even written a despatch to Captain Fitzroy enjoining him to abstain from it in future. He further complained that Captain Fitzroy had not allowed the white men to protect themselves—which they were perfectly competent to do—but had positively refused to interfere with the natives, and had absolutely permitted them to commit any act of aggression and injustice they pleased. Was such a policy calculated to benefit the natives? or was it calculated to produce those tragic events which subsequently occurred, and that sacrifice of life which every man of humanity deplored? His decided conviction was, that that dreadful tragedy was traceable to the wretched policy of the Colonial-office towards the natives; and he said that the blood of the gallant gentlemen which was then shed called out to Parliament for more efficient protection to British subjects. In consequence of the frightful consequences with which that policy had been attended, their fellow-subjects in New Zealand had appealed to them for redress, and if they performed their duty conscientiously, that appeal must be successful.—On the motion of Mr. MANGLES the debate was then adjourned.

Thursday.—On the motion of the Earl of LINCOLN, the Commons Inclosure and Drainage of Land Bills were read a second time, with the understanding that any discussion which might be deemed necessary could take place on the bringing up of the report.—Sir J. GRAHAM fixed Monday next for the committee on the Irish Colleges Bill.—The adjourned debate on New Zealand was resumed by Mr. E. ELLICE, who expressed himself desirous of eliciting from Government what was its contemplated policy with respect to New Zealand. He considered that both the company and the Government had fallen into errors; but to the former the credit was unquestionably due of having, by energy and determination, preserved these islands to the Crown of Britain. Lord Stanley had committed the error of making war upon the New Zealand Company, instead of making use of it in the colonisation of the country, and his general treatment of the colony justified him in voting for Mr. C. Buller's motion.—Mr. CARDWELL, at considerable length, defended the course which had been pursued by Lord Stanley. The treaty of Waitangi was the only right on which this country could stand; and so thoroughly did the natives understand it, that, in their poetical language, they said, "we understand you perfectly; the shadow of the land goes to Queen Victoria, but the substance remains with us." If the company had purchased land without ascertaining the titles of the parties from whom they had bought it, they must endure the inconvenience.—Mr. MANGLES went at great length into the affairs of the company, and reviewed the whole course of the proceedings which have led to the present difficulties of the colonists, caused, as he contended, by the conduct of the Colonial-office.—Mr. COLQUHOUN called on Government to state what were its intentions with respect to the future management of the colony. —Mr. SHEIL showed that though the majority were habitual supporters of Government, they had distinctly condemned the conduct of Lord Stanley. The wealthiest merchants of London, without distinction of politics, had petitioned the House against the system by which this fine field for British enterprise had been rendered sterile.—Sir J. GRAHAM recapitulated the whole of the transactions in dispute between the Government and the company, defending the integrity of the treaty of Waitangi, and insisting that the company were bound to submit the validity of their purchases to the court appointed to examine into them. With respect to the succession to property, British subjects were, as a general rule, under British law in the colonies of this country. The new governor selected was Capt. Grey, whose character and experience was a guarantee for the future good administration of the affairs of the colony; and he hoped, therefore, that the House would not aggravate existing difficulties by agreeing to a vote which was avowed to be a direct censure on Lord Stanley.—Lord J. RUSSELL had entertained a hope on the opening of this debate that the time had at last arrived when the difficulties of this young colony and the means of rescuing it from them would be considered; but that hope was disappointed; for Mr. Cardwell and Sir J. Graham had both involved the question in party and political considerations, by declaring that if Lord Stanley was now in a position of some difficulty, it was owing to the mistakes of his predecessors. As the blame of the whole of these transactions was thus thrown upon him, he gave a detailed history of his connexion with the company, and of the proceedings which terminated in the treaty of Waitangi. He showed that the engagements of that treaty, and the engagement which he had made in November, 1840, with the Company, were not incompatible with each other, and in confirmation of his own opinion quoted that of the Select Committee of last session. His advice to the Government was—"Execute your treaty both in spirit and in letter—don't injure the aborigines, but on the other hand, don't break faith with the New Zealand Company." He then entered into an examination of the conduct of the local Government of New Zealand, and contended that though it might not have erred in intention, it had erred gravely in judgment. He showed that from the improper indulgence with which the natives had been treated with respect to their titles to land, and to the abolition of customs' duties, they had been encouraged to form a deliberate design to abandon our sovereignty. It, therefore, became necessary that the Government should tell the country what they intended to do. It was its duty to see that a colony, in which there were 14,000 British-born subjects and 100,000 natives, should not be endangered by the mal-administration of any person at the head of the Colonial Department. He then animadverted on the plan of Government which had been opened by Sir J. Graham. His singular scheme for placing a local tax on wild lands would not give satisfaction, as it was already known that the non-payment of that tax was to be a ground of confiscation. The fears of insurrection in New Zealand had been ridiculed, as weak and visionary; but he had no hesitation in saying that a real insurrection would, in all probability, follow such madness and such injustice. His opinion, which was formed upon recent events, now was, that Ministers ought to take means for introducing, within a year or 18 months at most, from this time, a representative Government into New Zealand. He expressed his readiness to go into committee on this subject. If the House entered into that investigation, it would console itself, within a very few days, with this reflection—that although it was engaged in a task that was unpalatable to the Government of the day, it was laying the foundation of a great colony, perhaps of a great empire, which would extend English institutions, English love of liberty, and the English name and language in the most distant parts of another hemisphere.—Sir R. PEEL, after some observations on the importance of the present question, and of the colony recently established in New Zealand, proceeded to remark that the real question at issue was whether the House would leave the care of that colony in the hands of the Executive Government, or take it into its own especial direction. The House was now in possession of the intentions of Ministers with respect to the future Government of New Zealand, and was therefore capable of judging whether those intentions were worthy of support or not. Representative government was, in his opinion, suited to the colony of New Zealand. The colony was not a penal colony, and therefore the objections which existed to such an institution in New South Wales at an early period of its history did not exist in New Zealand. He did not, however, think that it would be wise to establish a representative system there in connexion with a proprietary company here, as it would have a tendency to render the government of the colony more complicated even than it was at present. He considered that it would be most important to maintain the New Zealand Company in its present powers. He thought that it might be made an useful instrument in the administration of New Zealand, not interfering in affairs of State, but aiding the Government as a great commercial company in regulating and promoting emigration. He then proceeded to oppose the motion, on the ground that it affixed and was intended to affix a censure on Lord Stanley, and entered largely into the land question, defending the proceedings of Lord Stanley upon it from their commencement to their close. If, under such circumstances, they passed a vote of censure, they would pass it upon one who had not yielded to the influence of a powerful party which had many supporters on both sides of the House, but who considered that the regard due to the honour and good faith of his country compelled him to maintain a national engagement, which controlled the avidity of the powerful and strong, and guaranteed the rights of the weak and unprotected.—Mr. C. BULLER made a brief reply to the arguments of Ministers, which he designated as a singular specimen of shabby and miserable shuffling and as Pensylvanian repudiation, without its openness and boldness. Ministers had given no guarantee to the House that the past misgovernment of New Zealand would not be renewed; for, instead of giving the settlers a representative system, they fobbed them off with municipal institutions. The House then divided, when the numbers were—For the committee, 172; against it, 223; majority against it, 51. The Lords' amendments to the Railway Clauses Consolidated (Scotland) Bill, No. 2, were considered, and the compensation clause relating to Scotch landlords negatived.

Friday.—After several petitions had been presented praying for further inquiry into the respective merits of the broad and narrow gauges, Lord INGESTRE said, the question was one of great importance. He thought the weight of evidence was decidedly in favour of the broad gauge, and would, therefore move the consideration of the report on the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton railway.—Mr. COBDEN moved, as an amendment, that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to appoint a commission to inquire into the comparative merits of the broad and narrow gauges, and to report thereon to the House.—Col. WOOD seconded the amendment.—Mr. SHAW opposed it because it was not the battle of the gauges, but of the two rival companies, the Birmingham and the Great Western: he therefore supported the decision of the committee of which he had been chairman. This decision was also supported by Mr. LABOUCHERE, Mr. BERNAL, and Sir R. PEEL; and a long discussion ensued in which Sir G. GREY, Sir G. CLERK, Sir T. WILDE, and other speakers, took part. The House, which was one of the fullest of the session, had not divided when we went to press; but from the tone of the debate there was every probability that the report of the committee would be received.—[Left sitting.]

The Bar.—By an order of pension, made by the benchers of Gray's inn, in December, 1844, Mr. Pyke was disbarred and expelled the society, for professional practices derogatory to the bar. Mr. Pyke appealed against that order to the judges, as visitors of the inns of court, and was heard at considerable length upon such appeal on two evenings, appointed by the judges for that purpose, at Serjeant's-inn-hall. On the 9th instant the judges again met to deliver their judgment upon the appeal. Eleven judges were present, and upon entering the hall they took their seats at the table at the upper end, and immediately upon being seated Lord Denman delivered the decision of the Court:—"We have considered the application of Mr. Pyke against the order made by the Treasurer and Masters of the bench of the Hon. Society of Gray's-inn, and are unanimously of opinion that the order appealed against should be affirmed." The judges, who were all robed, immediately rose and quitted the hall.

The late Rev. Sydney Smith.—The daily papers announce, on the authority of the booksellers, that Mr. Thomas Moore is engaged on a biography of the Rev. Sydney Smith, with the entire concurrence of the family. It is expected that the correspondents of Mr. Smith will put Mr. Moore in the possession of the many brilliant and interesting letters which must be scattered in all quarters.

The Case of Messrs. Smith, the Distillers.—It is stated in the Excise department, that an arrangement has been come to in this case, which has long occupied public attention, by a compromise on the part of the defendants and the Crown authorities. It is believed that the terms are that Messrs. Smith are to pay the whole of the expenses incurred in the late prosecution, and to entirely remove the rectifying-house, from which the communication, declared by Act of Parliament to be illegal, existed with the distillery. The rectifying-house is in the course of demolition, and there is every probability that the business will be resumed in the course of the ensuing week.

The Waterloo Barracks in the Tower.—Saturday was appointed for the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Waterloo Barracks, opposite the north side of the White Tower, on the site of the small armoury destroyed by the fire in 1841. The erection of the Waterloo barracks is the commencement of the very great and important improvements that are to take place in this fortress; in fact, in the course of a few years, it will be so greatly altered that but for the White Tower, and the different gates and batteries, it will scarcely be recognised as the same depôt. For several months past the Board of Ordnance have been serving notices of ejectment on the principal residents, their dwellings being required for the necessary improvements. The ceremony on Saturday was performed by the Duke of Wellington, assisted by Col. Gurwood, Major Elrington, Capt. Boldero, &c., the religious service being performed by the Rev. H. Melvill. The barracks will be 288 feet in length, 61 in breadth, and 70 in height. The architecture will be in strict keeping with the style of the White Tower. The building will be three stories high, the entrance to be between two octagon towers, surmounted by the royal arms and a clock. It is expected that the work will occupy two years.

The New Houses of Parliament.—Messrs. Foley, Marshall, and Bell, have been selected by the Commissioners of the Fine Arts to execute the statues of Hampden, Falkland, and Clarendon, for the New Houses of Parliament. Mr. Marshall executed the "Eve gathering the apple," and Mr. Bell the "Eagle-slayer," last year exhibited in the exposition of fresco and sculpture at Westminster-hall.

Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1203; males, 635; females, 568.

Deal.—The lighthouse on the Goodwin remains still without the promised light, in consequence of Mr. Bush having been unable, up to the present time, to come to any understanding with the Trinity Board, which has the exclusive privilege of managing lighthouses on the coast. Permission having been granted however by Government for the erection of the building to contain the "Light for all nations," it is the intention of Mr. Bush to take up his residence, with his wife and family, in the lighthouse, and to have the highest chamber illuminated with a pale blue light for his own use. This will at the same time have the effect of warning ships, and a telegraph is erected to signalise vessels at the back of the Goodwin. As the lighthouse stands 36 feet above high-water mark, it is Mr. Bush's intention, in order to protect his new residence, to discharge rockets in dark nights, or sound a gong in foggy weather. On landing at Deal, after sleeping three nights in the lighthouse, Mr. Bush was warmly congratulated on his "safe arrival."

Exeter.—The Bishop of Exeter held his long-anticipated visitation in the Cathedral on Monday, in the presence of a large number of the clergy. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. Bartholomew. Its distinctive feature was an unmeasured denunciation of the asserted right of private judgment, and a strenuous maintenance of apostolical succession. The Bishop then delivered his charge, which was so long that even the condensed report of it occupies 3½ columns of close print in the Times. The following contains a few extracts from the more important portions. The bishop commenced by referring to the incidents of last winter, and his pastoral letter founded on the advice given to him by the Chapter.

"He need not go into the painful details of the circumstances which followed—suffice it to say, that it having been said that the advice which he had had was not the advice of the whole body of the Chapter—that they were not unanimous—popular prejudice seized hold of it, goaded by the daily efforts of the most powerful portion of the public press, which, having communicated its own impulses to the popular delusion, animated it with a degree of virulence and fanaticism of which it could hardly have been thought susceptible. This party being swollen by a numerous party in our own Church, their conduct burst forth in a series of excesses which even those who had shared in them did not fail ultimately to deplore. The inhabitants of this city had long believed themselves to be distinguished by zeal for the Church, and these very results did in truth carry with them a most excellent and instructive proof to tell what was the church membership of those who called themselves Churchmen on this occasion. In too many instances it embraced all the fanaticism of the puritans of Charles I., without their zeal or their consistency. The denouncers of Romanism and innovations had a total oblivion of principle, and an equal forgetfulness of fact, in demanding the maintenance of things as they are; for in the eyes of these gentlemen it was called innovation to abandon the practice of 20 years' standing—to revert to that of our own Church in its best days. Accordingly, these opponents of innovation were seen during the late disorders to express themselves most strongly against the use of the surplice in the pulpit. They said the surplice was a vestment never used in the pulpit, when it had been constantly used in almost all the pulpits of this very diocese within the memory of living men; had been, in some cases, continually worn still; and had only been by his Lordship required to be worn by all in order to prevent the wearing of it being taken as a party badge. The cry of 'No Popery' was raised upon this order—a cry so loud as to trouble the whole Church with its violence, and alarm the law of the land. The Puritans had some reason on their side; it was said they had objected to the surplice altogether, as a garment tainted with the abominations of Rome; they were not so absurd as to denounce it as popish when used in the pulpit and not in the reading-desk—they never used it at all. They did not understand the principle of receiving it with reverence in the reading-desk, and rejecting it as popish in the pulpit, where popery never used it. This was an extravagance which had been reserved for the enlightened age in which we lived, and pre-eminently for our own time. Their Bishop's fault was giving them credit for such a measure of intelligence, if not of Church feeling, as would have protected them from falling into such a gross delusion. Again, let him take the two remarkable services objected to—the prayer for the Church militant and the Offertory prayer. The prayer for the Church militant bore on its face a protest against some of the foulest corruptions—the doctrine of purgatory, which, with its kindred practice of indulgence, was the immediate cause of the reformation. The denunciations of this prayer showed that it was one which we did not derive from Rome. The Offertory prayer was most truly Anglican—almost exclusively Protestant—yet it was clamoured against as an overt act of a conspiracy to bring back popery. Once more the use of the Offertory here and elsewhere experienced the same resistance, or rather there were two reasons for its resistance equally erroneous, for wilfishness came to the aid of ignorance. Accordingly the Offertory was denounced as popery, and, above all, as priestcraft, though the collection of the money for any other purpose than those of the priesthood was the peculiar distinction in this case in contradistinction to the custom of Rome, and although the objects of it, as recommended to his Lordship by the clergy, were those only of the purest benevolence. It was, indeed, argued by persons who ought to have known better, or who ought not to have argued against their better knowledge, that the law of Queen Elizabeth for levying a rate for the poor not only precluded the necessity, but forbade the practice of the Offertory. One very high authority, of which he must say something more by-and-by, had said that this collection had reference to the poor man's box, and went to the alms of a particular parish; and this statement was adduced for a twofold purpose—first, to show that since the enactment for the poor there never had been any collection in the church, except when the Sacrament was administered (an argument which ill accorded with itself); and, secondly, it excluded all other parties from participating in the collection. However high was the authority who made this assertion, it would seem that he could not have been aware of the facts; for not only was the assertion itself not true, but the phrase, 'the poor man's box,' was not true. It was struck out of the rubrics of the Church 40 years after the Poor-law was enacted; and the very words were inserted, for the 'purpose of giving alms to the poor and other pious purposes.' So that it was not to be given to the poor only, but to be disposed of for such pious purposes as the ordinary and the authorities of the Church thought fit. The facts of the case were manifested by a crowd of witnesses, too numerous to be gainsayed." The bishop referred to the conduct of the clergy in the recent contest; and complained of the "timid, hesitating, faltering spirit in which they had met his call." "He was entitled to expect from all a cheerful and steady obedience; a bishop ought not to be foiled as he had been foiled. By more than one deanery he had been informed that they would defer the consideration of his order till other bishops and other dioceses should have deliberated on the same matter. By those of another deanery, who had at first promised to comply, but on the resistance of a clamorous party found a sufficient reason to forego their own promise of obedience, and by a vote of only a bare majority—as his lordship was informed, one only was the majority against the indignant reclamations of the rest, calling them to obey—they chose rather to break their promise, and rival the remonstrants. These things ought not to have been; they could not have been in any Church whose ministers had fully learned their own duty, or who had ventured to teach the people the duty which they owed to it. And here one particular presented itself, which his lordship would gladly pass over if necessity did not compel him to do otherwise. It was unhappily too notorious, and this necessity alone induced him to depart from that silence which he would gladly have preserved. It seemed that some of his clergy had sought the opinion of counsel to advise them whether, if they chose to disobey the order of their bishop for the use of the surplice, they would incur any legal penalty. Where could these clergy have picked up their notion of the authority of a bishop in the church? Not in their own solemn obligations when they took upon themselves their office, for they then vowed that they would reverendly obey the ordinary and other chief ministers unto whom was committed the charge and government over them, following with a glad mind and will their godly admonitions, and submitting themselves to their godly judgments;—not in their oaths of institution, for they then swore that they would pay due counsel and obedience, not only to the precepts of the gospel, but to the prayer-book and the order of service appointed for the church generally. His lordship then said, it was true that was not the only part of England in which these differences had arisen, and it was but justice to the people of this diocese to say, that they were stimulated not only by churchwardens, but also by more elevated persons, from whom it was least to be expected. In particular the bishop of another diocese (Worcester) in the exercise of the discretion which belonged to him, thought fit at this very peculiar season to address the candidates for the holy office in a tone which, to his lordship, was the subject of most painful feeling. He desired them to take an opposite course to that which the Bishop of Exeter had taken, and what the Bishop of Worcester now stated to be not only rash and unadvised for, but to have been grounded on fallacious premises. After stating his objections to the views of Bishop Pepys in regard to collections made in churches, his lordship proceeded to censure the charge lately delivered at Chester by Chancellor Raikes, as containing matters of the most exciting kind, and he must take leave to say, of the most schismatic character. One of the most extraordinary assertions was, that the laity were one, as they would call them, the main body or great body of the Church; but the reverend Chancellor called them the Church itself. Even this was not enough. This ecclesiastical judge was represented to have said, in contradiction to the law which he was bound to administer, and had solemnly sworn not to misrepresent—he said, that the collection for the poor was superseded, and the prayer for the church militant was worse than useless, for it might interfere with the efforts of the preacher. His lordship denounced this setting up of preaching above prayer—this exaltation of the conceits of the minister above the collective piety of the church. Yet this was a portion of the official instructions of the Chancellor of a great diocese, delivered formally to the churchwardens, in order, as he himself expressed it, 'that they might vindicate the rights of the laity.' They could hardly seek for a higher authority for resistance, even in very high places, than was afforded here. It appealed to that fanatical spirit which two centuries ago overthrew the Church, and with it the throne also. The truth was, that the disputes of the last two centuries were almost every one of them fomented by the same spirit, a spirit which, professing to be in the Church, was very anxious to extinguish its life and pervert its truth." * * * His Lordship then referred to the period of his last charge, when he exerted his feeble power to warn the Tractarians of the mischief which they did in violating the principle of subscription. Their efforts tended to corrupt the sincerity, to pervert the understanding, and defile the conscience of youth. Some of this party, it was said, were now about to leave them; better far that they should go whither their convictions carried them, than that they should remain where they had no longer an honest stand-

On them he called, not by argument, for it was fa... to their own hearts, but by the feelings which were now ... stirring within their own breasts, and which spoke to them more forcibly than he could speak. If the Church of their fathers was to be the Church of their sons—if the myriads upon myriads which this great country was every year sending forth from its shores were to be faithful supporters, not of an establishment merely, but of that Church which God himself had planted in this land—if they were to sit under its shade and be sheltered by its truth—if all was not to be abandoned to a spurious philosophy and a false religion—if, in short, England was to be saved, it must be saved, under God, by a faithful, zealous, and energetic clergy, and by these alone. There was, he said, a population in this country who were at this moment as much without the knowledge of the holy Scriptures and the sacrament as any of the wildest savages who devoured each other in New Zealand. The result was such as must be a disregard of all sacred and moral restraints—defiance, where practicable, of all lawful authority. We had laid up a store of elemental mischief, which would, sooner or later, burst forth with a wider devastation than had ever gone before. Every year aggravated the danger, every alternation of commercial prosperity brought to the reflecting mind fresh assurance of the approaching ruin. The very glut and surfeit of national wealth in which we were rejoicing, the unparalleled activity and prosperity of our manufactures, the growing demand for labour in every field of activity, should excite only an accumulated apprehension for more desperate reverses; and let it not be thought that the official education, general education not excluding religious education, but admitting it with other things as a mere matter of school knowledge, and teaching it after some fashion that should be acceptable to all,—let it not be thought that education of this kind would do. Many of those unhappy beings were as well instructed in the arts and sciences as the mechanics' institutes could make them. Many who had been highly educated, whose scientific attainments were not mean, might find themselves left behind by these students in the mechanics' institutes, even in the mathematics or in the higher branches of astronomy itself. But it was not knowledge, but discipline, that was wanted—the discipline of the heart, the chastening influence of true religion. If that be not supplied, if the purifying spirit of the gospel be not breathed by the corrupt and fermenting masses, the contest would and must, God only knew how soon, take place. Property would assert its right, the monarchy its supremacy: they would win, it might be, with a bloody victory; but so long as spiritual darkness should be permitted to cover the face of our population the real source of the evil would remain; the conflict would be renewed; toil ill requited, misery unpitied, violence untamed by religion, and unappalled by any danger which man's laws could denounce, would return to the conflict with the untiring energy of a demon. The contest could not be ultimately doubtful, but the existence of the various orders of society would be perilled; ay, and the richest portion of spiritual blessing which the goodness of God ever yet permitted man to have. This must be the end of our blind, our senseless, our Godless course, if we changed it not. There was yet, however, time for change; a dawn of a better day awaited us. If ever the duty of a nation—if ever the true policy of a Government pointed to one act, it was the necessity to vanquish the heathen feeling in our own land. We must carry the bread of life to those of our own people whose souls were perishing for lack thereof; we must raise them to a sense of their high destiny; we must sustain them with the appointed ministry, and, by God's mercy, awaken those feelings of morality which were now slumbering. If facts were necessary to establish the necessity of the case, those facts were abundant: during the frightful disturbances in the manufacturing districts in the autumn of 1842, agitation was successful or unsuccessful in nearly the exact proportion to the success or failure of previous exertions to bring such places within the influence of the Church. It was found, without contradiction, that among the rioters there was no one taken who was a clergyman in full membership with her communion; and hence the hostility of the rioters to the ministers of the Church. They thought the Church to be the organ of order, and the best barrier against riot. These facts were pressed upon the Parliament, and something was done by legislation, but in the way in which modern legislation is ever wont to proceed. His lordship then referred to the measure passed by Parliament for endowing 200 ministers in districts of 2000 inhabitants each, remarking on the reluctant spirit manifested in it. He condemned the spirit in which the Government looked at the Church, as a mere spiritual police, confounded with other sects and denominations. A grant to the "Royal College of Maynooth" excited their warm interest, but aid to the Church was a matter which secured the most reluctant attention.

Great Yarmouth—The total loss of life arising from the late accident at Yarmouth is 79 (bodies found 77), and providentially not one of that number had any person dependant on him or her. Only eight or 10 of the deceased exceeded 21 years of age. Another bridge, on piles, has since been thrown over the river near the site of the former suspension-bridge, the platform of this latter being used to form the road-way of the present.

Jersey.—A letter from Jersey, dated June 11, brings information that the civic authorities had held a long consultation on the case of Mr. Carus Wilson. Several of them contended that they had entered on a process of which they could see no end; that the expense would be enormous, and that it was much better to give up the contest, and throw open the prison doors to Mr. Wilson. This opinion prevailed, the decision was forwarded to the gaoler, and on the 11th inst. that gentleman was set at liberty.—The Jersey Times says, that "The Deputy Viscount proceeded to the prison, and informed Mr. Wilson that the gates were now open to him. Although somewhat astonished at the unexpected concession, Mr. Wilson did not appear influenced by the same feelings which actuate most individuals on being visited with an unlooked-for benefit. Replying to the announcement, Mr. Wilson said that, finding himself perfectly comfortable in his present domicile, he was not in the slightest desirous to change his quarters, and that he would not leave the prison till force compelled him. Ejectment being thus challenged, force was speedily had recourse to, and the now no longer prisoner was dislodged from his cell."

Portsmouth.—The long-protracted inquest on the body of Mr. Seton was brought to a close on Tuesday. The principal witness examined on that day was Mrs. Hawkey, wife of Lieut. Hawkey, who made a long and extraordinary statement of various insults which she had received from the deceased, and which she had for a long time concealed from her husband because he was "very tenacious," although she had told the particulars to Mr. Pym, who officiated as Mr. Hawkey's second at the duel. Four other witnesses were examined, and when their evidence had closed, the Coroner summed up, and the jury retired to consider their verdict. The jury, after having been absent about half an hour, returned into the Guildhall, and, by their chairman, Mr. Grant, returned the following verdict:—"We find that the immediate cause of Mr. Seton's death was the result of a surgical operation, rendered imperatively necessary by the imminent danger in which he was placed by the infliction of a gun-shot wound he received on the 20th May last, in a duel with Henry Charles Morehead Hawkey, of the Royal Marines. We, therefore, find the said Lieut. Hawkey and Lieut. Edward Pym, as well as all the parties concerned in the said duel, Guilty of Wilful Murder. The jury would further express their unanimous conviction that everything which the best professional skill, the greatest attention, and the utmost kindness could suggest, was rendered to Mr. Seton by his respective medical attendants."

The Standing Orders Committee of the House of Peers have come to the resolution that, in respect to the three bills which had been referred to it, the standing orders of the House had been complied with. These are the Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings (Keymer branch); the Belfast and Ballymena; and the Edinburgh and Glasgow. The following bills have also passed the committees:—Dunstable and Birmingham and London; York and Scarborough (deviation); Whitby and Pickering; Scottish Central; Bedford and London; Eastern Counties (Ely and Whittlesea Deviation); Shrewsbury, Oswestry, and Chester; Manchester and Leeds (Burnley, Oldham, and Heywood); Berks and Hants; Lowestoff Railway and Harbour; North British; Blackburn, Darwen, and Bolton; Yarmouth and Norwich; London and Greenwich; York and North Midland (Bridlington branch); Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Tynemouth extension); Great North of England and Richmond; Dundee and Perth; Newcastle and Berwick; Bridgewater Navigation and Railway; Clydesdale Junction; Caledonian; Aberdeen; Lancaster and Carlisle; Dublin and Drogheda; York and North Midland (Harrowgate branch); Ely and Huntingdon; Leeds and West Riding Junction; Lynn and Ely; Edinburgh and Harwich; Southampton and Dorchester: Kendal and Windermere; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth; Midland (Nottingham and Lincoln), Great Grimsby, and Sheffield. It may be as well to mention that, on the second reading of these bills, if any opposition be offered to one or more of them, it or they will be referred to another committee, of which the Earl of Shaftesbury is chairman, and five peers will be nominated to form a select committee for the consideration of such bill or bills.—In the House of Commons, the Cambridge and Lincoln Company presented a petition praying for leave to amend the error in their datum line, and commence de novo; but the House, after some discussion, rejected the petition. The report on the Cornwall Bill was received on Tuesday, after an amendment moved by Mr F. Berkeley, and supported by Mr. Pendarves and Captain Plumridge, had been negatived without a division. The different committees have been fully occupied during the week. In the following cases it has been decided that the preamble has been proved:—Birmingham and Gloucester Extension (Berkeley Canal), the Wear Valley, Great North of England (Clarence and Hartlepool Junction), London and South Western, Erewash Valley, Edinburgh and Direct Northern, Liverpool and Manchester, Liverpool and Bury, the Aberdare, the Garnskirk, and Edinburgh and Glasgow Junction of the Gloucester and Bristol. The Committee on the South Wales have decided, that although the preamble of the Bill is proved, the success of the whole scheme of the South Wales Railway so entirely depends upon the bridge at Hock Crib, to which the Admiralty object, that they cannot consent to proceed in the investigation of a measure which the promoters have not the power of accomplishing. The committee on the Southport and Euxton Branch have decided that a communication between those towns was most desirable, but that, as a better project than that which had been proposed might be proposed, they postponed their further consideration of the preamble to the ensuing session. They have also decided against the Coventry, Bedworth, and Nuneaton. On Monday the House of Commons issued two volumes (each upwards of 300 folio pages), being Parts I. & II. of the "Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee on the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway, and Oxford and Rugby Railway Bills." This is the first publication of such massive evidence upon any of the numerous Bills that have occupied, and continue to occupy, so large a portion of the time of Parliament. This evidence was ordered by the House to be printed on the 10th inst., on the motion of Sir G. Grey.—The new railway schemes for the past week are nine in number. They are the Limerick and Clare Union; Dublin and Armagh (inland); City of London Junction, to connect at one station all the lines in the kingdom; London and Oxford direct; Tean and Dewe Valley, Eastern and Western Junction; Rugby, Market Harborough, and Cambridge; East and West of England Junction; Buckingham and London; Birmingham, Edinburgh, and Peebles.—On Thursday week, being the Cup day at Ascot, the Great Western conveyed to Slough from Paddington upwards of 10,000 passengers, 300 horses, and 150 carriages. One train was nearly a ½ mile long.—During the heavy thunder-storm on Friday, one of the needles on the dial of the electric telegraph at the Southampton terminus became unfitted for use by its polarity being destroyed by the electric fluid, which was communicated to it from without by means of the connecting wires. The attendant was working the telegraph at the time, and received a smart shock from the handle.—Tuesday morning an accident of a most alarming nature, which might have been extremely lamentable, and, indeed, fatal in its results, took place on the Great Western Railway, near the Langley station, about 2½ miles on the London side of Slough. The express train left Paddington at 9h. 45m., for Exeter—the whole distance (194 miles), since this fast train has been established, being performed in 4½ hours. The train consisted of the engine and tender, a luggage van, two second-class, and two first-class carriages. Upon the arrival of the train at a point called Dog-kennel-bridge, the passengers experienced an undulatory sort of motion, and shortly afterwards the gravel and dust between the rails was thrown up in clouds into the carriages, to the great alarm of the passengers; and before a few seconds had elapsed, the two first-class and the one of the second-class carriages were thrown with fearful violence off the line, down an embankment 12 or 15 feet in depth, with a most alarming crash. The screams of the passengers at this moment were heartrending. Indeed, it was imagined that scarcely one could have been preserved, so sudden and dreadful was the catastrophe. The first of the two second-class carriages was dragged completely across the four lines of rails, which, having become disconnected from the luggage van, was there left in that position, while the engine with its tender and van proceeded onwards. The whole of the carriages were nearly filled with passengers, there being upwards of 130 second-class and between 50 and 60 first-class passengers. The only carriage having but four wheels was the luggage van. Within a quarter of an hour after the accident had occurred, intelligence of it reached Slough. Mons. Dotesio, of the Royal Hotel, immediately had a dozen of his carriages put into requisition to convey medical and other aid to the sufferers, and in less than half an hour several professional men were on the spot. In a short space of time all were extracted from their perilous positions; and it is gratifying to state, that amongst the mass of human beings thus hurled over an embankment 15 feet in depth, travelling at such extraordinary speed, not one life was sacrificed! The second-class carriage, and the hindermost first-class carriage, were thrown upon their sides at the bottom of the embankment, while the other first-class carriage, which had turned twice over in the course of its descent, was lying upon its roof, with its wheels in the air, the passengers, 30 in number, more dead than alive with fright and alarm. The engine and tender still remained on the rails, while the luggage-van, although off the line, continued attached to the tender, and in its upright position. The cause of the accident is not yet positively ascertained, but it is supposed that the luggage-van, which was attached to the tender preceding the passenger carriages, must have been canted off the line, and, before the engine driver could be made acquainted with the fact, drew the carriages off the rails. In this manner they proceeded nearly half a mile, when the carriages were thrown completely over; the engine-driver, on perceiving the danger, very promptly, and at the risk of his life, detached the engine from the tender and carriages, and thus by breaking the connection, prevented the serious consequences which otherwise must inevitably have ensued. The driver and engine then proceeded to Slough station, and reported the circumstance to the superintendent, who proceeded to the spot, and with little delay brought the whole of the sufferers to Slough. Amongst those who were injured were Sir Richard Vyvyan, severely cut about the forehead; Dr. Strong, of Hoss (accompanied by Mrs. Strong, their two children and nursemaid, who escaped with slight injuries), a bruised knee; the Rev. Collingwood Hughes, of Chard, and the governess, the latter of whom received severe internal injuries; Mr. Bristow, from Haverfordwest, dislocated shoulder; and Mr. Colin Robertson, late of Honiton, who was proceeding to Plymouth as the newly appointed manager of the National Provincial Bank of England at that port, severe contusion under the eye. Mr. Wadland, paymaster and purser of H.M.S. Excellent, at Portsmouth, sustained a serious wound over the left eye; his shoulder and back were also bruised. Mr., Mrs., and Miss Shute, of Southwell Park, Tewkesbury, were uninjured. One young lady, from the violence of the concussion, was actually thrown from one carriage into another, and escaped with a few slight bruises. One gentleman is suffering from a dislocation of the left shoulder joint, and a lady with one of the small bones of her nose displaced. A gentleman, named Holmes, sustained a severe scalp wound and internal injuries. Capt. Blagg, of Brentford, was unable to proceed on his journey, from a severe injury on the arm and leg. Mr. Miles, M.P., received a violent bruise on the shoulder; other persons were more or less injured. Amongst those who were in the carriages officially connected with the railway, were Mr. Brunel, the engineer-in-chief; Mr. Jones, in Mr. Brunel's establishment; and Mr. Seymour Clarke, the chief superintendent of the locomotive department, accompanied by Mrs. Clarke. All these parties providentially escaped with but trifling bruises. In consequence of four of the upright posts of the telegraph being knocked down by the upsetting of the carriages, and the wires severed, all communication by means of the galvanic telegraph, between Slough and Paddington, has been cut off. This, unfortunately, caused considerable time to elapse before any intimation of the accident reached the Paddington terminus.

Ireland.

Dublin.—It is stated in the Whig papers, on authority which they describe as likely to be well informed, that several more Bills, founded upon the report of the landlord and tenant commission, have been prepared, and will shortly be presented to Parliament. Those Bills have the following objects:—1. To turn tenures for lives, renewable for ever, into fee-farms. 2. To extend the same principle to college leases. 3. To regulate the registry-office for deeds. 4. To enable tenants for life to improve estates, as in Scotland. 5. To facilitate making leases and exchanges of land. 6. To assimilate the law of fines and recoveries of Ireland to that of England. 7. For the registry of deaths, births, and marriages, in Ireland. 8. To amend the grand jury laws. 9. To regulate dispensaries, fever hospitals, &c. 10. To facilitate sales of encumbered estates. 11. To enable courts of equity to make leases binding on inheritors and incumbrancers, such leases to be consistent with leasing powers. All those objects, it is stated, are to be embraced in the contemplated bills, which it is understood the Government are anxious to have passed this session, if possible.

Mr. O'Connell arrived in Dublin on Friday, on return from the Cork demonstration, and set off for London immediately, in order to be in the House of Commons on Monday evening. The following is his own announcement of his intention to do so from his speech at Cork at the open air meeting held in that town on Wednesday. He said—"I am going to-morrow to Parliament. I have been summoned to Parliament. I have been summoned to my place there in a way that is irresistible. But if they sent their pursuivant after me, I would treat the message very differently. I am going there now at the call of duty, and I hope to be in London on Monday next for three especial objects, which I consider it my duty to attend to. The first is the Irish Banking Bill, brought in by Sir J. Graham. It was an excellent Bill according to his statement, and I accepted it, and proclaimed that it would be useful to the Irish people. Well, he printed the Bill, and it is found essentially and injuriously short of his statements. There is a man for you to confide in. I go to Parliament to expose the fallacy and denounce the duplicity of that measure. As I did not hear him make his speech upon the subject he may deny his statements, and throw them upon the reporters. Ah, these reporters are sad fellows. I learn also that Lord Stanley's Bill has been brought in, and to look after this I will go over. The Bill has materials in it which give to the tenantry of Ireland the full amount of all the money and labour they may lay out. For this I am ready to do Lord Stanley justice, though he is, I confess, not a very loveable man. If he does a good act, however, he shall have my warm support and approbation; but if there be a little Peelish dexterity in him, I may as well be on the spot to detect it, and I assure you I will not keep the secret. If there be anything injurious to the agricultural population of Ireland in this Bill, I will not allow it to pass, at least this session. By dividing on every clause of it, the session is so far advanced, that it may be protracted until the shooting season comes on and the House breaks up. The other point I am going over about is the 'Education Bill.' I confess I have the strongest abhorrence of that Bill. There are few advocates in this country, thank Heaven, of godless education, or who dare to avow that they wish for any other species of education but a religious one. For my part, I will never consent to have the Catholic people of this country brought up in liberal infidelity. I wish to have them educated, but it must be in their duties to man, and especially in their duties to God, as the basis of all other information. It is time, I say, to bestir ourselves. It would be an advantage to Cork, some say, if some thousands of pounds were expended in it; but I know the Cork people will not yield to reasoning of this kind, They will never traffic one particle of their faith or religion for any pecuniary benefit. The more I think of that Bill the more I distrust it."

Archbishop M'Hale has applied himself to the new colleges scheme, which he denounces in the strongest terms in an epistle addressed to the Premier. The following, which is the first sentence of the letter, will give some idea of the remainder. "Tuam, June 7, 1845. Sir,—The infidel, and slavish, and demoralising scheme of academic education which you scruple not to proffer to the faithful people of Ireland is a proof that we should be more apprehensive for the faith and liberties of this country during a period of political cajolery than during one of avowed persecution."

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday in Conciliation-hall, Mr. O'Neil Daunt in the chair. In consequence of the absence of Mr. O'Connell, the attendance was very scanty. The chairman, after condemning the recent measures of Government, said that the Education Bill was intended to divide the Irish people, as the Maynooth grant was intended to bribe the Irish priesthood. He denounced the proceedings in the House of Commons on Friday night, in reference to Mr. O'Brien, as a piece of outrageous blackguardism. The English anti-repeal press, for some time back, had been continually urging the Irish Repeal representatives to go over and attend to their Parliamentary duties. Smith O'Brien went over, and what was the result? He was met with gross insult and foul vituperation. Nothing could turn the Irish people from the Repeal when they saw one of the most useful and respected of their representatives insulted in the Saxon senate. For his own part he never would abandon the struggle, by which they would eventually wring the independence of their country from the felon gripe of England.—Mr. M. O'CONNELL, M.P., brought forward a motion to the effect that an address to the Repealers of the north be prepared by the committee of the association, solemnly advising them not to interfere with any procession of Orange demonstration which might take place during the ensuing months. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Steele, and unanimously adopted.—Mr. M. O'CONNELL spoke at considerable length in condemnation of Lord Stanley's Landlord and Tenant Bill, and moved that it be referred to the Parliamentary Committee of the Association to report on.—Mr. DUNNE having seconded the resolution, Mr. GRATTAN, M.P., proceeded to speak in support of it, and took occasion strongly to censure the language used by Mr. Roebuck in reference to the members of the Repeal Association. He denied that either he, or Smith O'Brien, or any other member of the Association was desirous of reviving religious bigotry, spreading discontent, or fomenting vulgar prejudices. It was grossly, meanly false to say that they were actuated by such motives. He asserted his right as an Irishman to brand the statement as a lie. When on a former occasion Mr. Roebuck spoke slightingly of the Irish gentlemen who thought proper to absent themselves from Parliament, he (Mr. Grattan) wrote to him to ask if he were one of the Irish members alluded to, and what was the reply of Mr. Roebuck? Why, he sheltered himself under the privileges of Parliament. He would not call Mr. Roebuck a coward, but would leave the people of Ireland to form their estimate of his character from the fact he had stated. He had mistaken the character of the English representatives. He had supposed that the cowardly and concentrated venom of their national prejudice was to be vented against O'Connell alone, but he now saw that every Irishman who entered the House of Commons was to be hooted down, as Mr. O'Brien was on Friday last.—The rent for the week was very nearly 400*l*.

Scotland.

Edinburgh.—Prince Henry, third son of the King of Holland, arrived in Leith Roads last week, in a frigate of 68 guns. His Royal Highness remained only a few days, during which he visited the principal objects of interest in this city, and also paid a hurried visit to Glasgow, Dalkeith Palace, &c. The Prince sailed on the 13th from the Frith, on his way to Iceland, where he is to make a short stay, and then sail to St. John's, Newfoundland, whence, if the season is not too far advanced, he will proceed to Halifax.

Sporting.

Frauds on the Turf.—The Stewards of the Jockey Club have this week published the report of an investigation into a charge against Mr. Crommelin of having offered John Day, jun., a large bribe to procure the defeat of the horse then called the Melody colt, in the Derby of 1840. This charge, founded upon a statement made to Mr. Etwall, the proprietor of the horse, by John Day, jun., was supported only by his own evidence, which the Stewards find to be utterly unworthy of belief, contradicted as it was on many important points, by letters in his own handwriting of that date, addressed to Mr. Crommelin, and produced by him. The Stewards, however, state that Mr. Crommelin's connection and intimacy with both the Days who were in the habit of communicating to him the secrets of their stable was discreditable to all the parties concerned, and in regard to the chief delinquent they say:—"John Day, jun., having before us endeavoured to support a criminal charge by wilful falsehood, we direct that he be warned off the course at Newmarket, and out of the Coffee-room-yard there, and be not permitted to ride in any race at Newmarket. We also recommend the proprietors and stewards of all racecourses, where the rules of the Jockey Club are in force, to prevent him from appearing on such courses. Signed "Stradbroke, Exeter, George Anson, Normanby, J. Peel." London, June 18.—The committee appointed to determine in what manner the subscription entered into for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to Lord George Bentinck for his exertions to expose the abuses and reform the usages of the turf, met on Saturday, at the rooms of the Jockey Club, and, with the concurrence of Lord G. Bentinck, came to a resolution that the sum received, amounting to 2,000*l*., should be applied to some public institution, with a view to secure, in perpetuity, to a certain number of the children of deserving trainers and jockeys support and education from infancy until they shall arrive at an age to earn their own living.

News of the Week.

THE second reading of Lord Stanley's Irish Landlords and Tenants' Bill, and the appointment of a select committee to consider its provisions in detail, have been the leading topics of discussion in the House of Lords. The second reading of the Bill on Tuesday was energetically opposed by Lords Londonderry, Clanricarde, Roden, and Monteagle, on the ground that the measure was destructive of the rights of property, and that if it be admissible in Ireland, it ought equally to be applied to England and to Scotland. The Duke of Richmond regretted that the measure could not be extended to England, because he cordially approved of the principle it contained of granting compensation to tenants. Lord Fortescue also supported the Bill, considering it essential, in the present state of Ireland, to encourage tenants in carrying out the improvements already in progress. Lord Stanley defended the Bill as founded on the deliberate recommendation of a commission composed of the best men of every political and religious creed; and the House having divided the second reading was carried by the small majority of 14; the numbers being 48 to 34. The Bill was then referred to a select committee, which was appointed on Thursday, after a rather warm discussion on the constitution of the Board. Lord Portman on the same day moved the second reading of the English Landlord and Tenant Bill, which was supported by the Dukes of Richmond and Cleveland, and opposed by Lords Beaumont, Ashburton, and Wharncliffe. After a short discussion the Bill was thrown out, by 11 to 7.—In the Commons on Friday, the great contest on the broad and narrow gauges terminated in favour of the Great Western or broad gauge. A general opinion prevailed throughout the discussion that it would be ungracious to reject the report of the select committee on the Bills which led to the discussion, and also that it was unfair to reject the Bills themselves on a question which did not affect the merits of the respective lines. The Bills accordingly passed by a large majority, and on Wednesday Mr. Cobden moved, as a substantive motion, an address to the Queen for a commission to inquire into the merits of the two gauges, and into the practicability of establishing one uniform gauge throughout Great Britain. Sir G. Clerk and Lord G. Somerset on the part of Government, assented to the motion in its present form, and it was unanimously agreed to. On Monday Sir J. Graham stated the amendments which he proposed to introduce in the Irish Colleges Bill. For the details of these we must refer to our Parliamentary Report; but we may observe, in passing, that Government adhere strictly to the principle of not administering any religious test either to the students or the professors, and propose to reserve to the Crown for three years the appointment of the professors, after which time it will be open to Parliament to regulate the mode of their appointment in such manner as may then be considered expedient. Sir J. Graham also stated that an arrangement by which these colleges may be affiliated in one university for the purpose of granting degrees will be a necessary supplement to the present measure. Lord Mahon then moved an amendment providing for the religious instruction of the pupils by appointing three professors of theology to each college, one for the Established Church, another for the Roman Catholics, and a third for the Presbyterians. Mr. Wyse seconded the amendment, and an animated debate ensued, during which Mr. O'Connell introduced an incidental discussion on the history of Galileo, and on the alleged persecutions of science by the Church of Rome, which will be read with interest. The House at length divided, and negatived the amendment by 189 to 49, and the Bill was committed without further opposition. On Thursday the Solicitor-General brought forward his motion that a writ of error be brought upon the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Howard v. Gossett. This motion, of course, induced a long debate on the privileges of Parliament, during which several members insisted that the time had come when the House should assert its rights by imprisoning the judges and all other persons who may hereafter question or infringe its privileges. The discussion terminated in the adoption of the Solicitor General's motion for bringing a writ of error, by a majority of 82 to 41.

COURT.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and Princess Alice, left Osborne House for town on Wednesday, crossed in the royal yacht to Gosport, and thence travelled by a special train on the South Western Railway to the Nine Elms terminus, arriving at Buckingham Palace in 4½ hours after leaving Osborne. During the Queen's stay in the Isle of Wight, her Majesty and the Prince took their usual walks and rides, and on Monday her Majesty laid the foundation of the new building about to be erected at Osborne House, in the presence of Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lady Portman, and the Royal suite. A full set of proof coins of Her Majesty's reign was placed under the stone in a small glass box, and the masonic operations attending the ceremony under the superintendence of Mr. Cubitt were most skilfully performed by her Majesty, assisted on either side by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal. Her Majesty also reviewed the fleet on Monday; the particulars of this interesting ceremony are given below. The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at Buckingham Palace on Thursday, on a visit to the Queen. On the same day, Prince Albert attended the distribution of prizes at St. Thomas's hospital.—Friday last being the eighth anniversary of Her Majesty's accession, the day was observed with the usual loyal honours in the metropolis. Instructions have been received at Windsor Castle for the royal apartments to be prepared for the reception of the Court by Thursday, the 10th July, when the Queen, the Prince, and Royal Family are expected to arrive, and remain at Windsor for about ten days or a fortnight. Her Majesty and the Prince will probably leave England for the Continent in the early part of August.

Her Majesty's Review of the Fleet.—On Saturday the Queen and Prince Albert embarked in the royal yacht, and paid a visit to the fleet at Spithead, which were decked with colours and the yards manned. Her Majesty went on board the St. Vincent, 120, carrying Rear-Admiral Parker's flag, and then rowed along the line, visiting the Trafalgar, 120, Captain Martin, and the Albion, 90, commanded by Captain Lockyer. On quitting the fleet to return to Osborne-house, Her Majesty signified her intention to be present at the exercise of the squadron on Monday. Accordingly, at an early hour on that day the crews were "turned out," and every preparation made for the interesting event. The day dawned beautifully, and a fine breeze from the N.N.W. sprang up, which, as the day advanced, freshened into one still more invigorating. At 8 o'clock the signal was given to cross royal top-gallant yards, which was promptly obeyed, and the gear bent. At half-past 11 Her Majesty and Prince Albert embarked on board the royal yacht, for Spithead, when a general salute was fired from the fleet, with yards manned. On the smoke clearing away, the scene presented was one of the most enlivening description. Numerous steamboats, crowded with company, followed in the wake of the royal yacht, and many beautiful vessels of the Royal Yacht Squadron, Royal Southern, Western, and Thames Squadrons, were also present, and added increased brilliancy to a most interesting scene. The water was also covered with a numerous flotilla of small craft, which heightened the gaiety of the picture. On the royal yacht becoming stationary at Spithead the Earl of Yarborough, Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron, left his yacht, the Kestrel, and went on board the Victoria and Albert, to pay his respects to Her Majesty. The seamen were then piped down from the yards, and the process of making sail commenced. At half-past 12 signal was made from the flag-ship (St. Vincent) to "loosen sail," which was promptly obeyed, the Trafalgar, Capt. Martin, being first to complete the order. Signal was then made to "make sail." this was also neatly done, the Trafalgar again first; the St. Vincent was first to have her sails "set," the Queen second, Vanguard third, Trafalgar fourth, Albion fifth, Rodney sixth, and the Canopus last. The Superb did not join in the exercise. They then braced forward on the larboard tack, set jib and flying jib, and braced forward on the starboard tack, in which the Trafalgar was again first. The next signal was to "shorten sail and reef," furl royals and flying jib, take in two reefs of the topsails, and then make sail again with topsails, courses, top-gallant sails, jib, and spanker; in this Trafalgar was again first, Albion second, Rodney third, Vanguard fourth, Queen fifth, Canopus last. The next signal was to "furl top-gallant sails," close reef the topsails and reef courses, haul down the standing jib, hoist the foretopmast stay-sail and stow the jib. In this the Trafalgar was again first, St. Vincent second, Albion third, Queen fourth, Vanguard fifth, Rodney sixth, Canopus last. Each of these manœuvres did not occupy more than from three to five minutes in their performance, during which time Her Majesty remained upon the quarter-deck of the royal yacht. Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence explaining the various evolutions to Her Majesty; the Earl of Yarborough performing the same office for Prince Albert. About 1 o'clock the Superb, 80, Captain Corry, got under way, and made sail towards St. Helen's, followed by the royal yacht, the Black Eagle, and other of Her Majesty's steamers, and the yacht squadrons and other craft, the whole presenting a most beautiful and animating scene. The Superb went out in grand style, but the breeze freshening when on the other side the Nab, she was compelled to shorten sail and take in her royals, top-gallant studding-sails and foretopmast studding-sails. Admiral Parker went out in her, with his flag flying from her mizen. At 21 minutes past one the dinner pennant was hoisted, and the exercise of the squadron at anchor terminated until the return of the Royal visitors at about ½ past 3, when the Royal yacht passed the Vernon, which manned rigging and cheered. The signal was then made from the flag-ship, to "furl sails, put the life-lines on, and man yards," which was instantly obeyed, and a general Royal salute was given, the crews of the various ships cheering most heartily as Her Majesty passed them—not the less heartily for a good dinner. After saluting, the squadron again loosed sails, and at half-past 4 o'clock furled sails, except the Superb and Vernon. Her Majesty passed through the squadron on her return to Cowes at a quarter to 4, and appeared highly pleased with the day's proceedings. Thousands of spectators assembled on the beach and walls to witness the interesting manœuvres.

Approaching Visit of the King of Holland.—It is the intention of the King of Holland shortly to visit this country, attended by a distinguished suite. The state apartments at Mivart's hotel are being prepared for the reception of the King, who, according to general expectation, will remain in this country for a fortnight or three weeks. His Majesty may be expected the week after next.

Irish Peerage.—The Gazette announces that a patent has passed the Great Seal for the elevation to the Peerage of Jas. Daly, Esq., of Dunsandle, in the county of Galway, by the style and title of Baron Dunsandle and Clanconnel, in the said county. The new Peer is brother of the Bishop of Cashel.

Parliamentary Movements.—Several gentlemen are mentioned as likely to be proposed to succeed Col. Rushbrooke, in West Suffolk. The Times announces Mr. Kerrison, son of Sir Edward Kerrison, Bart., as the Conservative candidate. In other circles, Lord William Powlett, brother of the Duke of Cleveland, who coincides in the Conservative opinions of the present Duke, has been confidently spoken of. And on Thursday a meeting of tenant-farmers resolved to bring forward Capt. Bennet, of Roughton Hall, an active supporter of the Conservative and agricultural interests.

Illness of Sir William Follett.—We regret to state that the Attorney-General became much worse in the early part of the week, and that he is gradually sinking. In the House of Commons on Thursday, allusion was made to the little hope that remained of his eloquence being again heard in that scene of his early triumphs; there is too much reason to fear that before the lapse of another week, the greatest lawyer of his time will have sunk from physical exhaustion, at the very moment when the highest honours of his profession were within his grasp.

Death of Mr. Somes, M.P.—The death of Mr. Somes, the extensive ship-owner, which occurred on Wednesday at his residence in the Mile End-road, after a few hours' illness, caused a great sensation in the eastern part of the metropolis, and in the city, where it was almost the sole topic of conversation. The deceased gentleman was at the head of the shipping interest of the port of London, and his vessels at the present time are in all parts of the world. Mr. Somes was of humble origin, and by his industry and perseverance amassed considerable wealth. His father was a waterman and lighterman, and he intended his son for the same profession, and he was actually bound at Watermen's Hall, but subsequently abandoned the oars and sculls for a more lucrative business. Mr. Somes's fleet has been a nursery for good seamen, and every captain in his employ originally entered his service as an apprentice, and gradually worked his way up to commander. He was a kind and benevolent master, and was universally respected. Among other acts of princely generosity it is well known that Mr. Somes last year presented one of his ships to Capt. Warner, for the purpose of his great experiment at Brighton. On Tuesday morning he left home to attend a railway committee of the House of Commons, and appeared in excellent health and spirits. About 10 o'clock he was seized with illness in one of the committee-rooms of the House, and medical assistance was called in. He was conveyed to his own residence, where he died on Wednesday morning. The death of Mr. Somes has caused a vacancy in the representation of Dartmouth, and in the office of chairman of the New Zealand Company. It is rumoured that Mr. Somes has left property to the amount of two millions sterling.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—Marshal Sebastiani read to the Chamber of Deputies on Friday the report of the committee on the demand of a credit of 10,000,000f. (400,000*l.*), to carry into execution the new convention for the repression of the Slave-trade. The committee had given its entire approbation to the treaty, and subscribed to all the measures indispensable for the accomplishment of a "diplomatic act entitled in every respect to the assent of the Chamber." "Loyally and faithfully executed," added the Marshal—

"This convention will become a new pledge of good understanding between the two Governments that have signed it. Thus the wish of the Chamber and the interest of the country have been equally satisfied. Your committee takes pleasure in proclaiming that this result confers honour on the men engaged in a negotiation so delicate, who in following up an elevated idea of justice and humanity, also took into account the national feeling and ministered to its exigency. All the clauses of the new convention demonstrate the confidence reposed in each other by the high contracting parties and their equal sympathy for the cause they are desirous to serve. It is fortunate for such a cause that the efforts of two great nations should be combined, and the treaty they have concluded will, we trust, efface the recollection of the differences which may have divided them."

The Chamber voted, on the same day, the supplies of the Department of Public Works, and commenced a most interesting discussion on those of the navy. M. Bacot complained of the neglected condition of the navy, and compared its present numerical force to what it was under the Restoration, in 1829, when France had afloat 40 ships of the line and 30 frigates, although the supplies allowed did not amount to more than 62,000,000f. Now that the funds allowed for that department exceed 120,000,000f., there were only afloat 23 ships of the line, three of which were unfit for service, and 30 frigates. The Minister of the Marine considered it a calumny to say so. In the time of Charles X. France had only a few light ships and frigates, but now she has powerful naval stations, and a great number of ships in all parts of the world. Ships and steamers in great number had been added to the navy. In 1829 the expense of vessels kept at sea amounted to 16,500,000f., while now, in 1845, it amounts to 35,000,000f. He had done all he could to increase both the sailing and steam navy. He admitted that the navy estimates in 1829 were 68,000,000f., and that they are now 110,000,000f., but in 1829 the marines and marine artillery did not come within the navy estimates, and the real increase in the estimates was only from 68,000,000f. to 78,000,000f. He should be very glad to do more in the way of building additional ships and steamers, but in fact the means placed at his disposal were not sufficient, and next year he proposed to ask for an additional sum for that purpose. M. Bignon, who drew up the report of the committee on the budget, said that the opinion of the committee was, that the Ministry did not ask enough money for the navy, and he felt satisfied that if they asked more the Chambers would not refuse it, upon which there were cries from all parts of the house of "No, the Chambers will never refuse it." M. Ledru-Rollin said, so far was the Chamber from grudging what was necessary, that the Ministry refused a grant of 3,000,000 f. placed at its disposal for the increase of the navy. No sacrifice should be spared to increase the navy. The Ministry knew the wishes of the Chamber and of the country, and ought to satisfy them. The present conduct of the Ministry would lead to disasters similar to those which took place under the Republic. "In fine," said M. Ledru-Rollin, "we demand, we wish that our marine should be worthy of France—we wish, we demand that France shall be in a position to defend the principle of the liberty of the seas." The conversation then dropped, but it was renewed on Saturday on the vote for the pay and clothing of the seamen and marines. The seamen amount to 26,000; the marines and marine artillery to the rather disproportionate number of 19,000 men. M. Lacrosse, deputy for Brest, complained vehemently of the state of neglect in which the navy was left, blamed the Ministry for not having paid more attention to the steam-fleet, and contended that an inquiry into the state of the navy in general was necessary, and that an additional article should be attached to the vote of the supplies, to pledge the Ministry at the opening of the session of 1846 to lay before the Chamber a special and detached account of the number of vessels afloat, and in dock, the state of the arsenals and dockyards, and, in fine, of everything and matter connected with the question. Admiral Mackau (Minister of Marine) defended his conduct in the management of the naval department. France had, he said, at this moment in the Mediterranean eight ships-of-the-line which she could exhibit with pride to the most fastidious foreign critic. If foreigners were consulted on the state of the French navy, they would give a very different account of it from that which he had with much pain just heard from an hon. deputy. On the steam question he felt himself peculiarly strong; for the moment he entered office he instituted inquiries by commissioners in all the harbours of France, with a view to ascertain the best and most efficacious means for constructing and equipping steam-vessels. These reports were forwarded to a central committee sitting in Paris, and were found most satisfactory in their results. M. Billault followed, and contended that it was not sufficient to put the French coast in a state of defence, but to survey, inspect, and study foreign coasts, with a view to discover the best means of invading and conquering them. Admiral de Mackau observed that the Chamber had a right to recommend that every means be sought of defending the coast of France, but that he could not understand how the Government could be desired to inquire into the means of attacking a foreign coast. M. Billault professed to entertain no hostile feeling whatever towards England, when he stated that the naval forces of France ought to be prepared for both an offensive and defensive war; he added, that he did not censure, but, on the contrary, praised England for having often obtained information as to the means of attacking such countries as she might some day or other have to go to war with. M. Billault kindled very great agitation by asking the Minister of Marine whether the French naval officers employed on the Mediterranean coast had not often met with light boats in which English officers were seen taking soundings and studying the coast of France? M. D'Haussonville, a zealous supporter of the Cabinet, said that, notwithstanding his entire confidence in Admiral de Mackau, he should vote for M. Lacrosse's amendment. M. D'Angeville also declared in favour of an inquiry into the state of the navy, and the President submitted the amendment to the Chamber. Ministers upon this gave it a reluctant assent, and the amendment was almost unanimously adopted. The Opposition prints, with some reason, observe, that the vote is of the same irresistible description as the manifestations of the Chambers which have recently yielded the revocation of the treaties relative to the right of search. The Chamber resumed on Monday the adjourned discussion on the estimates of the naval department. A number of items were voted without opposition. The grant of 2,000,000 f. for the French establishments in Oceania was the only point on which some discussion arose. M. Leon de Malleville, and M. Billault, condemned the course pursued by Admiral Hamelin at Tahiti, and the establishment of a Government of three Consuls in that island; and M. Billault contended moreover that Ministers had sacrificed the dignity of France in advising the King to address a letter to Queen Pomare, and exposing the signature of the Sovereign of a great nation to be contemptuously treated by a queen of savages. The Ministers of Marine and the Interior replied, and the latter pledged himself in presence of the Legislature and country, that the protectorate should be maintained, and the grant was voted without amendment.—The report of the committee on the ways and means was delivered on Saturday. The total revenue of France for 1846 is estimated at 1,302,622,134f. This is 5,785,351f. more than the estimated expenditure, but as extra credits to a large amount have already been granted, and others are in contemplation, this small excess will be changed to an actual deficiency of a much larger amount. The committee recommend a reform in the Post-office, and the report states that the Minister of Finance has himself promised to bring the subject before the Chambers early next session.—The Archbishop of Toulouse having sent an address to the King in defence of the Jesuits, the Ministerial Debats has an article in which it expresses its deep regret that a prelate, so respectable by his great age and character, should take up his pen "in favour of an order whose name is synonymous with intolerance and fanaticism."

SPAIN.—Accounts from Bayonne of the 19th state that General Cabrera, the celebrated Carlist chieftain, who, after his mother was shot by Mina's orders, swore, and fearfully kept his oath, never to grant quarter to a Christino prisoner, has been arrested by the French police, near Narbonne, whilst attempting to effect his escape to the south of Spain in a fishing-boat. The Madrid papers also announce the same fact officially, and dwell upon it with some force as imparting additional interest to the abdication of Don Carlos and the manifesto published by his son. It appears, however, by the Paris papers, that the report is entirely without foundation. They state that Cabrera is still at Lyons, and it is suspected in Paris that the announcement of his arrest was made by the Spanish Government in order to influence the Queen to consent to return to Madrid without visiting the Basque provinces. Whatever may be the real cause of her Majesty's return, it seems certain that her journey is to be suddenly cut short; and although the rumours of an impending Carlist movement are considered to be unfounded, it is confidently announced that the Government contemplate some arbitrary measures, one of which is to be directed against the press. It is also believed that the Government will shortly publish an address to the nation on the subject of the abdication of Don Carlos and the manifesto of his son.

SWITZERLAND.—The Zurich papers of the 20th inst. announce the escape of Dr. Steiger from the prison in which he was confined at Lucerne, accompanied by the three chasseurs of Lucerne who were appointed to guard him, and some friends who had assisted in his escape. Dr. Steiger made his entrance into Zurich, on the 20th, and was received with universal enthusiasm. —The Catholic Cantons of Lucerne, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Friburg, and Valais, had addressed to the confederated states a new circular, reminding them of the manifesto they had published on the 10th August, 1844, and the right which they claimed to adopt such measures as they might deem necessary to maintain the provisions of the federal compact respecting the Argovian convents, and to protect the rights of the Catholic religion. They terminated their circular by a request to the cantons to give to their deputies in the Diet of 1845 instructions to the effect of re-establishing the convents suppressed by Argau, and reinstating them in their legal position. The seven cantons, moreover, addressed to their Catholic brethren of Ticino and Soleure a pressing invitation to make common cause with them in demanding the re-establishment of the convents.

ITALY.—Letters from Rome of the 11th inst. state that M. Rossi, the Envoy Extraordinary of France at Rome, finding that he could not prevail upon Cardinal Lambruschini to return a definitive reply to his communications, had demanded and obtained an audience of the Pope. This interview, it appears, was not attended with a satisfactory result. The reasons adduced by M. Rossi with great firmness against the Jesuits so indisposed the Pope that His Holiness deviated from that tranquil demeanour which is his peculiar habit, and openly declared that he would resist France, as he resisted Russia and Prussia. It was believed that M. Rossi would shortly quit Rome.

TURKEY AND SYRIA—A Constantinople letter of the 4th, states from Syria that a sanguinary battle took place on the 16th ult. between the Druses and the Maronites, which ended in favour of the latter, but the details are not given. The Emir Bechir had arrived at Wirausher, in Anatolia, the Porte having thought it necessary to remove him and some other influential persons, Druses and Maronites, from the scene of contention, in consequence of the discovery of a treasonable correspondence carried on between them and the Syrian malcontents.—A letter from Alexandria of the 6th inst., announces the return of Mr. Waghorn from Trieste, and states that his efforts to arrange matters for the conveyance of the India mail by way of Trieste have not been attended with the success he had anticipated.

UNITED STATES.—By the packet-ship Cambridge we have accounts from New York to the 2d inst. This arrival comprises news only two days later than that brought by the Britannia, and the chief object of interest is an awful and destructive fire at Quebec, by which 2000 houses were destroyed, and 12,000 persons rendered houseless. The fire commenced shortly before midday, on the 28th May, in a tannery in St. Valliere-street, and continued until midnight, when its career was arrested by blowing up the houses in St. Charles-street—nearly one mile from the place of its outbreak! —at the broadest point the breadth of the burnt district is about one-third of a mile. Several churches, Dissenting chapels, and public institutions, were destroyed; and, among the latter, was the hospital, to which, as being considered entirely out of reach of the conflagration, numbers of sick persons of all classes were carried; the building became ignited by the flakes of fire carried from a distance by the wind, and the unfortunate inmates, unable to help themselves, perished in the flames. The loss of life, according to one of the accounts, exceeds 100 persons, and the loss of property is said to be above 750,000*l*. Eighteen schooners were burnt at the Palais. Every exertion was made to relieve the unfortunate sufferers. Lord Metcalfe forwarded 2,000*l*. for their relief; the Catholic bishop sent 500*l*., and the Hotel Dieu 500*l*. The bishop had addressed a circular letter to his clergy, imploring subscriptions for the poor families deprived of a home and an asylum, and suggesting the calling of public meetings in every parish for that purpose, together with contributions of clothing, money, and provisions. We regret, also, to find that another most destructive fire had occurred in New York, whereby 160 buildings and 20 horses were consumed, and 400 families entirely bereft of their homes or the means of support. No less than 3000 poor Irish, composing the families burnt out, are said by the New York papers to be pent up in cow-pens and other outhouses. The scene is described as truly lamentable. Since the above news reached us, we have received fresh intelligence by the Great Western, which arrived at Liverpool yesterday morning. Her news is in no respect important. The President was so much indisposed on the 11th as to be unable to see company, but nothing serious was apprehended. Letters from the city of Mexico, which may be relied upon, have been received at New York, stating that the negotiation between Mexico and Texas has been completed so far as the executive of the two countries are concerned. The terms are said to be that Mexico acknowledges the independence of the latter, guaranteed by France and England, provided Texas rejects annexation with the United States or any other country. The domestic intelligence in the American papers is not important. No decision appears to have been come to respecting the Oregon affair; and we find no later intelligence respecting the great fire at Quebec. On the 9th inst. Lieut.-General Sir Richard Jackson, Commander of the Forces in Canada, died of apoplexy. Sir Richard was on the point of leaving Montreal for England, his successor, Earl Cathcart, being on his way out.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday.—Lord BROUGHAM's amended Small Debts Bill was read a second time, and, the standing orders having been suspended in its favour, it passed through committee.—The Duke of RICHMOND moved the third reading of the Scotch Toll-bar Bill.—Lord POLWARTH proposed the addition of a clause allowing toll-houses to be licensed as public-houses in cases where they were more than two miles distant from any town, village, or other public-house.—This clause gave rise to considerable discussion, and ultimately the debate was adjourned to Friday.—The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a Bill for the Amendment of the Law of Real Property, which was read a first time.—The Earl of RIPON moved the second reading of the Scotch Banking Bill, and briefly explained the nature of the measure, which, in his opinion, would be of great advantage to the general banking operations of the empire, because it would bring about an assimilation between the systems pursued in different parts of the country.—The Earl of RADNOR considered the measure a most unnecessary interference with the Scotch system. In this instance the old maxim "let well alone," might be very fitly applied; besides, the Bill would create a monopoly, for which reason he would move as an amendment that the Bill be read again that day six months.—After some remarks against the Bill by Lord KINNAIRD, and in favour of it by Earl DALHOUSIE, it was read a second time without a division.—On the motion of the Duke of BUCCLEUCH, the Infeoffment (Scotland) Bill, and the Heritable Securities Bill were read a second time.

Tuesday.—It was reported that Lord Gardner and the Marquis of Ormonde had absented themselves from certain railway committees, for which they were cautioned. Lord BROUGHAM intimating that their lordships had the power to force attendance by fine and imprisonment in the Tower; and Lord CAMPBELL reminding them of the much more grievous penalty which the House had the power of inflicting—that of commanding them to remain in the House during the whole of its sittings. The two noble lords were ordered to attend more punctually to their respective committees.—Lord CAMPBELL re-introduced his three Common Law Courts Process Bills, and made the amende to Mr. Serjeant Murphy for not having stated that the Bills were dropped in the House of Commons by the learned serjeant, with Lord Campbell's own concurrence.—The Marquis of BREADALBANE stated the case of Dr. Kalley, imprisoned by the authorities in the island of Madeira, an alleged violation of rights established by treaty.—The Earl of ABERDEEN replied that Dr. Kalley had exceeded the license to which, as a British subject, he was entitled. Englishmen were secured in the free exercise of their religious opinions and ceremonies; but Dr. Kalley had endeavoured to proselytise the native subjects of Portugal.—Lord STANLEY moved the second reading of the Irish Landlords and Tenants Bill.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY said, that he had in his hand a protest signed by 36 peers, complaining of the measure, as destructive of the rights of property. In his opinion, the Bill contained some most objectionable clauses, particularly that providing for the commissioner at Dublin and his assistants, who were to exercise inquisitorial powers over landlords, and could not fail to excite their utmost jealousy. It would be much better to leave Ireland to herself than to force measures such as this against the landed interest.—Lord STANLEY did not think that the objections urged against the Bill were strong enough to induce him to withdraw it; the best plan would be to refer it to a select committee without further discussion on the present occasion.—The Earl of WICKLOW, in spite of the protest signed by the 36 Peers, was convinced that the principle of the bill was just and sound, and considered that many of its suggestions were great improvements on those in the Earl of Devon's report. It might be said, indeed, that it involved a violation of the rights of property, and he was ready to admit it did, and that it would not be tolerated in England, but the peculiar state of Ireland rendered such a violation indispensably necessary.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE said the bill involved an entirely novel principle—that of the violation of all the rights of property. The people of Ireland, he believed, were unanimous against the measure. What was there in the state of Ireland to require any more than England, a violation of vested rights? The proper course of legislation was to assimilate, as far as possible, the laws of the two countries; and, if the union were to be preserved, that policy must be steadily pursued.—Earl FORTESCUE said he should not do justice to the opinion he had long entertained of the defective state of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, if he did not give his cordial support to the Bill. While he admitted that considerable improvements were already in progress, he thought that the measure was necessary to encourage tenants in carrying them out. He considered the compulsory clauses as most essential, and could not support the Bill if they were excluded.—The Duke of RICHMOND should support the Bill, because of the compensation it afforded to tenants. He only regretted that it could not be extended to England.—Lord MONTEAGLE thought there were insuperable obstacles against going into committee on the Bill. So far was he from thinking the compulsory clauses essential, that he considered them fatal to the success of the measure. This compulsory principle would go far to neutralise all the improvements now going on in Ireland; nor would he ever give his consent to the Bill till Government, acting on the suggestion of the Duke of Richmond, applied its principle to the three kingdoms alike.—The Earl of DEVON, without wishing to mistrust every Irish landlord, thought it clear that throughout a great part of Ireland there was no co-operation between landlord and tenant with regard to improvements. The Commission over which he had presided had been accused at one time of favouring the landlords, and at another the tenants, but it could not be denied that it had collected a vast amount of unimpeachable testimony, upon which the present Bill was founded, and to that mass of evidence he begged to refer their lordships. The noble lord urged the House to accede to the principle of the Bill at once, and to leave its machinery to be settled in the select committee.—After a few words from Lords CAREW, ESSEX, and SALISBURY, Lord RODEN said, he thought his tenantry would rather look for justice to him than to any Government officer, and he should vote against the measure because it set up such an officer between landlords and tenants.—The Marquis of NORMANBY thought it should be a question with Government whether the Bill might not be postponed, and brought forward in a better form next session.—Lord CAMPBELL objected to the Bill as interfering with the rights of property.—Lord STANLEY could perfectly understand why the Bill should excite such repugnance in the minds of landlords like the Marquis of Londonderry and Earl Roden, but they were the exception and not the rule in Ireland, and that was the reason why the principle, which was fit for Ireland, should not be extended, as had been suggested, to England and Scotland, where the relations of landlord and tenant were on a totally different footing. The noble lord then proceeded to enter at length into the details of the Bill and the objections made against it, and concluded by declaring that Government would incur a serious responsibility if it abandoned a measure founded on the recommendation of the best men of every political and religious creed.—After a few words from Lords ESSEX and RODEN, the Marquis of LANSDOWNE expressed himself very doubtful as to the powers given by the Bill to the commissioner at Dublin, and as to the compulsory clauses; still he would not undertake the responsibility of objecting to the second reading.—Their Lordships divided—For the second reading, 48; Against it, 34; Majority, 14.

Thursday.—Lord GARDNER explained the motives on which he absented himself from a private Bill committee on a late occasion. He said that he had conscientious scruples against serving on any railway committees whatever. Moreover he was a shareholder in many of the greater trunk lines; and therefore he did not wish to be a judge in his own case. The noble Lord gave notice, that should he be put on any future committee he should move—"That the Lords spiritual as well as temporal be summoned, on due notice, and be compelled to attend committees, beginning with those of highest rank, and so continuing until all their lordships had served in rotation."—Lord STANLEY moved that the following Peers be nominated to serve in the Tenants Compensation (Ireland) Bill:—The Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, the Duke of Cleveland, the Marquises of Salisbury, Londonderry, Normanby, Hertford, Lansdowne, and Clanricarde; the Earls of Devon, Fitzwilliam, Fortescue, Chichester, St. German's, Roden, Ross, and Wicklow; Lords Monteagle, Ponsonby, Ashburton, and Stanley.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY, the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, the Marquis of NORMANBY, and the Earl of RODEN begged to be excused from serving on the committee, from which they expected no beneficial result.—Lord LUCAN gave notice that should the Bill be returned from the committee in its present state, he should move that its provisions be extended to England and Scotland. The noble Earl complained that there were 16 Peers nominated on this committee who had supported the second reading of the Bill, while only five opposed to it were named. This he regarded as a packed jury.—Lord STANLEY defended the impartiality of his committee, and pledged his honour as to the fairness with which he had selected the names to serve on it.—After a very irregular conversation the committee was nominated, as moved, with the exception of the Marquis of Clanricarde, whose place was supplied by the Earl of Charleville.—Lord PORTMAN moved the second reading of the Landlord and Tenants (England) Bill.—Lord BEAUMONT thought it uncalled for, and moved its second reading that day six months.—The Duke of RICHMOND considered that it ought to be read a second time, if it were only to affirm the principle that a tenant who had expended his capital in permanently improving the land, and was ejected by the landlord previous to deriving equivalent advantages from the improvement effected, was entitled to compensation. He did not quite quite approve of the wording of the Bill, but he certainly approved of its principle.—The Duke of CLEVELAND likewise supported the measure. He said that it was the same in principle, though different in machinery, as the Tenant's Compensation (Ireland) Bill, and he should be sorry to deny to the tenants of this country any advantage which he was ready to concede to tenants in Ireland.—Lord ASHBURTON opposed the Bill, and Lord WHARNCLIFFE said that it was legislating in a case in which interference was not required. It might be said that the Bill for Ireland which he supported was of the same tendency. That was perfectly true. But he supported the Irish Bill because in that country the same custom did not exist as in England.—Lord PORTMAN explained that the object the Bill had in view was to carry out by arbitration the bargains made between landlord and tenant. The custom of the country could not be enforced without the aid of law, and it was to avoid the necessity of having recourse to law that arbitration was proposed. Their lordships divided—For the second reading, 7; against it, 11; majority against the Bill, 4.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—The debate on the broad and narrow gauges, which had excited such interest in the House and in railway circles, terminated, as we anticipated in our last, in favour of the broad gauge, the report of the committee in favour of the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Bill having been received by 247 to 113. A similar discussion was raised on the Oxford and Rugby Bill, but an amendment, proposed by Mr. LOCKHART, to postpone the consideration of the report to "that day six months," was rejected by 79 to 43. The private business having been disposed of, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House on the Customs Act, this being in fulfilment of a pledge given by Sir R. Peel before Easter, that he would give up a night for the purpose of discussing the propriety of sundry reductions proposed by different members, which they had waived in order to permit the Customs Act to pass.—Mr. EWART having been called on to move for a reduction of the duties on butter and cheese, declined to bring forward his motion, on account of the state of the House, which had become very nearly empty as soon as the "battle of the gauges" was decided. The hon. Member therefore declined to address empty benches, and complained that he had been deserted by his friends.—Mr. E. BULLER then proposed, in a speech based on documentary facts, the repeal of the duty on tallow.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, on rising to reply, adverted to the abandonment of the motion relative to the duties on butter and cheese, but was interrupted by Mr. EWART, who denied that he had abandoned his motion, but had declined to bring it forward in the then state of the House, though, as members friendly to the question had since entered, he appealed to the Government to permit him still to do so.—Sir R. PEEL declined, on the ground that it would be a bad precedent.—Mr. M. GIBSON remarked that he and several of his friends (Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cobden, and others) had been temporarily absent, having their "bread and cheese" up stairs; and he was sorry that their short absence should have been the cause of losing the opportunity for discussing the important question.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then gave a brief reply to Mr. E. Buller, stating that the large reductions on other imported articles precluded them from entertaining the proposition for repealing the duties on tallow.—After a brief discussion the motion was withdrawn.—Mr. PARKER next moved that "all duties on the importation of copper ore shall cease and determine." This also, after a short debate, was withdrawn, as was another motion by Dr. BOWRING, for a reduction of the duty on pine-logs. These topics having been disposed of, the House resumed. On the question for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. WILLIAMS drew attention to the case of Mr. Mayer, who had been committed to Newgate for an assault by Mr. Twyford, and moved for the production of the correspondence between the Home Secretary and the police magistrate in relation to the circumstance.—Sir J. GRAHAM considered that it was rather too bad, after the Speaker had been in the chair three nights for more than 10 hours each, and after he had been kept up on the previous night to a quarter to 5 o'clock, for Mr. Williams to speak for more than three-quarters of an hour on the subject which he had brought forward. He then detailed the circumstances of the case, from which it appeared that Mr. Mayer, though he acted under great provocation, had assaulted his relative with a bludgeon, and placed his life in danger. Mr. Twyford, in refusing to take bail for him, had committed a simple error of judgment, and had not been actuated by any improper or corrupt motive.—After a few observations from Mr. BERNAL, who considered that Mr. Twyford had been unfairly run upon, and from Sir C. NAPIER, who said that the Marylebone Vestry thought the affair had gone far enough, the motion was negatived without a division.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, who had a motion respecting the Post-office, objected to bring it on at the then late hour of the evening, and charged the Government with attempting, contrary to general understanding, to go into committee of supply. After some altercation, Sir R. PEEL agreed to postpone the estimates.—The Assessed Taxes Composition Bill, the Bills of Exchequer Bill, and the Merchant Seamen's Bill, were read a second time. The West India Islands Relief Bill, and the Seal-office Abolition Bill passed through committee.

Monday.—On the motion of Mr. MACAULAY, the second reading of the Scottish Universities Bill was postponed to the 9th July.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in answer to Mr. S. CRAWFORD, said, that having ascertained that a great contrariety of opinion existed as to the propriety of the alteration which he had proposed to make upon the law of settlement, it was not his intention to press it further this session.—In reply to Mr. ROCHE, Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he did not anticipate being able to proceed this session with the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill, or the Irish Franchise Bill.—On the order of the day for going into committee on the Colleges (Ireland) Bill, Sir J. GRAHAM explained the manner in which the 7000*l*. a year to each college is to be applied, and the amendments which he proposed to make in the Bill. In each College he proposed to place a president and vice-president, and to make 700*l*. a-year the maximum salary for the first, and 400*l*. a-year for the latter. He calculated upon placing 12 or 14 professors in each of these colleges. The salaries of each would not be less than 200*l*., or more than 300*l*. a-year. The librarian would have a salary of 200*l*. a-year, the bursar 100*l*. a-year; and the college servants would divide among them 300*l*. a-year. In this manner 5000*l*. a-year would be expended. Out of the surplus of 2000*l*. a-year which would then remain, the library, astronomical and scientific apparatus, and at first a large expenditure for indispensable purposes must be provided. By the charter of incorporation to be granted to these colleges, Government intended to provide for the annual examination of their students. To the first 20 among the students of the first year it was proposed to give exhibitions varying from 25*l*. to 20*l*. a-year each. The same regulation would apply to the students of the second year; and to the first 20 among the students of the third year, exhibitions of 30*l*. a year each would be awarded. In this way from 1000*l*. to 1500*l*. a year would be expended in exhibitions. Consistently with the principles of the present Bill, Ministers could not propose the administering of any religious test either to the students or to the professors in these new colleges. To that principle they intended steadily to adhere. But when they consented to the exclusion of all religious tests, Ministers thought that securities ought to be taken that the professors did not in their lectures attempt to sap and undermine the faith of the students. He knew of no security that would be efficient for such a purpose except the vesting of the appointment of the professors in the Crown, whose Ministers would be responsible in Parliament for each appointment. He therefore proposed that the appointment of the presidents and vice-presidents should rest in the Crown absolutely, and that the professors, during the first three years, should also be appointed by the Crown; but that, after the year 1848, it should be open to Parliament to regulate the mode in which the professors should be thereafter nominated. He named three years, because it was certainly his view that an arrangement, by which these colleges should be affiliated in one university, in which degrees might be granted, was a necessary supplement of the present measure. The alteration contemplated this, because, if the university were established, there would be examiners for granting degrees; it would be the prerogative of the Crown to establish such universities, but Parliament must provide the money; so that the arrangement would be under the control and review of Parliament. With respect to boarding-houses for the students, he proposed that they should be licensed, the license being renewable yearly, and revocable under complaint. With respect to the foundation of halls, every encouragement would be given to them. A loan of money would be made by the Board of Works in aid of their erection. He also proposed to place them under the immediate superintendence of the visitors, who are to be the heads of the several religious communities in the district where the colleges are situated.—Lord MAHON then moved an amendment, that "It is the opinion of this House that in the establishment of colleges in Ireland provision should be made for the religious instruction of the pupils by means of lecture fees, till such time as private benefactions for that object may have taken effect." That amendment asserted a principle, without which no system of education could be valuable—namely, the necessity of combining religious with secular instruction. He showed that the importance of joining a religious with a state education had been inculcated as a principle by Pascal and Fenelon, as well as by Hooker and Wesley; and contended that there was nothing in the condition of Ireland to forbid the application of that principle to that country. In order to carry it out, he proposed that there should be in each of these new colleges professors of theology, one for the students of the Established Church, another for those of the Roman Catholic religion; and in the province of Ulster a professor for the Presbyterian pupils. The professor for the Established Church should be appointed by the bishops of that Church; the professor for the Roman Catholic students by the Roman Catholic bishops; and the Presbyterian professor by the Synod of Ulster. The freest choice should be permitted to the students as to which of these professors they would attend; but the college should demand of them a certificate of their attendance on the lectures of one of these professors as a necessary condition to their taking of a degree, or even to their continuance in the institution.' A power of giving special exemption from such restriction should be lodged in the board of visitors, and that exemption should be granted to every class of separatists who asked for it. The noble lord then entered into the minor details of his scheme, of which the most material was that he would leave the amount of the lecture fees under these theological professors to be fixed by the board of visitors of each college.—Mr. WYSE seconded the amendment; but in doing so expressed the insuperable objections which he entertained against placing theological professors in these colleges. He then proceeded at some length to defend himself from a charge preferred against him in Conciliation-hall by Mr. J. O'Connell, of being an anythingarian, and not a Roman Catholic.—Mr. J. O'CONNELL would not say anything on this Bill at present, as he hoped Sir J. Graham would allow the House 24 hours to consider the propriety of the amendments which he had proposed. Adverting to the observations of Mr. Wyse, he said that he had not charged that hon. member with not being a Roman Catholic—he had only said that he was in a state very closely allied to not being a Roman Catholic. If Mr. Wyse differed from the Roman Catholic Bishops on this subject, his sole appeal was to Rome; and yet he brought his differences from his bishops prominently forward in the House of Commons, and thus placed himself in practical rebellion to his religious pastors. Mr. Wyse had talked of intolerance; but the measure which Mr. Wyse supported was a measure of gross intolerance. It outraged the conscience of every Roman Catholic in Ireland, and so far from diminishing the cry for Repeal, would create an irritation and opposition more formidable than any which the British Government had experienced for the last 20 years.—Sir J. GRAHAM observed, that this was neither the time nor the place to discuss the extent of the authority which a conscientious Roman Catholic owed to his bishop. It must have been painful to the House to hear that part of Mr. J. O'Connell's speech in which he declared that Mr. Wyse, in his supreme legislative capacity as a member of that House, was not at liberty to exercise his judgment independently when it was opposed to that of his bishops. He expressed only what was due to Mr. Wyse when he declared, that he had never been guilty of any deception towards his constituents. His orthodoxy as a Roman Catholic must be known to them, as he had lived nearly all his life among them, and he had invariably declared that he was friendly to British connexion. He objected to Lord Mahon's resolutions as in the first place informal, in the second as impracticable. He was persuaded that the adoption of the motion would lead of necessity to the inculcation of theology with all the variances of doctrine, and to general strife and religious bitterness in the colleges themselves. The great object was to combine all parties in one scheme of secular education, in the hope that religious jealousies would not be excited, and that the animosities which prevailed would be stopped, whilst, at the same time, every possible security was taken for the religious instruction without any attempt to proselytise through the medium of lectures on science, leaving the question of religion to persons out of the walls of the institution.—Lord CLIVE said, the amendment simply meant that in each of these colleges there should be provided a chaplain, not for the purpose of instructing the students in controversial theology, but of giving them religious instruction, weekly and daily: for, in the houses of their friends, or in these boarding-houses in which they might reside, it was very conceivable that they might be living under the care of persons altogether unqualified to give them instruction as that to meet the want of which Lord Mahon had framed his amendment.—Mr. M. MILNES declared his intention of opposing the amendment, and of supporting the Bill proposed by Government. He showed that the Government of France—a Roman Catholic country—could not intrust the Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy with the duty of educating its subjects; and declared that it was painful to him to find that the Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy of Ireland, in now coming forward to oppose this liberal grant for education coming from a liberal Government, were doing all in their power to justify the French Government in the position which it had taken with respect to the Roman Catholic clergy of that country.—Mr. B. ESCOTT defended this Bill as a Bill for the better advancement of learning among all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. He denied that it was a gigantic scheme of godless education. He believed it to be a religious Bill; and called upon Mr. O'Connell to rise superior to his prejudices, and to join the Government in supporting this measure.—Mr. COLQUHOUN observed, that though he could not vote for the amendment, and must support the measure as proposed by Government, yet he should consider himself as pronouncing a most ludicrous satire upon the Bill, if he were to call it, as Mr. Escott had called it, a religious Bill. Even Government had not vindicated it as a perfect plan; and as no improvement on it had been proposed, he had no other option but to accept it. The best course was to adhere to the plan of Ministers, and to give to the people of Ireland the best secular education which could be provided for them.—Sir R. PEEL admitted that the Bill would have been a better measure had it had religion for its basis; but that was rendered impracticable by the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. Looking, however, at the necessity for extending education there, and thinking it better to have a mixed than an exclusive system of education in that country, Government had introduced its present plan, not as the best that could be devised, but as that which was the most practicable. Government had been accused of not consulting ecclesiastical authorities on this Bill. He thought that they had acted wisely in so doing: for if he might judge from the letter of Archbishop M'Hale to himself, and from the letter of a Presbyterian minister to Sir J. Graham, it would have been impossible either to have complied with their advice, or to have treated their opinions with respect. In alluding to the memorial of the Roman Catholic Bishops, in which they declared that the Roman Catholic pupils could not attend the lectures on anatomy of a Protestant professor without exposing their faith or morals to imminent danger, he asked whether any intelligent Roman Catholic would contend that the faith of any Roman Catholic surgeon had been injured by attending the lectures of John Hunter, or would be by those of Sir B. Brodie, or Sir P. Crampton?—Mr. O'CONNELL objected that the latter gentleman had uttered a gross calumny against the Roman Catholic religion in accusing the head of the church of having persecuted a celebrated anatomist for an important discovery.—Sir R. PEEL observed, that it was possible that a Protestant philosopher, in speaking of Galileo, might bear hard on the Pope; and argued that, if what Mr. O'Connell had stated were true, it was a strong argument in favour of mixed education. He thought that the ecclesiastical authorities of Ireland would yet hail this Bill as an inestimable boon, well calculated to lay the foundation of a kinder and better union among that youth which must form the future manhood of their country.—Mr. O'CONNELL repeated the statement which he had made respecting Sir P. Crampton, to whose character and genius he paid a just tribute of applause; and he then proceeded, by way of episode, to vindicate the Papal Government from the charge of having treated Galileo with extreme severity. He said that the general idea with respect to this philosopher is, that he was imprisoned for a long time for having maintained and taught the Copernican system of astronomy. Now, Galileo was confined for three days only in the Inquisition. So far, likewise, was he from having been cast into gaol for promulgating the Copernican doctrines of the heavens, that the Pope, or rather the ruling ecclesiastical authority at Rome, was the person who enabled Copernicus to publish his discoveries. Galileo was imprisoned for saying and teaching that the fact of the sun, the moon, and the planets having a circular motion could be proved by the Scriptures. He was admonished upon this, and was told that the Scriptures were not to be referred to for such a purpose; and he was enjoined not to promulgate such doctrines. He broke through this prohibition, and he was sent to prison for three days, during which he stamped with his foot, and exclaimed, "Still it moves!" The last time he was in the House he asked Ministers what they were going to do for Ireland? He repeated the question now. The Bill which had been introduced in the House of Lords would be of no avail in relieving its destitution, and he therefore called upon the country gentlemen of England to insist that the Irish landlords should do justice to their miserable victims—the Irish tenantry. Reverting to the Bill before the House, he insisted that it could not have been productive of any harm if Ministers had consulted the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland respecting its provisions. The people of England, he knew, would not give their support to such a gigantic scheme of godless education, and before it could obtain the support of the people of Ireland it must be made a religious measure. The Presbyterian religion for the Presbyterian—the Roman Catholic religion for the Roman Catholic—the Protestant religion for the Protestant—fair play and justice to all—that was all he wanted. If Ministers failed in their present scheme, they would make themselves the ridicule of the world; if they failed in attempting to give a religious education to the people of Ireland, they would at least fail in a majestic undertaking. Ministers ought to have consulted the Roman Catholic Bishops, and have seen what precautions would satisfy them. They had denounced it as dangerous to faith and to morals; and every sincere Roman Catholic was bound to take their opinion upon such a point. After denouncing the agitation against the Maynooth Bill as a senseless and atrocious cry, which had vanished without leaving a trace behind it, like the snow of last winter—and after expressing his gratitude to Ministers for that Bill, which had, he said, been proposed and passed by them in the best spirit, he expressed himself anxious for the success of the present measure, but declared that it never could succeed without the approbation of the Roman Catholic Bishops. He felt bound to vote for the amendment of Lord Mahon, as it contained sentiments in which he cordially coincided.—Sir R. H. INGLIS said, that knowing the purpose for which the refutation, such as it was, of the statement of the persecution of Galileo was made, and observing the tone of triumph in which it was announced, as if it were conclusive as to the toleration of the Church of Rome, he hoped he might be allowed to inform the House that Mr. O'Connell was totally in error. He had begun by stating, that it was the Pope who condemned Galileo (the ruling ecclesiastical authority at that time, he said) that enabled Copernicus to publish his observations. In this he must have trusted very much to the lack of memory, not to say of knowledge, of other hon. members, for Copernicus died in 1543, and Pope Paul V., who reigned in the time of Galileo, did not reach the Papal chair till 1605. Moreover, Galileo was not sentenced for resting his doctrine on words of Scripture which did not sustain it, but for holding a doctrine which was said to be directly contrary to Scripture and to the church. It was not worth while to quarrel with the hon. and learned member, as to whether Galileo was three years, or three months, or three days, in the prison; three days would dispose of his argument, and would be quite sufficient to satisfy any individual. Galileo was in prison in 1615, he believed; and certainly he was there in 1616. But the real point of the argument was the spirit and temper of the church which, as he (Sir R. Inglis) believed, persecuted Galileo, and which the hon. and learned member contended did not persecute any man of science, for the topic was introduced in reference to the encouragement or discouragement of science. Now, did not the hon. and learned member know that when two of the most learned mathematicians of the early part of the last century published Newton's Principia, they were obliged to state in the way of apology, that they could not maintain the doctrine of Newton's Principia except by maintaining the doctrine of the motion of the globe. It was a deference they felt it necessary to pay to the authority of that great encourager of science, and a respect rendered to the decrees which had condemned Galileo.—Mr. O'CONNELL explained, that it was not a Pope who was concerned in the publication of the works of Copernicus; he would on a future day give the name of the cardinal, for he was only a cardinal then.—After remarks from Mr. CRAWFORD, Lord C. HAMILTON, Mr. SHAW, Sir A. BROOKE, and Mr. HINDLEY, in support of the Bill, the House divided, when there appeared—For the amendment, 49; against it, 189; majority against it, 140.—Mr. WYSE then postponed his amendment till the report of the Committee was brought up.—Mr. O'CONNELL said, that he should have no objection to have the Bill committed pro formâ, and to have the amendments inserted in it which Sir J. Graham had proposed that evening, provided he would postpone the bringing up of the report till Monday next.—To this suggestion Sir J. GRAHAM, upon the recommendation of Lord J. Russell, agreed, and the Bill was accordingly committed.—The Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics Bill, the Parochial Settlement Bill, and the Arts Union Bill were read a second time, and the Commons Inclosures, Allowances, &c., Bill passed through committee.

Tuesday.—Several Railway Bills were advanced; amongst others the Oxford and Rugby, the third reading of which was carried, on a division, by 132 against 95.—A new writ was ordered for Suffolk, in room of Colonel Rushbrooke, deceased.—Mr. HUTT submitted to the House the following resolution:—"That the course pursued by Great Britain since 1814, for the suppression of the Slave-trade has been attended by large expenditure of the public money, and by serious loss of life to the naval forces of the country, and that it has not mitigated the horrors of the middle passage, nor diminished the extent of the traffic in slaves." The hon. Member recommended Government to withdraw our cruisers from the coast of Africa, to open the ports of Africa and the ports of our own empire, and put down the Slave-trade by underselling its products in the markets of the world.—Lord HOWICK supported Mr. Hutt's views, but recommended him not to press his motion to a division.—Sir GEORGE COCKBURN in defending the policy of Government observed that it would be very unwise to withdraw our cruisers from the coast of Africa at the very moment when the first chance presented itself of effectually crushing the traffic in slaves.—Sir R. PEEL admitted that the efforts of this country had not hitherto been successful in abolishing the slave-trade, and that its horrors were still appalling. But he had no doubt these would all be aggravated, if this country withdrew its cruisers from the attempt to put down a traffic, the evils of which had enabled Mr. Wilberforce to rouse the feelings of the people of Great Britain into a national effort for its suppression. It would be most unwise to withdraw from the convention just concluded with France for watching the coast of Africa, more especially as the United States and Portugal were cordially disposed to join France and this country in order to accomplish an object in which we have felt so deep an interest.—After some remarks from Sir C. NAPIER, Lord PALMERSTON rose to address the House; but as there were not more than 29 members present, the House was counted out.

Wednesday.—The South Wales Railway Bill was referred back to the committee which had decided against the Bill.—A motion to do the same with the Wexford and Carlow Railway Bill was rejected.—Mr. COBDEN moved an address to the Queen, praying Her Majesty to issue a commission to inquire whether, in future private Acts for the construction of railways, provision ought to be made for securing a uniform gauge, and whether it would be expedient and practicable to take measures to bring the railways already constructed or in progress of construction in Great Britain into uniformity of gauge; and to inquire whether any other mode of obviating or mitigating the apprehended evil could be adopted; and to report the same to the House.—Sir G. CLERK and Lord GRANVILLE SOMERSET consented to the motion, which was accordingly agreed to.—The Statute Labour (Scotland) Bill was recommitted, and some clauses added.—On the motion of Mr. LIDDELL that the Dog-Stealing Bill be committed, Mr. DUNDAS opposed the measure on the ground that it was unnecessary, and if necessary too severe. It was [illegible] to give two justices power to punish a second [illegible] to stealing with transportation for seven years [illegible] that conviction was made without the [illegible] jury.—After a few words to the same effect from Mr. [illegible], Sir J. GRAHAM considered that the penalty of transportation for seven years for a second conviction for dog-stealing was too severe, and therefore recommended Mr. Liddell not to persevere in the clause which imposed it. He pointed out the anomalies in the existing law as sufficient reasons for amending it. An indictment for stealing a dog worth 2*l.* would fail unless a count were added for stealing its collar, which might not be worth more than 7*s.* 6*d.* A man was now [illegible] transportation for stealing such a dog, but he had been indicted for stealing its collar, and had been [illegible] offence, and no other.—Mr. LIDDELL was prepared [illegible] friendly advice of Sir J. Graham. He did not consider the clause, to which objection had been raised, to be necessary to the success of his Bill, and he was therefore prepared to abandon it. He then explained his reasons for [illegible] it.—Mr. B. ESCOTT fully concurred in the observations of Mr. Dundas, and was quite prepared to divide with him, if he should press his objection to this Bill to a division. He trusted at any rate Mr. Dundas would take the sense of the House on this Bill upon its third reading.—The House then went into committee, several amendments were made in the Bill, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Wednesday next.—On the motion of Mr. MACKINNON, the Smoke Prohibition Bill was committed. Several amendments were made and considerable discussion took place upon its clauses in committee.—The House resumed, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Friday.—Lord J. MANNERS postponed the second reading of the Pious and Charitable Purposes Bill till the 1st July.—The Arrestment of Wages (Scotland) Bill, the Scientific and Literary Societies Bill, the Merchant Seaman's Bill, and the Art-Unions Bill, passed through committee.—Sir H. Pottinger's Annuity Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, leave was given to introduce a Bill to amend an Act of 7th William IV., for preventing the advertising of Foreign and other illegal Lotteries, and to continue certain actions commenced under the provisions of the said Act.

Thursday.—Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice of the following amendments in the Colleges (Ireland) Bill, viz.:—First, to insert the "halls" among the buildings to be provided for by the grant; secondly, to omit the limitation of the moneys to be applied to each college, and have only the gross sum; thirdly, to give nomination of professors after 1846 to the president, vice-president, and professors; fourthly, to insert the chaplain before the "bursars" and librarians.—Lord G. SOMERSET gave notice that, on Monday, he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish certain private jurisdictions in Yorkshire.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL moved, in accordance with the recommendation of the majority of the committee appointed to inquire into the proceedings of the case Howard v. [illegible], that a writ of error be brought before all the Judges on the judgment pronounced in the Court of Queen's Bench.—Mr. HUME moved as an amendment, "That it is inexpedient to intrust the maintenance of the privileges of the House to any other authority than the House itself."—The House divided without further discussion:—For putting the original question, 78; for the amendment, 46; majority, 32.—A long debate, which lasted the whole night, ensued on the Solicitor-General's motion.—Mr. ROEBUCK advised the House to proceed no further in the present case; but to give notice that any one hereafter who might question the privileges of the House would be thrown into prison.—Sir R. INGLIS could not concur in the proposition that a writ of error ought to be sued out in this case; but before the House adopted the violent alternative proposed by Mr. Roebuck, and which would place at its disposal not only the person of liberty, but every other liberty of the people of England, it ought not to lose sight of that milder course which it had adopted with the general concurrence of the House on a former occasion, namely, that of legislation.—Mr. B. ESCOTT spoke in favour of the writ of error.—Mr. Serjeant MURPHY said the House had committed a great error in pleading at all, and advised that Mr. Roebuck's suggestions for the future should be adopted.—Lord MAHON recommended the House to have recourse to legislative measures upon this subject, and to obtain for itself clear and definite rights by statute law, instead of resting upon these vague and antiquated claims of privilege.—Mr. C. WYNN unwillingly agreed to the writ of error, and Mr. WORTLEY also supported it.—Lord J. RUSSELL said, that hitherto no one had resisted the warrant of the Speaker since the revolution of 1688; and to raise a doubt that the resistance to it, if accompanied by the loss of life, would not be homicide, was most dangerous and most reprehensible. He showed that in a case of resistance the House had the power to address the Crown to assist its Serjeant-at-Arms to carry its warrant into execution with a military force if necessary; and it was lamentable that judges should have treated the warrant of the House of Commons in such a manner as compelled its members to look at the possibility of supporting it with military force. He was for taking all moderate courses at present. He might be taunted as pusillanimous in recommending them, and as endangering thereby the privileges of the House; but in its final course he thought that the House could not part with those privileges which were necessary to its existence, and without which its existence would rather be an evil than a good.—Mr. F. KELLY acquiesced in the propriety of a writ of error.—Sir T. WILDE recommended the House to stop short in this case, in which they had been worsted: but to resolve in future to imprison all and every one that should interfere with their privileges, and to carry out their resolution without remorse.—Sir R. PEEL would not be a party to any extreme measure against the courts of law, until he had tried every other mode of proceeding, and, when he had exhausted them, he would not proceed even then to the ultimate remedy which Sir T. Wilde contemplated, unless he found himself supported by the almost unanimous feeling of the House and of the country. Until we had satisfied the public mind that we had left nothing untried for the defence of our privileges, there would be no chance of vindicating them effectively. He thought that it would be prudent for the House to appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench to other judges. He dreaded the consequences of leaving that judgment, which he considered to be inconsistent with reason and the decisions of former judges, unrepealed; for there were doctrines contained in it which questioned the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, to which he attached the greatest importance, in a manner which required revision by a higher tribunal.—The House then divided, when there appeared for the Solicitor-General's motion:—Ayes, 82; Noes, 48; Majority in favour of the writ of error, 34.—Mr. HAWES presented a petition of the South Eastern Railway Company, complaining that undue influence had been used by Mr. Higley, the solicitor of the Board of Ordnance, in favour of the London, Chatham, and North Kent Railway. The hon. member read a letter from Mr. Higley to the secretary of the railway company, suggesting that shares should be allotted to Captain Boldero, Mr. Bonham, and himself, and offering other suggestions respecting the Bill in committee. The petitioners prayed the removal of the solicitor from the board.—Mr. HAWES gave notice for a select committee to inquire into the allegations contained in this petition.

Metropolis and its Vicinity.

Exhibition of Works of National Industry.—We learn from the Athenæum, that a project is on foot, under the management of the Society of Arts, for an Exhibition of the Products of British Industry. The Athenæum publishes the following circular on this subject:—"The exhibitions of National Industry, which attract so much attention on the Continent, have suggested to the members of the Society of Arts, and to some distinguished manufacturers, the possibility of establishing something of the same kind in the British Empire. They have thought that a country which is eminent in all, and unrivalled in many, of the industrial arts, would be enabled to concentrate such a display of intellect, energy, and resources, as probably has never yet been witnessed. Besides the delight and instruction which would certainly be afforded, it may fairly be expected that a periodical competition of this nature will exert some beneficial effect on the progress of the Arts; not only by exciting honourable rivalry in the producers, but by enabling the consumers better to appreciate real excellence. Without entering into details, it may be stated, that the plan embraces the exhibition not merely of products, but of the instruments of production in actual work—the facility, rapidity, precision, and economy of the act of fabrication being often much more wonderful than the fabric itself. In carrying out these ideas, it is intended entirely to exclude all private, personal, and political objects. It is hoped that the plan may be preserved so free from objection on these points, as to command the approbation of all ranks, and justify its promoters in anticipating the highest patronage."

Election of Sheriffs.—On Tuesday, being Midsummer-day, the Livery assembled in very small numbers for the purpose of electing Sheriffs for London and Middlesex for the year ensuing. It was expected that Alderman Challis and his relative, Mr. Kennard, would have been chosen without opposition, no other name having been put up until the morning of the day of the election, when there suddenly appeared upon the walls of Guildhall placards intimating that Mr. Chaplin and Mr. Laurie, the nephew of Sir Peter Laurie, were candidates for the office. Even that announcement created no alarm amongst the friends of the Alderman and Mr. Kennard, but they had cause to regret that they had not met this announcement with energy, for the rival candidates had a large majority on a show of hands, and the Sheriffs, with evident reluctance, announced that the election had fallen on Mr. Chaplin and Mr. Laurie.

New German Hospital.—A public meeting has been held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of taking the necessary steps for establishing an hospital exclusively for the poor Germans resident in the metropolis. H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge occupied the chair, supported by Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian minister, the Marquis of Westminster, Lord Ashley, the Duke of Cleveland, S. Gurney, Esq., and several other gentlemen. His Royal Highness dwelt upon the necessity there was for the establishment of such an hospital. Although the Germans were never refused admittance into any of the hospitals, yet from the fact of many of them speaking English imperfectly, their wants were often misunderstood and ill supplied. His Royal Highness concluded a warm appeal to the generosity of the English nation, and to the Germans resident in London, by stating that her Majesty the Queen was a donor of 100*l.*, and that the King of Prussia had contributed 300*l.*, with an annual subscription of 100*l.* Resolutions were subsequently moved, recommending the establishment to the public, on the grounds that there were at present 30,000 poor Germans in the metropolis, most of whom were, from the nature of their occupations (sugar refining, skin dressing, and skin dying), exposed to accidents and ailments that often reduced them to extreme misery.

Anti-Corn-law League.—A meeting of the League was held last week at Covent-garden Theatre to receive the report of the bazaar lately held, and the proceeds of which are considered to be the close of the 100,000*l.* subscription which it was determined to raise. From this it appeared that a large amount of subscriptions had been received in direct money payments, and in the amount of sales of the articles sent from different counties in England; the total proceeds of the exhibition amounted to 25,000*l.*, including 4800*l.* taken at the doors; and there were articles left over sufficient to supply another bazaar to be held at Manchester.

St. Leonard's, Shoreditch.—A meeting of the ratepayers of this parish was held last week, for "the purpose of hearing a letter from the Bishop of London, in reference to the memorial addressed to his lordship in March last, on the conduct of the clergy in introducing and continuing changes and innovations in the services of the church, and to adopt such proceedings as might be deemed expedient." A long letter from the bishop was read, in which his lordship stated that after receiving the memorial of the churchwardens and parishioners, he had an interview with six members of the congregation, who assured him that they are perfectly satisfied with the mode in which Mr. Evans and his curates conduct the service; that the poor are contented with it, and that the numbers of the congregation are increasing, there being on one occasion between 400 and 500 persons present; that the middle aisle or nave of the church is always filled with poor persons, who kneel at the appointed time, and are apparently decent. They stated to his lordship, also, that the memorialists are many of them Dissenters, who can have no just ground of complaint, or any right to interfere in the matter with respect to the particular point of objection. His lordship, in reference to the other points at issue, says, "I have to observe, that the reading or chanting of the Psalms is left by the Rubric to the choice of the officiating clergyman. I do not wish myself to encourage the introduction of chanting into parish churches, although I do not object to it where the congregation are taught to take part in it. Mr. Evans intends, I believe, to discontinue the chanting of the Athanasian Creed, and to introduce a portion of the new version of the Psalms after the third collect. It is very doubtful whether the sacrament and festival hymns can be used consistently with the directions of the law; at all events, I have no authority to enjoin the use of them, even though I may not object to it. I have recommended the clergy in many cases to discontinue the use of the surplice in the pulpit if they found that it gave offence to their congregation; but I do not think I have authority to prohibit it. With respect to the reading of the offertory sentences and the prayer for the Church militant, I consider that, as the rubrical directions are a bar, I have no authority to require any clergyman not to observe them. The utmost that I can do is to forbear from interfering to enforce such observance in any case where a clergyman may think that he is not bound to it. The collecting at charity sermons from pew to pew is connected with the reading of the offertory sentences." After alluding to other objections, his lordship stated that Mr. Evans intends to discontinue some of them, and that with respect to others the bishop has no power to interfere. The meeting was then addressed by several persons, who denied that the gentlemen who had waited upon the bishop were constant attendants at Church, and challenged them to produce seven Dissenters among all those who had signed the memorial. Various remedies were suggested for getting rid of the innovations in the service, and eventually it was agreed that a memorial should be presented to the Queen calling for her Majesty's interference.

The Spa Fields Burial Ground.—The defendants in this case have consented to plead guilty to one of the clauses in the indictment against them, with a reference to Mr. Brannell, who is to direct in what manner the burial-ground is to be in future conducted. Judgment is to be respited for one year, and if the directions of Mr. Brannell are complied with no further proceedings will be taken—no costs on either sides—no arrest of judgment or writ of error. The costs of arbitration to be paid by the prosecutors and defendants, each a moiety.

Metropolitan Improvements.—The new street leading from Leicester-square, across Princes street to Coventry-street, was last week thrown open to the public, thus giving the long-desired thoroughfare from the west-end to the theatres, &c. In Fetter-lane, a tavern called the Three Tuns has long impeded the widening at the Fleet-street end, but workmen have commenced pulling it down to effect the widening of this thoroughfare. The new street from Oxford-street to Holborn is also partially open for the traffic of carriages, &c.

The River Lea.—Last week a gentleman fishing in a branch of the Lea, near the Temple Mills, in the Hackney-marshes, observed a fish of considerable size lying in a quiescent state in rather shallow water. He procured a small harpoon from the proprietor of the Mills Tavern, with which he succeeded in striking it near its tail. With assistance he got it to the bank, when it proved to be a fine young sturgeon, of the weight of 16½ lbs. It is singular, that during the past month, no fewer than four other fish of the same species have been caught near the same spot.—We may here observe with reference to the Lea, that a small undecked steamer has begun within the last few days, to ply upon the river between Lea-bridge and Tottenham.

Fatal Accident to Capt. de Salis.—On Wednesday evening, as the Hon. Capt. de Salis, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, was riding in Victoria-row, Pimlico, which was much crowded with people anxious to witness the arrival of the Queen, his horse suddenly started, and stumbling, fell over him. He was picked up in an insensible state, and expired on Thursday evening. The unfortunate gentlemen was only 24 years of age. The injuries he sustained left no hope of his recovery; in addition to concussion of the brain, a deep wound was inflicted on the hip joint, which laid the bone bare, and another on the knee joint. The Countess de Salis, with her daughter and youngest son, came up from Uxbridge, and remained at the bedside of Capt. de Salis until his death. During the whole of Thursday there were repeated messages from the Palace by command of Her Majesty and Prince Albert, who were much affected upon being informed of the accident, and there were not less than 200 persons of distinction who called to make their personal inquiries.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending June 21:—West Districts, 138; Northern, 167; Central, 144; Eastern, 164; Southern, 190; Total, 803; males, 423; females, 560. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1173; males, 613; females, 560.

Provincial.

Cambridge.—The fifteenth meeting of the British Association commenced in this town, last week, under the presidency of Sir John Herschel. Of the foreign eminent magnetists and meteorologists who were invited to Cambridge for a conference this year, at the end of the second triennial period of combined magnetic and meteorological observations, only Messrs. Kupffer, Kreil, Dove, Ermann, and Baron Senftenberg attended, but on the whole the attendance of the members generally was satisfactory. On Tuesday there was a meeting of the general committee to fix the place of the next meeting of the association, and to appoint a president, vice-presidents, and secretaries. Invitations were read from Southampton and Cheltenham, the former of which was supported by the Rev. Mr. Shapcott, and the latter by the Rev. Dr. Thorp and Mr. Boddely. Sir John Boileau read a resolution recently passed by the town-council of Norwich, for inviting the association to meet in that city, and Dr. Daubeny, on behalf of the University of Oxford, said the authorities of that University were anxious that the British Association should again visit Oxford. The only two formal invitations, however, that had been presented to the council were those from Southampton and Cheltenham, and on the motion of Mr. Murchison, seconded by the Dean of Westminster, it was unanimously agreed that Southampton should be the next place of meeting. It was afterwards arranged to take place in the first week of September. Mr. Murchison was appointed president for the next year, and the following were appointed vice presidents:—The Marquis of Winchester, the Earl of Yarborough, Lord Palmerston, Lord Ashburton, Sir W. Heathcote, Sir George Staunton, the Dean of Westminster, Professor Powell, Professor Owen, and the Speaker of the House of Commons. Mr. Moody, of Southampton, was appointed local secretary, and the other officers of the Association were re-appointed. On the same day, after a lecture by Mr. Murchison on the Geology of Russia, some interest was excited by a speech of the Dean of Westminster (Archdeacon Wilberforce), in which he eloquently defended scientific pursuits from the attacks of those who considered science opposed to religion. He made no allusion directly to the Dean of York, but it was evident that Mr. Wilberforce's remarks were called forth by the attacks which Dr. Cockburn has recently made upon geology and all the writers on that science.

Hereford.—The Lord Bishop of Hereford commenced the triennial visitation of his diocese last week, at All Saints Church, the cathedral being still under repair. The right rev. prelate, in the course of a very lengthened charge, alluded, with expressions of satisfaction, to the efforts made in the erection of new churches throughout the diocese, and to the increase in the number of services. His lordship then proceeded to speak of the divisions which had recently agitated the Church, and remarked in unmeasured terms of reprobation on the moral dishonesty of those who, while professing adherence to the established Church of this country, were instilling into the minds of their congregations some of the most pernicious errors of the church of Rome. The introduction of obsolete ceremonials into the services of the Church the Bishop strongly condemned, and characterised the disputes with reference to vestments as a disgrace to the age. His lordship appealed to the clergy not to introduce into the celebration of divine worship novelties which might tend to occasion discord, and lead to the estrangement of the people. The remainder of the charge had reference principally to matters connected with the present state of the diocese.

Liskeard.—A meeting has recently been held at Callington, and another is about to be held in this town, for the purpose of adopting measures for bringing forward two tenant farmers as candidates for East Cornwall at the next election. This step is taken, it appears, in consequence of the example already set in the same way by the agriculturists of South Devon.

Carlisle.—An inquest has been held in this town on the body of Mr. John Graham, yeoman, of Grinsdale, who died under circumstances which gave rise to a strong suspicion that poison had been administered to him by some guilty hand. The party to whom suspicion pointed was Mr. Graham's own son, a farmer, who has hitherto stood high in the estimation of all following the same calling, for his intelligence and success in many departments of agriculture. It was but a mere suspicion at first, but ultimately Mr. John Graham was taken into custody on a charge of poisoning his wife and his father. Soon after the death of Mr. Graham, of Grinsdale, rumours got abroad that the son's wife had died after a sudden illness, in which all the symptoms of poisoning were manifested. This was in November last. There were suspicions soon after her decease that she had met with foul play, but as there were no definite grounds for supporting them, they were forgotten until after the death of the father, when they were revived, and eventually reached the ears of the coroner. The inquiry into the cause of Mr. Graham's death was still going on; and the coroner at once resolved upon exhuming the body, and submitting it to a post mortem examination. The result of this examination was, that the body, otherwise exhibiting healthy symptoms, contained in the intestines arsenic sufficient to cause death. Before and after this discovery, the inquiry occupied the coroner and jury several days there being no fewer than nine adjournments, and the excitement that it created throughout the whole northern part of England has been of a very intense character. The coroner, on Friday last, having summed up the facts of this mysterious tragedy, the jury returned a unanimous verdict of "Wilful murder against John Graham." The coroner then made out his commitment for trial at the ensuing assizes.

Oxford.—There is no longer any doubt of the fact that the Rev. Mr. Newman, of Littlemore, will immediately secede from the Established Church, and openly embrace the doctrines of the Church of Rome. Indeed it is stated that the day for his admission into the Roman Catholic Church has been fixed for some time past. It is also said that the Rev. Mr. Oakeley and some of the principal lay members of his congregation are about to follow Mr. Newman's example. The Rev. J. M. Capes of St. John's Church, Eastover, Bridgewater, has formally announced his secession from the Established Church, and resigned his license into the hands of the bishop.

The Lords' Committees have decided that the preamble of the Midland (Syston to Peterborough) has been proved, but have added a clause providing for the deviation of the line, so as to avoid the destruction of Lord Harborough's park. They have also decided that the preamble has been proved in the case of the Ely and Huntingdon, the Lynn and Ely, the Southampton and Dorchester, the Dundee and Perth (North line), the Aberdeen and Edinburgh and Hawick: and that the preamble of the Leeds and West Riding has not been proved. The following bills passed Standing Orders Committee, Leeds and Thirsk; Newcastle and Darlington; Waterford and Kilkenny; Blackburn and Preston; Trent Valley; Glasgow, Paisley, Kilmarnock, and Ayr; Bury and Ipswich; the Eastern Union; Bridgewater Navigation and Railway; Sheffield and Rotherham; Newcastle and Darlington (Bridlington Branch), York and North Midland (Harrogate Branch); and Edinburgh and Glasgow. The Commons' Committees have decided that the preamble has been proved in the case of the Wymondham branch of the Norwich and Brandon, but that the Attleborough and Diss, and the Diss, Beccles, and Yarmouth projects being withdrawn, the communication south of Norwich and Brandon to London should be left entirely for the discussion of another session. They therefore negatived the bill for the Direct Norwich line throughout. They have also passed the preamble of the Irish Great Western at the same time suggesting the insertion of clauses to secure the construction of the branch from Tullamore to Portarlington. They have also declared the preamble of the Glasgow, Barrhead, and Neilson proved, and the preamble of the London and Brighton (Wandsworth branch), not proved.—A meeting of the subscribers to the Windsor Junction Railway has been held at Windsor, when it was resolved to dissolve the company, and return the subscribers half the amount of their subscription. The consent of the Crown had not been obtained to the project, and that was necessary to its progress. It was hoped that the consent would be granted to the prayer of a majority of the inhabitants, and a public meeting is to be called to take the subject into consideration.—In reference to the late accidents on the Great Western, and to another of the same kind which has since occurred, a conversation took place in the House of Commons on Monday, when Sir G. Clerk stated the substance of General Pasley's report on the subject. It appears from this that the accidents had been owing to the elasticity of the rails—that is, to their undue lightness—and also to the use of a light four-wheel luggage van. By the end of the summer the whole of the light rails are to be entirely removed, and the four-wheel luggage van has already been discontinued.—The second accident, which occurred on the same line, took place on Friday. On that afternoon as the express train to Paddington, consisting of four passengers' carriages and a luggage van, had nearly reached Salthill, the engine-driver observed that the luggage van was off the rails. He immediately slackened the speed, and stopped the train before it had proceeded a quarter of a mile farther. The driver then proceeded with the engine to Slough, and returned with the necessary assistance to replace the van, which was done in half an hour, and the train proceeded to town. Fortunately, the van was in the rear of the carriages, or the accident might have proved of serious consequence.—The project to throw a huge tube, composed of sheet iron, across the Menai Straits, for the transit of a railway train, has been abandoned, owing, doubtless, to the probable effects of a gale of wind pressing upon such an extent of surface as so large a tube would necessarily present. It is said to be in contemplation to erect, in its stead two bridges of solid construction, both of them uniting on the Britannia rock, and to throw out piers from each side of the Straits.

Dublin.—A decision of considerable importance, connected with the opening of Trinity College, has been recently pronounced in the Court of Queen's Bench. Mr. O'Hagan, on behalf of Mr. D. C. Heron, a Roman Catholic student of Trinity College, moved the Court that a peremptory mandamus should go to the visitors, the Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, requiring them to hear Mr. Heron's appeal against the decision of the Provost and Senior Fellows, who had refused him a scholarship, because he was a Roman Catholic, and would not take the Sacramental Test. The case was argued at great length by Mr. O'Hagan and Mr. Holmes for Mr. Heron, and by Mr. Miller and Mr. Napier, Q.C., for the visitors. The Chief Justice, in giving judgment, pronounced the unanimous decision of the Court, that the peremptory mandamus should go, notwithstanding the return of the visitors. This judgment is of great importance, as it raises the question distinctly as to the right of the Catholics of Ireland to scholarships in Trinity College.—The Great Britain steamer arrived in Kingston harbour on Sunday from Plymouth, and anchored at the old jetty, hailed by the cheers of countless thousands who had assembled to witness the event. The crowds that proceeded to Kingstown on Sunday to see her were really astonishing. At 6 o'clock it was imputed that upwards of 25,000 had passed to and fro during the day. It is said that the railway company gave the proprietors of the Great Britain 500*l.* for bringing her to Dublin, and that they will net about three times that sum by the bargain.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday in Conciliation-hall, Alderman Keshan, Lord Mayor elect, in the chair.—Mr. M. O'CONNELL read an address from the association to the Repealers of the north of Ireland, dissuading them from any interference with the processions which the Orangemen intend to hold on the 1st and 12th July. He also read a communication from Mr. Steele, who has gone on "a mission of peace" to Ulster, in which the head pacificator states that, in the districts already visited by him, his exertions in furtherance of the object for which he was sent to the north have been attended with success. He congratulated the association on the good feeling which was springing up between Orangemen and Repealers. It was only necessary that they should know one another, to convince the Orangeman that they were working as much for his good as for their own. Once united legally and peaceably together for the repeal, and Ireland could not long remain without her Parliament. A sum of 28*l.* 10*s.* was acknowledged from the Roman Catholic Deanery of Ballina, and another of 80*l.* from the priesthood of Ossory. Mr. M. O'Connell said that he hailed these contributions with peculiar satisfaction, as they afforded the proof that Peel's attempt to divide the clergy from the laity, in their political pursuits had completely failed.—Mr. DAVIS (of the Young Ireland section) declared his belief that if Sir R. Peel were to endow a college in every county in Ireland he would not be able to corrupt the nationality of the priesthood.—Mr. M. O'Connell reported to the meeting that the Repealers were making the most satisfactory progress at the County Dublin Registry, and were being entered in the roll in the proportion of five to one over their opponents. He then read a letter from Mr. Smith O'Brien, transmitting a subscription, and declaring that all he has seen during his visit to London has tended strongly to confirm his conviction that a Repeal of the Union is indispensable to the welfare of Ireland. Mr. M. O'Connell then moved that it be referred to a committee to prepare an address to Mr. O'Brien, expressive of their disgust at the late assault made on him by Mr. Roebuck, and of their unabated confidence in his patriotism and virtue.—Mr. DAVIS and others expressed their cordial sympathy with Mr. O'Brien, and declared that the attack to which he had been subjected in the alien Parliament greatly raised him in their estimation.—A report of a committee highly unfavourable to Lord Stanley's Improvements Act was brought up by Mr. Davis, who condemned the measure in the most unqualified terms. He particularly arraigned its enactment as destructive to the tenant right of Ulster.—Mr. M. O'CONNELL seconded Mr. Davis in his motion, and addressed the meeting at considerable length against the measure.—Capt. HAWLEY and Mr. DOHENY followed in the same line of argument.—The rent for the week was 454*l.* 4*s.*

Cavan.—The following letter, describing an appalling murder of a magistrate, on Sunday, between Kilmore and Crossdoney, in this county, appears in the Evening Mail:—"Cavan, June 22. I have just returned from the village of Crossdoney, in the vicinity of which a most barbarous murder was committed this day. At a quarter past two o'clock, George F. Bell Booth, Esq., of Drumcarbin, was returning from Kilmore church, in his gig, with two of his children, one five and the other six years old, his eldest son, a boy of about 11, riding behind him on a pony. When he arrived at 'The Rocks,' the residence of the sub-sheriff, W. Bell, Esq., he was met by a man, who walked coolly and deliberately along the road, smoking a long pipe. The villain walked up to Mr. Booth, presenting a horse pistol. It is thought Mr. Booth stooped his head, and that on his doing so the murderer fired. The ball entered the upper part of the forehead, and lodged within the skull; he fell instantly from his gig dead. The horse, frightened by the report of the shot, ran away, throwing the two children on the road—one of them had his arm broken in the fall, or by the wheel of the gig passing over it. The body of the murdered gentleman lies in the house of the sub-sheriff, where it will remain until an inquest is held upon it. Mrs. Bell, of the Rocks, whose carriage had just broken down, passed the murderer on foot a few seconds before he fired. On hearing the report, she turned round, and saw the body fall from the gig. What the motive is which instigated this assassination we cannot form the most distant idea, for a more kind, tender-hearted, upright gentlemen, did not exist. There is no trace of the murderer, who crossed into the fields and escaped." Another letter states that the police had returned, after an unavailing search after the murderer. The poor child of Mr. Booth was so severely injured that his life was considered in danger. The Government, on receiving intelligence of this murder, directed an increase of the military force in Cavan; but some further measures will be necessary to prevent a collision between the enraged Catholic and Protestant population. This is made evident by the fact that the murderer walked away coolly and deliberately in open day, and in the presence of numerous persons who were afraid to bring vengeance on themselves by interfering. It is also proved by the still stronger facts that the remains of the murdered gentleman were carried to their last resting place, under an escort of nearly 3000 Protestants armed in self defence; and that the Rev. Mr. Brady—the Roman Catholic priest—a popular and respected man—has been compelled to fly to the shelter of a police barrack, to escape the vengeance of those Protestants who have come to the fearful resolution of making the clergyman pay the penalty of the crimes committed by his flock.

The Moors.—The Inverness Journal says "We are happy to be able to assure our sporting friends that they may be certain of the ensuing season being one of the best for grouse that has occurred for a number of years. From sportsmen in quest of shooting quarters, and keepers who have thoroughly examined their grounds, we hear that young birds will be abundant. The covies average from 8 to 10, and for some time past the little cheepers have been trying short excursions on wing. A keeper, who has watched the first appearance of young birds for many years, noticed a brood this season so early as the 6th May. On all the lower Moors they are now about a month old; and on the high mountain ranges both grouse and ptarmigan are strong and plentiful."

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—Needham v. Dowling.—Privilege of Counsel.—This was an action for verbal slanders, brought by the Hon. H. W. Needham, son of the late and brother of the present Lord Kilmorey, against Mr. Serjeant Dowling, to recover compensation in damages for words used by that learned gentleman in the course of an argument before the Court of Common Pleas, the which words it was alleged imputed fraud to the plaintiff. The facts stated by Mr. Serjeant Byles for the plaintiff went to show that the Hon. Mr. Needham had entered into a negotiation with Mr. Briscoe for a loan of 24,000*l.*, to be made to him, the plaintiff, as trustee for certain property, and in consequence of this negotiation, Mr. Briscoe was led to sell out of the funds to a very large amount. Ultimately, however, Mr. Briscoe declined to advance more than 22,000*l.*; and Mr. Needham thereupon refused to complete the security in respect of the loan of that amount, as a portion of the trust fund agreed to be advanced had not been forthcoming, but was diverted from its stipulated use. Legal proceedings in divers forms followed, and were brought to a termination, so that it only remained to be determined which party should pay certain costs in dispute. The defendant in this action, Serjeant Dowling, while contending that a motion which had been made in the cause on behalf of the plaintiff ought to be dismissed with costs, drew the attention of the Court to many of the facts in the original action not directly relevant, as it was contended, to the matter on hand, and in the course of his argument made use of the words for which this action was brought. He began a sentence thus;—"Taking into view the large sum Mr. Needham defrauded us of——." The sentence, through the interruption of some remarks from the Bench as to the arguments before the Court, remained unfinished. On this fragment of a sentence, nevertheless, this action for verbal slander was brought. It was submitted for the plaintiff that there were three questions for the jury. First, whether, as alleged in the declaration, the words really did impute fraud to the plaintiff; secondly, whether those words were relevant to the matter before the Court at the time they were used; thirdly, whether, although the sentence was not complete, the meaning of the defendant was not clear and distinct, and the imputation on the plaintiff's conduct and character perfectly conveyed. On behalf of defendant, Sir T. Wilde submitted that a nonsuit must be entered, as the plaintiff had established no fact that could be referred to the jury, and had not succeeded in making out the slightest case. With regard to the words on which the action was brought, they did not in point of fact refer to the application of the loan in question, but to the circumstance of the plaintiff having failed to give security in respect thereof, as had been arranged between the parties. It never was pretended or alleged that there had been any fraud in the application of the loan. It never was pretended that there had been any fraud in the application of the money handed over by Mr. Briscoe. The declaration altogether mistook the application of the defendant's expression, for what the

Learned Sergeant (Sergeant Dowling) really alluded to was the fact of the plaintiff not having given the promised and expected security, by which failure upon his part Mr. Briscoe was left in the situation of being defrauded of that security, upon the faith of which he had made the advances. But he would take the broad facts as they stood. He admitted that counsel in his personal character as counsel had no privilege: but the client who was represented by his counsel, when coming into Court, had a right to every facility, opportunity, and means of fully and freely stating his whole case. Surely it could not be seriously contended that out of every sentence spoken by counsel representing the fraudulent conduct of parties, or relating to the misconduct of witnesses, an action should arise if it happened to turn out afterwards that, in the zeal of the advocate, and the excitement of the moment, and the haste of giving utterance to passing observations, remarks had been made which could not be proved, or statements asserted that could not clearly be borne out by evidence. Cases had been decided, in which it was held that words otherwise slanderous, when spoken by counsel, and pertinent to the matter on hand, were not actionable, but were to be presumed to be spoken from the instructions of his client, and that counsel were to have free liberty of speech so long as it was not shown that they were actuated by malice. Even if the declaration had been proved, which it certainly was not, there were abundant facts to show that the remark of counsel was relevant on this occasion; and as there was really no case made out on the part of the plaintiff, he submitted that he must be nonsuited. Chief Justice Tindal said the plaintiff must be nonsuited. He did not see how the jury could possibly say whether the words complained of were or were not relevant to matters which they had not heard. From the course the motion had taken in the Court above, it was, in his mind, quite open to the learned serjeant to call the attention of the judges to the subject matter of the original action, and point out the relations that subsisted between the parties. No doubt the learned serjeant had been a little strong in his observation, but it was impossible not to say that he had a right to urge that to the Court which could be answered by the other side. The remark was relevant, because everybody knew where costs were in the discretion of the Court, and where one party appeared to have been injured by the conduct of the other side, the Court would be anxious to see justice done. Here the defendant had commenced in a strong form of expression, a sentence which was not finished, but he (Chief Justice Tindal) could not say that it was either not pertinent or not relevant to the matter in question, and he therefore thought that the privilege, not of counsel, but of the suitor, ought to prevail. Plaintiff nonsuited.

Court of Queen's Bench.—The Queen, v. Barnard Gregory.—In this case Mr. Justice Patteson, a few days since, pronounced judgment on Barnard Gregory, for libels published on the Duke of Brunswick, in the Satirist, in 1842. Defendant pleaded guilty at the trial in 1843, and judgment was respited, on his giving a pledge that no further libels should appear. A few months afterwards, however, another libel was published by defendant on the Duke of Brunswick, and judgment was consequently now prayed. Mr. Justice Patteson, after hearing counsel on both sides, sentenced defendant to be imprisoned for 6 months in the Queen's Bench.—On Wednesday last, in the same Court, defendant was again tried for imputing to the Duke of Brunswick that he had been concerned in the murder of Eliza Grimwood. Several paragraphs from the Satirist, in the varied shapes of articles, letters of correspondents, and notices to correspondents, were those in which the libellous matter was alleged to have been published, and these were read to the Court. They were of the usual class of such paragraphs, consisting of inuendos rather than straightforward charges, and were, as Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, for the prosecution observed, well calculated to annoy and irritate. Lord Denman briefly stated the case to the jury, who at once returned a verdict of guilty.

Court of Exchequer.—Revenue Prosecutions.—The Court has been again occupied of late with prosecutions for evading the Customs and Excise duties. Among these were the following:—Attorney-Gen. v. Jeffs.—There were three informations against this defendant, who is a vendor of French publications in the Burlington-arcade. He was charged with importing cases of French books, by the Harlequin steamer from Boulogne, on the 17th of January, 1842, on which he paid duty as if each box contained only a certain weight, whilst it was alleged that, from its bulk, the case imported was capable of containing nearly six times the quantity on which the duty was actually paid. It was suggested that the box had been delivered to the defendant through the instrumentality of a person named Homersham, whose name has been frequently mentioned in connection with frauds of this description. In each case the verdict was for the Crown, for the penalty of 100*l*., and in the last case the jury added a recommendation to mercy.—Attorney-Gen. v. West.—This was also an information against the defendant, who was the master of a coasting vessel, called the Cornwall, for a breach of the Customs law in obtaining at the London Custom-house a "transire" for passing from London to Hull, and instead thereof, going to Nieuport in Flanders, and there shipping a cargo of sugar, which the "transire" enabled him to land at Hull without payment of duty, no suspicion of fraud being excited. The jury, without hesitation found a verdict for the Crown, penalty 200*l*.—Attorney-General v. Gaston.—This was an information against the defendant, who is a tobacco manufacturer residing at Lincoln, for illegally unshipping bestowing and concealing, and having in his possession, a quantity of leaf tobacco, which had not paid the duty, and for the removal of which no permit was granted. The jury returned a verdict for the Crown, finding the single value of the tobacco to be 126*l*. Attorney-General v. Jackson and others.—This was an information, at the instance of the Excise department, against Wm. Jackson and two persons named Wharton, all residing at Hull, to recover a penalty of 200*l*. for being concerned in the illegal manufacture of an imitation of tobacco from beech-leaves. The two Whartons were caught in the act. The defence on behalf of Jackson was, that the Whartons were avowedly guilty, and that the evidence was not sufficient to show that Jackson had any knowledge of the illegal manufacture carried on by them. The Chief Baron, in summing up, adverted to the circumstance that the cottage, in which the Whartons lived and were seized, was standing within 40 yards of Jackson's dwelling-house shut up, and apparently unoccupied, which would naturally have excited his attention. The jury, without retiring from the box, returned a verdict for the Crown on two counts.—At the Court of Excise, Daniel Gratz, No. 58, Great Prescott-street, Whitechapel, was charged with having in his possession an article manufactured in imitation of snuff, composed of several noxious and injurious ingredients. Mr. G. Phillips, analytical chemist to the Excise, said that he had received samples of the seizure, which he had analysed. They contained no particle of tobacco whatever; but were composed of vegetable and earthy matter, in the following proportions:—Vegetable and organic matter (consisting of ground woody fibre), 63.7; salts and solutions, 26.5; earth (chiefly lime), 6; sand, 3.8; total, 100 parts. The Court fined defendant in the penalty of 25*l*.

Arches Court.—The Office of the Judge promoted by Barnes v. Shore.—This was a proceeding against the Rev. James Shore, an ordained clergyman of the Church of England, and lately officiating, under a license from the Bishop of Exeter, in the chapel of Berry Pomeroy, in that diocese, for having violated the laws ecclesiastical by performing service contrary to the Rubric of the Church of England, and in an unconsecrated and unlicensed chapel. The rev. defendant has formally seceded from the Church of England, and the question is whether a clergyman of that Church can get rid of e obligations accepted by him on taking orders. The Queen's Advocate, on behalf of the defendant, submitted that under the Toleration Laws any English subject, lay or clerical, was permitted to withdraw from the Church of England. He would not be permitted to return, if he were desirous of doing so: but the laws gave him the privilege of retiring from a Church of whose doctrines he no longer approved. Dr. Adams, for the promoter of the suit, contended that the rule laid down, though applicable to laymen, had never been extended to men in holy orders. Attempts had frequently been made to escape the responsibility and obligation of those orders. The attempt had been made by Horne Tooke, among others, but it had always been made unsuccessfully. It would be an intolerable scandal to the Church if her ordained ministers were permitted, as was being done in this case, to officiate in a Dissenting chapel, and to promulgate doctrines in opposition to her own. The Court took time to consider its decision.

Central Criminal Court.—(Before Mr. Justice Patteson and Mr. Baron Platt).—Thomas Jennings surrendered on an indictment charging him with having been after the 1st January engaged in manning, equipping, and navigating the ship Augusta, for the purposes of the slave trade, contrary to the statute 5th George IV. It may be recollected that Mr. De Zulueta was tried at this court in September, 1843, for fitting out the Augusta for the slave trade, and after a protracted trial acquitted. The prisoner in this case had been tried at Sierra Leone and acquitted, but a fresh indictment having been drawn up against him through the instrumentality of Sir G. Stephens, attorney to the Anti-Slavery Society, a plea was put in of autrefois acquit. A demurrer to the plea was, however, put in, and the result was the present trial. Mr. Payne stated the case at considerable length, and proceeded to call the following witnesses:—Capt. Hill said, I am Governor of the Gold Coast. In 1839 I was in command of her Majesty's ship Saracen on that coast. I was on that station for four years, from 1837 to 1841, for the protection of British commerce and for the prevention of the slave trade. I am well acquainted with the Gallinas. I have made a rough chart of it. The Gallinas is a river not navigable for large vessels. It is not navigable for such vessels as the Augusta. There never was, to my knowledge, any other trade carried on but the slave trade at Gallinas. There were six or seven slave establishments there until 1840, when they were destroyed by the naval squadron on the coast. Upwards of 800 slaves were found there at that time.—Mr. Lush: Was it not notorious in the Gallinas who the slave-dealers were?—Mr. Hill objected to that question. Mr. Justice Patteson thought the question could not be put.—Mr. Lush: Do you know Captain Rolo?—I know him, and have had conversations with him. I saw him at a place called Dumbocoro. There were barracoons there, and several houses belonging to them. I saw Rolo landing from a vessel, and also on shore. I know the name of Angel Ximenis. I have seen him at Sierra Leone. I never saw him at Gallinas. I have seen a person called Alvarez at a small town close to Gallinas. I saw no barracoons at that place. Barracoons are large buildings used for keeping slaves.—Mr. Hill: I do not think the description of barracoons is evidence.—Mr. Justice Patteson: I think it is.—Capt. Hill: The barracoons contain a great number of slaves. In the year 1839 I captured a vessel called the Goluptchick, sailing under the Russian flag, eight or nine miles from the Gallinas. The commander was called Bernardos. I sent her to Sierra Leone for the purpose of prosecuting her, but she was not prosecuted on account of her being under the Russian flag. I then sent her to England. In February, 1840, I captured her under another name, under the English flag. She was at anchor in the roads of Gallinas. When I captured her as the Goluptchick, she had slave equipment on board. She had water casks and coppers. When I boarded the Augusta I saw the prisoner, and asked him for the papers. When he had given them to me, I said I recognised her as being a vessel I had before seized, under the name of the Goluptchick. He said he was ignorant of my having captured her before. Having looked over the papers, I returned them to him, and demanded to whom the vessel was consigned? He said, "Oh, I know better than to tell you that." I insisted upon knowing, and said I would detain the vessel till I was informed. In a minute or two he called one of his men, and told him to give him a bundle of letters that were in his cabin, and they were brought up to me. [Mr. Brown, from the Admiralty, produced several letters, the logbook, &c. belonging to the ship]. It was a packet in an envelope. The prisoner took off the envelope, but the letters were sealed up in another cover inside. That bore an address. The prisoner said that was the person the vessel was consigned to. The following day I broke the seals, and I ultimately sent the whole to Sierra Leone. I do not see the envelope I broke here.—Mr. Lush said: I propose to ask the address which was on the envelope.—Mr. Hill thought it would be hard to ask the address of an envelope which was not produced.—Captain Hill said he had seen the envelope and other letters since before the Vice-Admiralty Court.—Mr. Brown examined: Said he did not notice the papers particularly, but he thought they had all been in the Court of Admiralty. They had all been brought from Sierra Leone.—Mr. Lush thought now he might ask the question as to the address on the envelope.—Justice Patteson: I do not think you have brought the case a bit further.—Capt. Hill: The envelope contained ten letters, and there is one of them now missing. They were all together in Sierra Leone. I see here nine of them which I took out of the envelope. The letters themselves were not sealed. I afterwards demanded the first papers again and seized the ship. I examined the envelope with the bill of lading (read in Court). It purported to consign the goods to Don José Alvares Angel Ximenis, and José Peres Rolo, at Gallinas. The barracoons at Gallinas had been destroyed three months before the arrival of the Augusta. I sent the ship to Sierra Leone, and proceeded there myself There she was condemned. The prisoner was at Sierra Leone at the time. I examined the hold of the ship, and moved the cargo, but no slave equipments were found. Slave fittings may be got at Gallinas, such as water-casks, shackles, and bolts, but at the time the Augusta was seized none of those implements were to be found. It would take but few hours to take in a cargo if the implements were ready, and if such implements had been provided beforehand, the Augusta might have been laden in a few hours. I knew Bernardo's writing, and one of the letters given by the prisoner is, to the best of my belief, in his handwriting. The logbook contains the course of the ship on its way. On the 17th, the Augusta is described as being 170 miles off Ushant; that might not be very far west of the Scilly Islands. The wind was not fair for Cadiz, as the wind was from the westward, and Cadiz was southward. The wind is described in the log as being so boisterous, that it would be difficult to make a passage any way. The ship should be lying-to. I think the log is so much written over, it is difficult to distinguish the writing. It is almost impossible to say anything with it. The various documents produced were then put in and read. Mr. Hill stated he would defer his cross-examination till a chart had been obtained, to enable Capt. Hill to fix the situation of the vessel off Ushant. Emmanuel Emmanuel said he lived at Portsmouth. He knew the brig Goluptchick. He purchased her for 630*l*. or 650*l*. He afterwards sold her to Captain Jennings and Mr. Bernardos for 650*l*. in August, 1841. Cross-examined: Mr. Bernardos has been in command of the ship before. The Hon. Capt. Denman, examined by Mr. Payne, said: I am a captain in Her Majesty's service. During the years 1840 and 1841. I commanded a district on the coast of Africa. I know Gallinas. I was there about eight months, watching it closely. There is no trade but slave-trade there. It contained six large factories and two small ones. Barracoons are part of a factory. Each barracoon might hold 1000 slaves. I know a person called Ignatio Rollo. I believe he is now dead. He carried on the slave-trade there. There is a part of the coast of Africa where there is lawful and unlawful trade. At Gallinas there is no export except in slaves. (Referring to the log-book of the prisoner): On the 18th November the ship would be within 120 miles from Cork, and the wind was S.S.E. in the forenoon, and variable in the afternoon. The distance from Cadiz might be 800 or 900 miles. On that day the wind was a fair one for Cork in the morning, but in the afternoon it might be fair for both Cadiz and Cork. The wind kept to the N.E. on the night of the 18th, and according to the course she was taking on the 19th, 20th, and 21st, she was fair for Cadiz. The log is kept with great carelessness, for the latitude and longitude, and the number of miles show her in a different position. On the 18th November she might easily have got into Cork in a day. Assuming that a ship bound for Gallinas was in want of repair, and within 120 miles of Cork, it was the proper course to take her there. Cross-examined by Mr. Hill: I saw Rolo first on board the Vanguardia, a ship I captured, and afterwards on shore at a factory in Dumbocoro, and had a good deal of conversation with him. That would not be a convenient course for a vessel to come into a port with dollars. The more convenient way would be to send a ship to discharge its cargo, go away, and let another ship come and take away the slaves. That requires two vessels. The former case often happens however. The Gallinas is about 200 miles by sea from Sierra Leone. The barracoons were destroyed on the 16th November, and on the 28th October I arrived at Sierra Leone. Sierra Leone has no slave-trade. The passage from that to Plymouth or Portsmouth would take about six weeks. By Mr. Payne: When ships come with cargoes and land them, the constant practice is to send letters back about the slaves, and then a ship is sent to take away the slaves. Thomas James Clarke, examined by Mr. Lush, said: I was in the Augusta as cabin-boy. I was engaged to go from Portsmouth to Liverpool. When we were out a week, we had a gale in the Channel. I heard, when I signed articles, that I was going to the coast of Africa. I do not know, when the gale came on, how far we were from Cork. There was a complaint made to the captain because he would not go into Cork. They said there was a fair wind for it. He told me to tell the men he would put into the port of Cadiz when the ship came to it. The gale lasted some time. When we came to Cadiz, several seamen were discharged. We remained a month or more at Cadiz. The captain went much on shore, but I never heard him say to what house he went there. I went with the ship from Cadiz to Gallinas, and was on board when the vessel was seized. I do not know a Mr. Martinez. When the ship was tacking I saw letters passed by the captain to a man acting as steward, and they were destroyed. Captain Hill was in the cabin at the time, but I do not believe he saw them. The steward came on deck with the papers, and went into the galley with them, where there was a fire. I never saw the papers again. Before we left Portsmouth there were some bolts stowed in a locker in the cabin in a carpet bag. I saw no shackles. Cross-examined by Mr. Hill: I first mentioned about the papers at the time the last trial was on, to a gentleman called Stevens. The men who were sent away at Cadiz were very mutinous. I was on very good terms with my captain. I forget whether he asked my captain for a character. I believe I was discharged at Sierra Leone. After that I took service in a schooner bound for the Gambia, commanded by a man of the name of Nicholl. He got no character with me before he took me. I have been to North America after I left the brig, but not before. I do not recollect having been asked this question before.—William Thomas Unyon, examined by Mr. Payne: I live at Portsmouth. I know Captain Jennings and the Goluptchick. I have been on board it since it was called the Augusta. I often saw him receive letters on board. He used to cut the names out, and pass them to me. Captain Jennings said to me that the ship was going on the general trade to the coast of Africa, and she might, perhaps, go to the Havannah. I believe Jennings understood Spanish. I heard him speak of the Gallinas and the coast in general about there. I saw some deck screws on board. There were about 2s. They are for forming separate decks, for the purpose of having slaves. I also saw some shackles in the hold. There were false tops to the bed-steads. Cross-examined by Mr. Hill: I have never seen false decks. I saw the screws at Portsmouth. I remember the ship being sold. I know the prisoner's handwriting. The writing in the logbook, headed the 18th November, is his writing, and Mottley's (the mate). I think that if a vessel is a Spaniard, it cannot be commanded by an Englishman.—Mr. Payne then said he meant to give the nine letters in evidence.—Mr. Hill objected to these letters being read.—After some arguments from Mr. Payne and Mr. Lush, Mr. Justice Patteson decided they were not admissible, as they might have been given by a stranger, sealed up, and the prisoner might have been quite ignorant of their contents.—Colonel Nicholl: I was governor of the Island of Ascension. I know the Gallinas these 22 years. There is no other trade there but the slave-trade. I do not, of my own knowledge, know of any slave establishment there. I do not think slaves can be bought with money. Slaves never were bought with money.—Mr. Lush: Do you happen to know of any slave owners at Gallinas?—Witness: No: they took care not to come within my reach. I was in her Majesty's ship Victor, and we chased slavers out of the roads there.—Chidge, examined by Mr. Lush: I took the prisoner into custody. He said, "Well, I suppose I shall be the sufferer. I can say a great deal if I like." I said why not? and he answered, "Because I shall get other people into trouble." I said, I do not want to know anything you have got to say, and he said, "I do not care who knows it."—Joseph Case, examined by Mr. Payne: I was at work in the Augusta at Portsmouth. I have had conversations with Jennings about the Gallinas. I know it has no other trade but the slave-trade.—That was the case for the prosecution.—Mr. M. D. Hill then addressed the jury, and Justice Patteson having summed up, the jury begged to retire. After an hour's absence, they returned and acquitted the prisoner. The verdict was received with clappings of hands and cries of "Bravo!" This demonstration was immediately stopped by Baron Platt.—The prisoner was then indicted for misdemeanor, pro formâ, and acquitted.

Miscellaneous.

Discovery of a considerable deposit of Guano at Lawrence Island, N. S. W.—The following letter, received at Lloyd's, is of importance, and will be read with great interest by those engaged in the guano trade:—"Downing-street, June 19, 1845. Sir, I am directed by Lord Stanley to transmit to you the accompanying copy of a despatch which his lordship has received from the Governor of South Australia, reporting the discovery of a considerable deposit of guano at Lawrence Islands, within the Government of New South Wales, and expressing his opinion that it will be found in large quantities upon many islands on all the coasts of New Holland. Lord Stanley further directs me to request that you would move the committee of Lloyd's to adopt such measures as may appear to them best adapted for giving general publicity to Captain Greig's despatch. His Lordship would, however, wish that it should be clearly understood that it is not in his power to guarantee to any shipowners who may engage in the removal and conveyance of the guano in question, an exemption from such charges as the local governments of the British settlements in New Holland may see fit to impose on the removal of that article. I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant, G. W. HOPE. W. Dobson, Esq., Secretary, Lloyd's." The despatch alluded to above is in substance as follows:—"A considerable deposit of guano has been discovered upon Lawrence Island, lying in 38 deg. 23 south latitude, and 141 deg. 35 east longitude, immediately off Cape Nelson, and within the territory of New South Wales. This deposit is represented as being less rich than that in South America, but accounted for from the sample having been taken from the surface."

The Eureka (a Machine for Making Latin Verses).—This machine, now exhibiting at the Egyptian-hall, is one which presents much interest to scientific engineers, although it does not afford much facility to the attainment of elegant Latin composition. Its operation resembles that of Brewster's kaleidoscope, which, by very simple means, produces an endless succession of geometric figures. As in the kaleidoscope, this machine is calculated to manufacture, in never-ending series, Latin hexameters, "at the rate of about a verse a minute, each verse being perfect in grammar, sense, and prosody." Previous to the manufacture of the verse, the letters are collected together, as a compositor arranges his types, the several letters being placed together in alphabetical order. In the interior of the machine is placed a species of kaleidoscope, which is set in motion by clockwork, its rate of rotation being governed by a fly-wheel; on this kaleidoscope the letters of the alphabet are represented by figures, 1, 2, 3, &c., corresponding to a, b, c, up to the end of the alphabet; in this, to use the expression of the exhibitor, the verse is "conceived"—that is, the figures are combined in the same order as that under which the letters of the verse are to appear. In the side of the case certain probes are placed which are made to dart forward and ascertain what are the combinations of the kaleidoscope; as soon as the probes strike on the figures, the corresponding letters are detached, and sent down to the places assigned to each in the verse to be made. The whole number of letters then slowly descends and passes by the aperture, at which the verse appears, those only remaining visible which are required to form the verse. After remaining visible for some time, the verse is decomposed, or, as a printer would say, "distributed," and all the letters gathered up again, ready for use in their former alphabetical arrangement. The machine may be stopped at any time, or suffered to go on continually producing new verses, "each of which is original, having never been produced before, and never to be repeated again." The law which governs the operation of this machine is the law of evolution, by which, as in Babbage's machine, endless combinations of a certain form are produced. The form of the verse produced is always the same. The following—is a fair specimen of the Latinity and style of this mechanical poetry. The verb always appears in one place, and is always of one form, while the prevalence of neuter plurals is strikingly evident. The inventor of this machine is a Mr. Clark, a native of Glastonbury, to whom the first idea of this verse-maker was suggested by an old book, the work of one of the monks of Glastonbury Abbey, in which the theory of Mr. Clark's invention was contained. This was, with some labour, reduced to practice by Mr. Clark, and the result is, the machine which we have attempted to describe, inadequately we fear, as we were not able to inspect the interior of it. As a scientific work, we can recommend it to the notice of all men of inquiry and learning, but, as a "machine for making Latin hexameters," we fear we cannot recommend it to despairing schoolboys as a means of escape from the impending birch, or still more dreadful cane.—Times.

THE ATRAPILATORY, OR LIQUID HAIR DYE the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-doing (but as the hair grows), as it never fades or acquires that unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence, recommend the above dye as infallible, if done at their establishment; and ladies or gentlemen requiring it, are requested to bring a friend or servant with them to see how it is used, which will enable them to do it afterwards without the chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and some of their establishment having used it, the effect produced can be at once seen. They think it necessary to add, that by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.

News of the Week.

THE proceedings in Parliament this week bear proofs of that despatch of business which always indicates the approaching termination of the Session. The business transacted, with the exception of a few incidental motions, has been mostly of a routine character, and several Bills have been advanced in their respective stages with more than ordinary rapidity, and with a growing impatience of discussion. On Friday, Mr. Duncombe brought forward his motion for a select committee on the affairs of the post-office, dwelling especially on the evils of the early delivery system, and on the manner in which the "Post-office Directory" is got up as a source of profit to a particular officer. The motion was opposed by Government, and after some discussion was negatived by 106 to 30. On the same day Mr. Wyse's motion for the establishment of a Museum of National Antiquities was negatived without a division. In the discussion which ensued on the miscellaneous estimates, an interesting conversation took place on various matters of public interest, during which a strong desire was expressed by both sides of the House for the speedy erection of a National Gallery worthy of the country, in place of the present building in Trafalgar Square. Sir R. Peel admitted all the objections urged against the present gallery, and said that, by erecting such a building, we had thrown away the most magnificent site in Europe. On Monday the House went into Committee on the Irish Colleges Bill, and passed its clauses up to 13, after numerous amendments, moved by different members, had been negatived without a division. The chief incidents of the debate were an announcement by Mr. O'Connell, that the alterations made by Government in the Bill had not removed the objections of the Roman Catholic prelates,—and a declaration from Lord J. Russell that, after Mr. O'Connell's statement, he feared it would be useless to send the Bill to Ireland, believing that it would be prejudicial rather than beneficial in its consequences, if it still remained under the stigma of the Irish prelates. On Tuesday Capt. Layard brought forward his motion for limiting the term of enlistment in the army to 10 years, which was opposed by Government, and negatived without a division. On Wednesday the House went into committee on Mr. Cowper's Field Gardens Bill, though not without considerable opposition and a division. Several clauses were withdrawn, and others modified, in order to insure the passing of the measure; and after much discussion, which will be found at length in our report, the Bill passed through committee. On Thursday, on the order of the day for going into committee on the Scotch Poor Law Amendment Bill, Mr. Oswald moved as an amendment that the Bill be committed that day six months. After a long discussion on the condition of the poor in Scotland, and particularly in Sutherlandshire, a division took place, when the amendment was negatived by 76 to 33; and the House having gone into committee, the 34 first clauses were agreed to.

Our foreign news is not of much importance. The business of the session in the French Chambers is virtually at an end, and the principal event that has transpired since our last report is the passing of the Bill relative to the execution of the new convention for the suppression of the Slave-trade, by a majority of 243 to 1.—The Spanish Government has published a manifesto in opposition to those issued by Don Carlos and his son, and it is announced as certain that the Queen will return to Madrid without visiting the Basque provinces.—The troubles in the Lebanon continue unrepressed, and every account we receive brings fresh details of the lawless state of the district.—The Overland Mail from India and China has arrived this week, but there is no news which calls for particular remark; the state of India generally remaining nearly the same as at the departure of the last advices.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the royal family, with the King and Queen of the Belgians, continue at Buckingham Palace, and are quite well. Her Majesty and the Prince, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, visited the Exhibition of Cartoons, on Friday, in Westminster Hall. On Monday the Queen held chapters of the Orders of the Bath and of St. Michael and St. George, and afterwards held a Court and Privy Council. On the same day Prince Albert attended the review of the household troops in Hyde Park. On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, honoured the Exhibition of the Botanical Society, in the Regent's Park, with a visit. On the same day, Prince Albert presided at a meeting at the office of the Duchy of Cornwall, in Somerset-house. On Thursday the King of the Belgians held a Diplomatic Levee at Buckingham Palace; and in the afternoon the Queen and Prince Albert, and the King and Queen of the Belgians, went to Ealing-park, to honour Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence with a visit. It is confidently rumoured that the state of public business will enable the Queen to prorogue Parliament on the 6th August, and that it is the intention of the Queen to proceed to Germany immediately after the close of the session, for the purpose of visiting her relatives at Coburg. Viscountess Jocelyn has succeeded Lady Portman as lady in waiting; the Earl of Morton has succeeded Lord Rivers as lord in waiting; Admiral Sir R. Otway has succeeded Mr. R. Ormsby Gore as groom in waiting; the Hon. Eleanor Stanley, and the Hon. Caroline M. Dawson, have succeeded the Hon. Misses Paget and Liddell as the Maids of Honour in Waiting, and Colonel Buckley has succeeded the Hon. Colonel Grey as equerry in waiting to the Queen; and Colonel Bouverie has succeeded Major-General Sir E. Bowater as equerry in waiting to Prince Albert. The Queen has appointed the Hon. Caroline M. Dawson to be one of her Maids of Honour, in the room of the Hon. Clementina Hamilton, who has resigned, in consequence of her approaching marriage with the Bishop of Salisbury.—It has been positively rumoured in the higher circles of society, for some weeks past, that Sir Thomas Wilde is about to marry Madlle. D'Este, daughter of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, but the report was contradicted, by request, in the Morning Chronicle of Wednesday last.

Privy Council.—At the Council on Monday, Mr. Henry Lytton Bulwer, Minister Plenipotentiary to the Queen of Spain, and the Hon. W. Bingham Baring, Paymaster of the Forces, were, by command of the Queen, sworn of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and took their places at the board.

Lord Lieutenancy.—At the Court on Monday, the Marquis of Westminster was sworn into office as Lord Lieutenant of Cheshire, and Sir S. R. Glynne, Bart., as Lord-Lieutenant of Flintshire.

Orders of Knighthood.—At the Chapter of the Bath on Monday, Admiral Sir Robert Otway, Bart., was invested as a Knight Grand Cross; and Colonel Sir James Dennis and Rear-Admiral C. Strode were invested as Knights Commanders of the Bath. At the Chapter of St. Michael and St. George, H.R H. Prince George of Cambridge was invested with the insignia of a Knight Grand Cross of the Order.

Parliamentary Movements.—The death of Sir W. Follett has caused a vacancy for Exeter, for which Sir J. Duckworth, Bart., is a candidate on the Conservative interest, and Gen. Briggs on the Free Trade interest. Before Sir J. Duckworth came forward Mr. Teed, Q.C., offered himself as a Ministerial candidate, but the electors refused to return a lawyer, and he retired without a canvass.—Sir F. Thesiger's acceptance of office as Attorney-General creates a vacancy for Abingdon. The hon. gentleman is again a candidate, but is opposed by Gen. Caulfield, on Whig principles.—Under the impression that Mr. Fitzroy Kelly will be Solicitor-General, the electors of Cambridge are preparing for a contest. Lord Geo. Manners, Mr. Shafto Adair, and the Hon. Geo. Denman are mentioned as likely to be brought forward in opposition to Mr. Kelly; the first as a Conservative, and the two latter on Whig principles.—Sir John Hope, of Pinkie, Bart., has been elected for the county of Edinburgh, without opposition.—The death of Mr. Somes having caused a vacancy at Dartmouth, the nomination took place on Wednesday, when Mr. Moffat and Mr. Prinsep offered themselves as candidates; the first as a Free-trader, the second as a Ministerialist. The show of hands was declared to be in favour of Mr. Prinsep and a poll was demanded for Mr. Moffatt, to take place on Monday next.—The nomination of a candidate for West Suffolk will take place on Monday, when, according to all appearances, Captain Bennet, Conservative, will be elected without opposition.

Death of Sir William Follett.—From the brief notice in our last, our readers will be prepared for the announcement of the death of Sir W. Follett, which took place on Saturday afternoon, in the presence of Lady Follett and several members of his family. Sir William Follett's death has left a blank which will not be easily filled up. His fame as a barrister, was not merely European, but was known all over the world. As an advocate, whether in the Common Law or Equity Courts, there were few to equal him, if any, and none to surpass him. In politics he was a moderate Conservative; as a member of the Church of England he was for extending religious freedom to all, and was beloved by all parties. As Attorney-General he was, as long as his health permitted, assiduous in the extreme, and to the interests of his clients in general he was also most attentive. Sir William Follett has died in what may be styled the prime of life, at least as far as his professional pursuits were concerned. He was born at Topsham, near Exeter, in 1798, and was the son of Capt. Follett, of the 13th Foot. He had three other brothers and one sister, who married Dr. Bright. One of the brothers is a Chancery barrister, another a taxing officer in Chancery, the third is a timber merchant in Exeter. Sir William married, in 1830, the daughter of Sir Harding Gifford, formerly chief justice of Ceylon, and that lady now survives him, together with six children, two of whom are daughters, the youngest only thirteen months old. Sir William Follett first appeared as a politician, in 1832, when he stood as a candidate for Exeter, but was left in a minority on the poll. In 1835 he was successful, and was at the head of the list. At the last general election he was again returned by a large majority. In 1844, on his appointment to the office of Attorney-General, rendered vacant by the promotion of Sir F. Pollock (now Chief Baron), there was, of course, a new election, and at the close the poll stood :—Sir W. Follett, 1293 ; Major-General Briggs, 529. In November, 1834, Sir William was first appointed Solicitor-General, and remained in that office until April, 1835, when Sir R. Peel resigned the Ministry. He was re-appointed on the return of the Conservatives to power in 1841, and was presented to the office of Attorney-General in April, 1844. It was generally understood that Sir William Follett was to be the future Lord Chancellor of England, and that, if his health had permitted it, he would have been appointed to that high office at no distant date. "The demise of such a man," says the Morning Post, "cannot be contemplated by the public without poignant regret. No professional man of his age and standing has done more to earn the respect and admiration of his countrymen—of our own time, no man of his standing has occupied so high a place in the public esteem. It cannot be thought of but with great sadness that such a man should be cut down at that time of life when men in general are most vigorous —that his career, which promised to be so useful and so brilliant, should, by the mysterious decree of Providence, so quickly terminate in the grave. Sir William Follett's mind was unique among the public and professional men of his day. In facility and clearness of comprehension he was matchless. Many men have had more extensive knowledge, greater masses of learning stored up, but no man could so readily command the portion of learning which was exactly appropriate to the case brought before him. In clearness of argument Sir William Follett had no equal. Many men could argue with more vigour, and with greater copiousness, heap circumstance upon circumstance in support of their views, but no one could like him select, as it were intuitively, the circumstances which threw most light on the matter in hand, or put those circumstances forward with such a lucid power of application. Never were reasoning powers more completely at command—more flexible. Any intellectual operation applicable to the affairs of men seemed easy to him, and though no adept, so far as we know, in the abstract sciences, yet of all men at the bar, he could most readily evolve from an intricate mass of facts and theories some abstract proposition of law upon the validity of which he was ready to rest the case which he desired to make out. In no man's mind of our time, did the lucidus ordo so completely reign. A few words of advice from him were often deemed invaluable ; for what was all confusion and perplexity to others, he could so place that he not only saw through it himself, but made others see through it also. But alas ! to dwell upon these things only adds to our regret. He is gone to another and we trust a happier state of existence."

The New Slave Trade Convention.—The following are the articles of the Convention between Her Majesty and the King of the French for the suppression of the traffic in slaves.—Signed at London, May 20, 1845. Ratifications exchanged at London, June 7, 1845.

"Art. I. In order that the flags of Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of his Majesty the King of the French, may not, contrary to the laws of nations and the laws in force in the two countries, be usurped to cover the slave-trade, and in order to provide for the more effectual suppression of that traffic, his Majesty the King of the French engages, as soon as may be practicable, to station on the west coast of Africa, from Cape Verd to 16 degrees 30 minutes south latitude, a naval force of at least 26 cruisers, consisting of sailing and steam-vessels ; and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland engages, as soon as may be practicable, to station on the same part of the west coast of Africa a naval force of not less than 26 cruisers, consisting of sailing-vessels and steam-vessels ; and on the east coast of Africa such number of cruisers as her Majesty shall judge sufficient for the prevention of the trade on that coast ; which cruisers shall be employed for the purposes above-mentioned, in conformity with the following stipulations. —Art. II. The said British and French naval forces shall act in concert for the suppression of the slave-trade. It will be their duty to watch strictly every part of the west coast of Africa, within the limits described in Art. I., where the slave-trade is carried on. For this purpose they shall exercise fully and completely all the powers vested in the crowns of Great Britain and France for the suppression of the slave-trade, subject only to the modifications hereinafter mentioned as to British and French ships.—Art. III. The officers of her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of his Majesty the King of the French, having respectively the command of the squadrons of Great Britain and France to be employed in carrying out this convention, shall concert together as to the best means of watching strictly the parts of the African coast before described, by selecting and defining the stations, and committing the care thereof to English and French cruisers, jointly or separately, as may be deemed most expedient ; provided always that in case of a station being especially committed to the charge of cruisers of either nation, the cruisers of the other nation may at any time enter the same for the purpose of exercising the rights respectively belonging to them for the suppression of the slave-trade.—Art. IV. Treaties for the suppression of the slave-trade shall be negotiated with the native princes or chiefs on the above-mentioned part of the west coast of Africa, wherever it may seem necessary to the commanders of the English and French squadrons respectively. Such treaties shall be negotiated by the commanders themselves, or by officers specially instructed by them to that effect.—Art. V. The object of the aforesaid treaties shall be confined to the suppression of the slave-trade. If such treaty be concluded by a British officer, power shall be expressly reserved to His Majesty the King of the French to become a party to such treaty ; and if by a French officer, the like power shall be reserved to Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Whenever Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and His Majesty the King of the French shall both become parties to such a treaty, the expense which may have been incurred in effecting the same, whether for presents or other similar expenses, shall be borne equally by both nations. Art. VI. Whenever it shall be necessary to employ force, conformably to the law of nations, in order to compel the due execution of any treaty made in pursuance of the present convention, no such force shall be resorted to, either by land or sea, without the consent of the commanders both of the British and of the French squadrons. And if it should be deemed necessary for the attainment of the objects of this convention, that posts should be occupied on that part of the coast of Africa before described, this shall be done only with the consent of the two high contracting parties. Art. VII. As soon as the squadron to be sent by his Majesty the King of the French to the coast of Africa shall be ready to commence operations on the coast of Africa, his Majesty the King of the French shall cause notification thereof to be made to her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland ; and the two high contracting parties shall, by a joint declaration, make known that the measures to be adopted in virtue of this convention are about to be carried into execution ; and the aforesaid declaration shall be published wherever it may be deemed necessary. Within three months after the date of the said declaration the warrants that have been issued, in pursuance of the conventions of 1831 and 1833, to the cruisers of the two nations, for the mutual exercise of the right of search, shall be respectively delivered up. Art. VIII. Whereas experience has shown that the traffic in slaves in those parts of the world where it is habitually carried on is often accompanied by acts of piracy, dangerous to the tranquillity of the seas, and to the safety of all flags ; and, considering at the same time that if the flag carried by a vessel be primâ facie evidence of the national character of such vessel, this presumption cannot be considered as sufficient to forbid, in all cases, the proceeding to the verification thereof—since otherwise all flags might be exposed to abuse, by their serving to cover piracy, the slave-trade, or any other illegal traffic ; it is agreed, in order to prevent any difficulty in the execution of the present convention, that instructions, founded on the law of nations, and on the constant usage of maritime powers, shall be addressed to the commanding officers of the British and French squadrons and stations on the coast of Africa. The two Governments have accordingly communicated to each other their respective instructions, which are annexed to this convention.—Art. IX. Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and his Majesty the King of the French mutually engage to continue the prohibition for ever of all slave-trade in the colonies which they now possess or may hereafter possess, and also to prevent, as far as the laws of each country shall permit, their respective subjects from being engaged, directly or indirectly, in this traffic.—Art. X. Three months after the declaration mentioned in Article 7, the present convention shall come into execution. The duration of it is fixed at 10 years. The previous conventions shall be suspended. In the course of the fifth year the two high-contracting parties will concert together anew, and will decide according to circumstances, whether it is fitting either to put again in force the whole or part of the said conventions, or to modify or to abrogate the whole or part of the present convention. At the end of the tenth year, unless the previous conventions shall have been again put in force, they shall be considered as definitively abrogated. And the high contracting parties further engage to continue to concert together for insuring the suppression of the slave-trade by all the means which may appear to them most useful and most efficacious, until the time when this traffic shall be completely abolished.—Art. XI. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at London at the expiration of 10 days from this date, or sooner if possible. In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and affixed thereto the seals of their arms. Done in London, the 29th day of May, 1845.—(L.S.) STEPHEN LUSHINGTON ; (L.S.) ABERDEEN ; (L.S.) STE. AULAIRE ; (L.S.) V. BROGLIE."

FRANCE.—The Paris papers are almost destitute of news. The business of the session of the Chambers is virtually at an end, and the chief topic of interest this week is the statement that the late proceedings in the Deputies have so far reassured Ministers that the expected dissolution will not take place. The Chamber of Deputies voted the supplies for 1846 on Friday by a majority of 232 to 45. The Chamber afterwards proceeded to discuss the Bill relative to the execution of the convention for the repression of the slave-trade. M. Mauguin alone opposed the grant of the credit demanded for that object ; and M. Dupin having expressed some doubts as to the abolition of the right of search, M. Guizot entered into explanations which completely removed the scruples of the hon. member on the subject.

"It has been incessantly repeated," said M. Guizot, in concluding his speech, "since the beginning of this long quarrel, that England wished to establish the right of search, such as it existed in the treaties of 1831 and 1832, to use it against the trade of the world, but particularly against ours, on the coast of Africa, and to arrogate to herself the complete dominion of the seas. Nevertheless, it is that same right, which she sought and maintained, it was alleged, in that spirit, that England has now abandoned. It has been at least formally suspended, and can only be re-established by the common consent of the two Governments. This is written in the last article of the treaty ; and, if at the end of 10 years, the right of search should not be revived with our consent, it will be considered as definitively abrogated. England, I loudly proclaim, has proved by her conduct on this occasion that she had no other interest at heart—that the sole interest that exclusively preoccupied her in that special question was the repression of the slave-trade—that what she had seen, what she had sought, in the treaties of 1831 and 1832 was solely the efficacious repression of the slave-trade. When she discovered in the propositions submitted to her means equally efficacious for its repression, she immediately abandoned the right of search, and accepted the new means which were proposed to her. France, on her side, proved that if she prosecuted the abolition of the right of search, she still persisted in desiring the efficacious repression of the slave-trade. The two Governments have thus exhibited the noble [illegible] sincere union in a common great idea of universal [illegible] humanity. England and France afforded on that [illegible] proof that they were both animated with that [illegible] rious sentiment, and that they would labour in [illegible] tain that end, laying aside all the subaltern [illegible] which were always supposed to influence the [illegible] it was a grand and noble spectacle."

After M. Guizot had left the tribune, the grant was put to the vote and adopted, and the Chamber next passed the entire bill, by 243 against 1. The Journal des Débats regards this almost unanimous vote of the Chamber not merely as a triumph for the Ministry, but as an expression of patriotic feeling in which the entire Chamber joined without distinction of opinion.

"It was, in fact," adds the Débats, "the national [illegible] triumphed ; it was the feeling of the country [illegible] correctly or not, against the right of search [illegible] which legalised it, and it was this feeling which [illegible] by the new convention. But we fear that the [illegible] force us to regard this unanimity under quite [illegible] It is probable that, with its habitual good faith, it [illegible] to assume the entire honour of the treaty, and that it [illegible] vert into a humiliation for the Ministry a result which [illegible] due to the wisdom, to the prudence, and to the skill of the men appointed to conduct this difficult negotiation. Whatever may have been the reason, the Opposition had not one word to say on Friday. It had only a choice between praise or [illegible] and it naturally preferred silence. A few words from M. [illegible] who said he would vote for the grant, gave the Minister for Foreign Affairs an opportunity to demonstrate that France had recovered the independence of her flag completely, and enabled him to do justice in a few words of elevation and dignity to the declamations of which the treaties on the right of search had been so often the object."

Previous to this debate the budget of the Minister of Public Instruction was passed without any of those violent outbreaks between the champions of the Church and the University, to which it was expected to give rise. The usual grant to the College of France gave rise to a short but curious discussion. Colonel L'Espinasse took the opportunity of making a violent attack upon the system of instruction in the College of France generally, but more particularly on the lectures of Messrs. Michelet and Juinet. He said that these professors in their recent lectures were not satisfied merely with denying the divinity of our holy religion, but that they endeavoured to lead the young generation to entertain sceptical opinions on some of the most salient points in the history of France :—

"An attempt has recently been made," he said, "to deny the exploits of the most heroic woman of whom France has cause to be proud ; of that woman, who, under Charles VII., had the happiness and courage to drive the English from the territory of France. That woman had been publicly signalised in a lecture at the College of France as a mad woman. Till now, Joan of Arc had never been considered mad by any one. She had undertaken a truly national act, and her conduct deserved to be honoured by Frenchmen. She had done so in obedience to Divine inspiration, which, perhaps, we cannot understand, but which was holy and should be respected."

M. Chambolle was astonished that the Government did not deny these accusations ; but as they did not, he would undertake to do so, and he quoted the works of M. Michelet, to show that he had eulogised the Maid of Orleans. M. Arago also denied the charge, and said that the calumny had originated with the Legitimist papers, who had since contradicted it. M. L'Espinasse tried a second time to address the Chamber, but he was ultimately put down by the President. The Chamber voted on Monday a sum of 2,650,000f. for repairing the cathedral of Paris, by a majority of 231 to 4. The Chamber afterwards commenced the discussion on the Tours and Nantes and Paris and Strasburgh Railroad Bill, which was ultimately adopted by an immense majority. The duration of the lease of the former was fixed at 35 years, and that of the Strasburgh line at 45. The House also passed the Fecamp and Dieppe and the Aix and Avignon Railway Bills by large majorities. —Contrary to what the Madrid papers have, for some days past, affirmed, the passports applied for by Don Carlos have arrived at Bourges, and been conveyed by an aide-de-camp of Marshal Soult, who is to accompany the Spanish royal family to Grenoix. The official organ of the French Government at length contradicts the statement so conspicuously put forth in the Madrid Gazette of the arrest of Cabrera, near Narbonne. On the 24th June, Cabrera had already been for near three weeks at Moulins, whither he had proceeded with the permission of the Home Minister to visit a young brother who is studying at the college of that town. On the 23d, Cabrera had waited in person on the Prefect, and applied for permission to proceed to some other part of France. The Constitutionnel says, but without vouching for the correctness of its information, that for some days past the grand question of the Queen of Spain's marriage has reached another stage. France, according to report, consents to the Queen marrying a Prince of Coburg, brother of the King of Portugal and Duchess de Nemours, and, in return, England will not oppose a marriage between the Duc de Montpensier and the Queen's sister.—The Debats has advices from Algiers of the 22d ult., at which period Abd-el-Kader was still within the territory of France, watching an opportunity of attacking the tribes of the Tell. The Akhbar of Algiers, of the 19th, says the last accounts from Morocco are of a nature to permit a hope that all the difficulties between that country and France will have a prompt and happy solution.—A notice is to be seen at the mairie of the second arrondissement of Paris of the intended marriage of Mr. Stephen Lyne Stephens, of Cornwall, with Maddle. Duvernay, the celebrated dancer. Maddle. Duvernay made her first appearance as a danseuse at the Academie Royale in 1831. She broke her engagement with the manager of the Italian Opera House, in London, in 1836, and retired from the stage, when, according to the Constitutionnel, "she devoted her heart and life to the rich foreigner who is now about to marry her." The marriage ceremony is to take place in London, but it is published in Paris, of which place Maddle. Duvernay is a native.

SPAIN.—The Spanish Government have at length issued a reply to the abdication of Don Carlos, and the manifesto of his son. It is in the form of a circular letter, signed by Gen. Narvaez, and addressed to the Captains-General throughout the kingdom. The following is the document :—

"Most Excellent Sir,—By virtue of authority emanating from the Queen our Lady, I give, as President of the Council, directions to all administrations, in order that they may give positive instructions to watch the enemies of the public peace, and repress their attempts with the utmost severity, under whatever aspect they may present themselves as contrary to the legitimate rights of the Queen our Lady and the constitution of the realm. Her Majesty directs me to inform your Excellency that her royal mind is penetrated with the conviction that recent acts, and the reading of documents which have lately been made public, will not have the effect on her loyal subjects what their authors contemplated, and that the act of pretended abdication of Don Carlos, which betrays the most remarkable bad faith, and manifests a blind pertinacity in involving the country in new discords, troubling the repose and peace which we happily enjoy, ought alone to inspire contempt and by no means alarm the public. Believing it possible that they may awaken new hopes and give birth to fresh illusions among those who desire to renew the days of mourning and desolation which the country has undergone, it is her royal wish to remind your Excellency that the rebel Don Carlos, and all his family, are estranged from the kingdom, excluded, by the constitution of the realm and by special laws, from the succession to the throne, and deprived of the rights which appertain to them as Infantes of Spain. I am likewise to forewarn those who may take part in bringing about the realisation of these chimerical pretensions, under whatever guise they may attempt to shroud themselves, that they will be pursued to extermination if they venture to tread the soil of Spain, and, in case of their being taken, they shall be judged briefly and in the most summary manner, by a Council of War, as traitors and enemies of the Throne and the liberties of the nation ; and thus the law shall be inexorably enforced against those who may directly or indirectly endeavour to overthrow the fundamental institutions of the country and the order of succession to the Throne, through deceitful promises and lying pretensions, openly set at defiance both by the Queen, as supreme chief of the State, and by the whole nation. May God preserve your Excellency.—NARVAEZ.—Barcelona, June 18."

A meeting of the Deputies now in Madrid was held on the 20th ult , at the house of M. Pacheco, to consider the question of the Queen's marriage. The meeting was attended by 32 deputies, which is about one-half the number at present in the capital. Three editors of the principal papers were also present. No president was chosen, but eight or ten gentlemen addressed the meeting, and the general opinion given was, that though it was for Queen Isabella herself to take the initiative in the choice of a husband, they could not but express their opinion that the son of Don Carlos ought not in any case to be considered as among the candidates, because his name was considered the symbol of re-action, and his pretensions were contrary to the rights of the Queen, and to the interests of the country. All the speakers also spoke in unqualified disapprobation of the Count de Trapani as a candidate for Her Majesty's hand, and described his royal highness as more insignificant, and almost as unpopular as the son of Don Carlos. The meeting separated without coming to any formal resolution upon the question, although it was evident that the feeling was unanimous against the two candidates generally considered as having the best chance of success.—A great sensation has been created in mercantile circles by the announcement that the Bank of San Fernando had refused to discount every species of bills for the present. This resolution on the part of the Bank is supposed to have reference to the recent failures on the Madrid Bolsa, in consequence of over speculation.

GERMANY.—The Journal des Débats states, that "the internal divisions amongst the dissenting Catholics in Germany assume every day a more serious character. The two chiefs of the religious movement, M. Ronge and M. Czerski, have commenced an open war. Formal proposals have been made to M. Czerski, the reformer of Schneidemuhl, to declare schismatic all those who have declared for the Council of Leipsic, and in the first rank M. Ronge himself, as the representative of that council. M. Czerski is said to be inclined to adopt that suggestion, in order to be the only popular reformer. We may observe, by the way, that the Council of Leipsic is in direct opposition with the Court of Rome, whilst the reformer of Schneidemuhl does not wish to separate entirely. For this reason, Czerski's followers, in place of styling themselves simply German Catholics, have preferred to adopt the title of German Apostolical Catholics. A most dangerous rival to MM. Ronge and Czerski has arisen in the person of M. Pribil, chief of a new sect of Catholic German Protestants. The entire body of German Catholics who protested against the confession of faith published by the Catholics of Berlin, are comprised under the latter name. The Catholic Protestants are more allied to the dogmas of the ancient Catholic church than any of the other sects which divide the dissenting Catholics ; they have already replaced the crucifix on the altar, and the mitre on the head of their chief. Disgusted with the ingratitude of his followers, M. Ronge has determined to abandon the ecclesiastical state entirely, and to seek consolation in a marriage. It is said that he is about to marry the daughter of a wealthy merchant. It is worthy of remark that the three principal towns on the banks of the Rhine have remained indifferent to the religious movement which agitates Germany. Cologne, Mayence, and Coblentz have closed their doors to the reformers, and the columns of their journals to the quarrels of religion."

SWITZERLAND.—A Geneva journal states that the instructions given by the different cantons to the deputies for the approaching Diet are much more explicit on the question of the Jesuits than those for the last Diet. It is already known, says this journal, that ten states and two half-states will vote for their expulsion by any means necessary to attain that end. St. Gall will give no instructions on this point, but it is supposed that if Geneva should declare for the expulsion, there would be no doubt of a majority. The municipal elections at Lucerne have commenced, and have as yet, according to the New Zurich Gazette, been so much in favour of the Liberals as to have given great alarm to the Government, which has augmented its patrols and taken other measures to prevent a rising of the Liberals.

TURKEY AND SYRIA.—Letters from Constantinople of the 7th ult. state that the preceding 10 days had been marked by extraordinary festivities to celebrate the marriage of Mehemet Pacha with the youngest sister of the Sultan. The shores of the Bosphorus had been studded at night with illuminations, and fire-works exhibited every evening, displaying its minarets and palaces. An encampment was formed on the plain of Haidar-Pacha, in Asia, for the Ministers and functionaries of the Porte, and entertainments given there by the Sultan to the various public bodies, civil and religious, as well as to the diplomatic corps, and some of the foreign merchants and residents. Mr. Cartwright, who for 30 years has occupied the post of Consul-General in Turkey, and who retired from that office a few months since, purposes to leave shortly for England. There is but one opinion respecting this gentleman—namely, the highest respect for the able and consistent manner in which he has performed his official duties, and of personal esteem for the many genuine qualities which adorn his character. The British merchants, in token of these sentiments, invited Mr. Cartwright to a farewell dinner, at which they warmly expressed their feelings, and presented him with a beautiful piece of plate of the value of 250*l.* ; besides which they have had his portrait taken by an American artist of note, who lately visited Constantinople. He is succeeded by Mr. Cumberbatch, formerly vice-consul, who is expected from England by the next packet.—On the 30th May the celebrated ex-ruler of the Lebanon, Emir Beshir, who has been living the last three years in retirement at Constantinople, was suddenly seized by the cavashes of the Porte, and, without a word of warning or explanation, placed on board a caique, and transported to the Asiatic shore of the Bosphorus, where an armed escort was waiting to convey him into the interior of Asia Minor. The reason given for his being spirited away in this mysterious manner was the discovery of a secret correspondence which he had been holding with the chiefs of the Maronites, and by which it is said they were directly instigated to the commission of the late excesses, which, it was hoped, might have induced the Porte to sanction the restoration of the Shahab family, as the only means of establishing tranquillity. A letter from Beyrout of the 3d inst., after relating that amidst the general slaughter in the civil war between the Druses and the Maronites, the Druses, on May 9, attacked the abbey and murdered Father Charles, of the order of Capuchins, taking away the sacred vessels, and setting fire to the convent, which was burnt to the ground, states that this frightful deed excited the Consuls to make the most energetic remonstrances to the Pacha, who accepted the mediation of the Consuls, and the chiefs of the Druses and Christians were called to Beyrout. An armistice was there agreed to on the 2d June, by the chiefs, but it was broken by the Druses on the 12th, and several of the Christian churches and convents had since been pillaged, and the priests murdered. Civil war was again raging in all parts of the country, and food was so scarce that thousands of people were literally starving in the neighbourhood of Beyrout.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The overland mail from India has arrived this week, with advices from Bombay to 20th May, and from China to the 16th March. No news of much importance is brought by this conveyance, the state of affairs in India remaining nearly the same as at the departure of the preceding advices. The Victoria, which left Bombay on the 21st May, arrived at Suez on the 11th June, having sailed 11 days in advance, in consequence of the monsoon. We copy from the Bombay Times of the 6th May, the following summary of news :—The hot weather has now set in ; the monsoon is at hand, and our communication with Scinde is for the present cut off. The Bhoogties have set at their old trade again, plundering all around, just as if there had never been an expedition amongst their mountains, and Bejar Khan was still at their head. In attacking the Murrees they appear to have had the worst of it, having been defeated with considerable slaughter, and the booty they were bearing off retaken. A mysterious silence is maintained on the state of the revenue of Scinde, which is said to be as far as possible from being satisfactory. Extensive furloughs have been allowed the Bombay sepoys. The robber tribes destined for permanent expatriation had crossed the Indus at Sukkur about 24th April, for their new location in the Khyrpore territories. The troubles in the Punjaub continue unabated. It is now thought that Goolab Singh must have been of insane mind, or in that state of dementation which affects those predestined to fall, before he could have abandoned his mountain stronghold to place himself in the power of the mob of soldiers at Lahore. As yet there is neither semblance nor trace of even the embryo of a Government. The Ameer of Cabool is said openly to have abandoned all idea of invading Peshawur —moved chiefly thereto by the belief that we are about to occupy the Punjaub. Gwalior and the other places in which, little more than a twelvemonth since, such wild disorder reigned, are all tranquil. The kingdom of Oude is fast approaching that state of anarchy and confusion in which it will become imperative on our Government to interfere in its affairs. The troops have nearly all been withdrawn from the southern Mahratta country, and the troubles, for a time at least, ceased in Kolapore and Sawunt Warree. Colonel Wallace's court-martial has closed ; he has been convicted of disobedience of orders, and sentence of suspension for six months from rank and pay allowances passed against him. This the Commander-in-Chief considers too lenient, but does not think it necessary to send it back for revisal. The succession to the Nuwabship of Bhopal has been settled by the Governor-General ; the infant Princess, the Shah Jehan Begum, being recognised as the successor to her father. Sir H. Hardinge continues at Calcutta. The Company's dominions supply no intelligence whatever. Sir G. Arthur and lady proceed to Poona in the latter end of the present month, and will not return to the presidency before September or October.—Our news from China extends to the 20th March, but is of no importance.

UNITED STATES.—The mail steam-ship Cambria arrived in the Mersey on Friday afternoon, having made the entire run from Boston, including the usual detention at Halifax on the 3d inst., in the wonderfully short space of 10 days and 18 hours. This has never been equalled, being four hours less than the most rapid passage ever accomplished. The accounts are two days later than those by the Great Western, but are meagre and unimportant. In the interim no further advices from Mexico or Texas had been received, and consequently the anxiety which existed lest war should ensue from the annexation scheme remained undissipated. The language used by President Jones in his proclamation, that the Texan Convention assemble "for the purpose of considering the proposition for the annexation of Texas to the United States, and any other proposition which may be made concerning the nationality of the republic," had excited considerable interest ; the concluding sentence of the proclamation clearly pointing to the negotiations then pending in Mexico for the conditional acknowledgment of Texan independence. The papers still continued to charge England and France with "impudent interference" in this question.—There is no news concerning the Oregon negotiation, nor relative to the long-delayed appointment of a Minister to St. James's. The Cabinet appeared to be in a dilemma, and unable to meet with a fitting representative. To illustrate the "rush to the Oregon," the St. Louis New Era states, that several hundred persons were in that city anxiously importunate to accompany Lieut. Fremont's exploring expedition. The naval authorities had been commanded to afford every assistance in their power to the Erebus and Terror expedition from this country.—The Cincinnati Gazette states, that the May Ohio interest had been paid, and that that falling due in July will also be promptly met. The prospect as to Pennsylvania grows brighter and brighter, and the doctrine of repudiation is gradually being repudiated.—The Academy of Fine Arts at Philadelphia was destroyed by fire on the night of the 11th June, an event that is ascribed to the act of an incendiary. It ranked amongst the first institutions in the country. The entire contents of the antique gallery were destroyed, and the works of art which excited the admiration of the world are now a mass of ruins. Among these were an admirable copy of Titian's Venus, Canova's Graces, Hebe, Venus, bust of Brutus, and a colossal bust of Napoleon, also attributed to Canova, which was intended for the gates of Rheims. Gilbert Stuart's full length portrait of Washington was saved, with some little injury, the canvass being torn. When this work was rescued from the flames a shout was sent up which rent the air. West's Death on the Pale Horse, Haydon's Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, and Alston's Dead Man restored to Life, were preserved with but little injury. Titian's Mistress, a portrait of Columbus, Inman's portrait of a Lady, Flemish Flower Piece, Stuart's original portrait of Washington, St. Mark Writing, a St. Francis, by Guido, &c., were destroyed.

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—The Earl of ABERDEEN, in answer to a petition from Liverpool merchants, praying for a free navigation of the Rio de la Plata, stated that the Government was at this moment engaged with the French Government in endeavouring to restore peace in the Rio de la Plata, and he was sanguine in the hope that their endeavours would be successful, and that there would be a great extension of our commerce in that part of the world.—On the motion of the Duke of RICHMOND the adjourned debate on the Scotch Tolls Bill was resumed, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of Lord COTTENHAM, that the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Bill be received, the Bishops of SALISBURY and LONDON complained that a measure which so vitally affected the Church should have been left in the hands of a private member of their lordships' House. Government, at an early period of the session, had expressed their determination not to introduce such a Bill, and yet, when introduced by Lord Cottenham, they gave it their support. The Prelates complained of this conduct, and maintained that a measure of such a kind should not have been supported by Government at all unless under their responsibility as a Government, and after communication with the heads of the Church.—The Bishop of LONDON remarked, that the Whig Government would not have acted such a part towards the Church as the Conservative Government had done.—The report was received.—The Infeftment (Scotland) Bill was read a second time.

Monday.—The royal assent was given by commission to the almost unprecedented number of 80 Bills, among which were the following :—The Military Savings' Banks Bill, the Privy Council Administration of Justice Bill, the Maynooth College Better Government Bill, an Act to Regulate the Labour of Children and Women in Print Works; and the following Railway Bills:—The Chester and Holyhead, the York and North Midland (York and Scarborough Branch), Manchester, Bury, Blackburn, and Burnley; Leeds, Dewsbury, and Huddersfield; the Dunstable, Leeds and Bradford (Shipley to Colne), Huddersfield and Sheffield Junction, Berks and Hants, Yarmouth and Norwich and Norwich and Brandon Consolidation, Shrewsbury, Oswestry, and Chester; the Bedford, Blackburn, Darwen, and Bolton; Monkland and Kirkintilloch, Newcastle-upon-Tyne and Tynemouth, Ely and Huntingdon, Midland Extension to Nottingham and Lincoln, Great Grimsby and Sheffield Junction, Hull and Selby (Bridlington Branch), Kendal and Windermere, Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings (Keymer Branch); Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth; Manchester and Leeds (Burnley and Oldham), Lynn and Ely; Midland (Syston and Peterborough), Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge; Whitby and Pickering, and the York and North Midland (Bridlington Branch); the Leicester Inclosure Bill, the Nottingham Inclosure Bill, and the Spoad Inclosure Bill.—The LORD CHANCELLOR introduced a Bill for making further regulations for more effectually securing the correctness of the Jurors'-book in Ireland, which was read a first time.—The Charitable Trusts Bill was, on the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, read a third time.—The third reading of the Scotch Banking Bill was opposed by the Earl of RADNOR, but on a division it was carried by 47 to 15. The Irish Banking Bill was also read a third time, and passed.—The Marquis of NORMANBY expressed his deep regret that there was no hope of a general sanitary measure during the present session, but he hoped that next year the Government would adopt some means, by a central commission, or otherwise, to obviate the difficulties which at present obstructed the successful legislation.—Lord CAMPBELL drew the attention of Government to the mode by which certain railway companies were superseding or crushing all competition, by buying up or amalgamating with opposing lines—a course detrimental to the interests of the public.—The Earl of DALHOUSIE admitted that there might be attempts of this nature, but considered that the law was quite sufficient to reach all collusive proceedings in such cases.—Their lordships then agreed not to insist on the amendments made by them in the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill, to which amendments the other House objected.—The Irish Railway Bill, the Oaths Dispensation Bill, and the Real Property Conveyance Bills were read a second time.—The Bishops' Patronage (Ireland) Bill went through committee, a clause proposed by Lord CLANRICARDE putting lay patrons who are tenants for life in the same position with the bishops having been agreed to.

Tuesday.—On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, the Granting of Leases Bill was read a third time and passed. His lordship also laid on the table four resolutions for the regulation of future Railway Bills, and at the suggestion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, postponed the discussion on them to Friday, in order to see what resolutions the House of Commons would agree to, so as to insure uniformity in the introduction of these Bills in both Houses.—The Earl of ABERDEEN laid on the table the correspondence on the subject of the sugars of Porto Rico and Cuba; also papers respecting the trade of Canton, and other ports in China.—On the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, the Property in Museums Bill was read a third time and passed, with an amendment reducing the punishment for the second offence of wilfully damaging works of art to whipping instead of two years' imprisonment.—The Rural Property Conveyance Bill was read a second time, and the West India Relief Bill passed through committee.

Thursday.—On the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, the Games and Wagers Bill was read a second time.—Lord BROUGHAM announced that the committees of their Lordships' House, and of the House of Commons, had agreed to seven resolutions for the regulation of Railway Bills. In addition, he moved the two first resolutions of which he had given notice, which were agreed to and made standing orders.—The Banking (Ireland) Bill passed through committee without amendment.—Lord DENMAN moved the third reading of the Criminal Justices Bill. One object of the Bill, he said, was to give the Judges power to mitigate certain sentences in cases where the circumstances appeared to them to require it; and another was to remedy certain defects, which experience had shown to exist in the working of the Central Criminal Court Bill. There was a clause which he confessed was liable to some objection—that was to give the Judges the power of giving more severe punishment than the law at present allowed for cases of aggravated assault which were short of felony, though very little short of it.—Lord CAMPBELL objected to the clause, and the Lord CHANCELLOR suggested the propriety of inserting in the Bill the misdemeanours, such as common assaults, &c., which were not intended to be brought within the operation of the Bill. The Bill was read a second time. The Bishops' Patronage (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed, and the Real Property Amendment Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—A new writ was ordered for Dartmouth, in the room of Mr. SOMES, deceased.—On the motion of Mr. F. KELLY, the Small Debts Bill was read a first time.—Mr. HAWES'S motion for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the allegations of the petition of the South-Eastern Railway Company, presented on Thursday night, was carried, after being seconded by Captain BOLDERO, the gentleman principally implicated by the allegations.—On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE moved "that returns No. 72 and 248, made by the General Post-office, be referred to a select committee, with the view of inquiring into the accuracy of those returns; also into the present mode of remunerating by fees and perquisites certain officers of the General Post-office, and how far the duties of that establishment may be rendered more satisfactory to the public, and less unequal and oppressive to the persons engaged therein." He complained of the insufficient mode in which the letter-carriers of the Post-office were remunerated, and of the improper mode in which the insufficiency of their salaries were made up, by allowing them to receive fees for early delivery, to the great delay and inconvenience of the public. He also complained that Mr. Kelly, the inspector of letter-carriers, augmented his regular salary from 1200*l.* to 8000*l.* a-year, by the publication of the "Post-office Directory," which he got up at little or no cost to himself, by using the public servants of the Post-office as his private agents. He charged for that "Directory" 30*s.*, and hawked it through the town by means of the letter-carriers, who received 5*s.* for each copy they sold. Several booksellers had informed him that, if they had the same agency to assist them, they could sell that "Directory" at 15*s.* a copy, and make a fair profit by it at that price. He considered that these practices were most indecent and disgraceful to the Post-office, and that if they did not require inquiry, they required at any rate correction.—Capt. PECHELL seconded the motion.—After a few words from Mr. HUME, impressing on Government the necessity of inquiring into this department,—Mr. CARDWELL explained the advantages of "the early delivery," and denied that that practice had been productive of either fraud, or injury, or delay to the public. He showed that Mr. Duncombe was not justified in designating the manner in which Mr. Kelly got up the "Post-office Directory" as a gross job, by giving a history of that work from its first institution in 1799, by Mr. Sparkes, down to its purchase from Mr. Pritchard, Mr. Kelly's immediate predecessor in the Post-office, about ten years ago. He denied that Mr. Kelly, in obtaining the necessary information for the work, exercised any tyranny over the letter-carriers, or called upon them to perform any duties which the Post-office had not a right to demand from them.—Dr. BOWRING and Mr. WILLIAMS both insisted that Mr. Cardwell had not given a satisfactory answer to the statements of Mr. T. Duncombe; and Mr. F. BARING observed, that though he should not vote for the amendment, he thought that Government ought to look into the matters adverted to by Mr. Duncombe.—Sir C. LEMON and Mr. CURTEIS both supported Mr. Duncombe's amendment. On a division, however, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 106 to 30.—Mr. WYSE then moved an address to Her Majesty, praying her to be graciously pleased to give directions for the establishment and maintenance of a museum of national antiquities in conjunction with a commission for the conservation of national monuments. He supported his motion by giving the house an elaborate account of the efforts which had been made in France, Belgium, Bavaria, and other parts of Germany for the purpose of rescuing from oblivion the early records of their literary, religious, monumental and national history. Strangers in this country were surprised to find that we had made no national effort for the same object, and sometimes expressed their surprise in terms which ought to make Englishmen blush for their extraordinary neglect.—Mr. HAWES seconded the amendment, and Mr. BERNAL suggested the propriety of extending it not only to the conservation of historical relics, but also to that of all antiquities of a similar date.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER briefly explained the reasons why he could not consent to the proposed address, and said that though we had not in England any national museum for the reception of such works of art as Mr. Wyse wished to protect from oblivion, the galleries of our nobility and gentry—to which there was in general easy access—were more crowded with them than the galleries of any other country in the world.—After a few remarks from Mr. P. BORTHWICK, on the necessity of protecting the arts and their monuments in this country, the motion was negatived without a division, and the House resolved itself into the proposed committee.—In committee the Ordnance estimates underwent discussion. The miscellaneous estimates were then proposed by Mr. CARDWELL and granted. In the course of the discussion great complaints were made of the excessively imperfect ventilation of the committee-rooms. Sir R. FERGUSSON declared that the inconvenience was tremendous.—Mr. W. PATTEN stated that in the committee-room in which he had the misfortune to sit, he had often felt, from the alternations of hot and cold air let in upon him, that whilst the upper part of his person was immersed in an atmosphere heated to more than fever heat, his legs were immersed in pails of ice. Every speaker lamented, but not one defended, Dr. Reid's system of ventilating the committee-rooms.—In the course of the discussion Sir R. PEEL admitted that the picture lately purchased for the National Gallery for 600*l.* as a genuine Holbein, was more than doubtful, and that the trustees were in communication with the party from whom it was bought, with the view of returning it.—Dr. BOWRING wished to ask if the attention of Government had been called to the external appearance of the National Gallery. He wished also to know whether there was any hope that the exterior of the gallery would be improved. If government proposed to build a great national gallery worthy of this country, he was sure that there would be the greatest disposition on all sides cordially to concur in, and to make a liberal provision for, that purpose.—Mr. WARBURTON thought they should discuss the matter on broad grounds, and not to confine themselves to the discussion of the merits of particular pictures. He hoped that the right hon. baronet, as the best mode of securing a great collection of pictures would be prepared, next year, to recommend the building of a great gallery, worthy to receive the national collection.—Sir R. PEEL was quite willing to admit, as regarded the National Gallery that he thought they had thrown away the most magnificent site in Europe. No person was aware, until he had stood upon the steps of the National Gallery, how really magnificent was the site which it occupied. He feared, however, that they would do but little good, in laying out money now to ornament its exterior. Some improvements might be effected. They might take away or improve the turrets at either end, if they were turrets; but when they had done that, they would have effected but little in improving the collection within. The mode in which the pictures were lighted was a matter of the greatest importance in erecting or improving a National Gallery, and was a matter also which was frequently but little attended to.—Mr. HAWES begged to put in one single word in favour of the modern school of painting—that of their own countrymen—which, were a judicious selection made from it, would present a collection which might well compare with any school that ever existed.—Lord MAHON advised that a collection should be made of the portraits of men eminent in the history of this country, to be arranged in chronological order, as was now the case in the gallery at Versailles.—After a few words from Mr. REDINGTON, Mr. EWART, and Mr. WILLIAMS, the vote was agreed to.—On the motion that 6,500*l.* be granted to defray the expenses attending the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew,—Lord LINCOLN, in answer to a question from Mr. WILLIAMS, said, that the Botanic Gardens were now open to the public every day, from an early hour.—Sir J. GRAHAM postponed the committees on the Physic and Surgery, and Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons Bills to Monday se'nnight, and said that he would state then his intention as to those Bills.—The report on the Smoke Prohibition Bill was, after a short conversation, postponed to Wednesday.—The Seal-Office Abolition Bill passed through committee, and the Dog Stealing Bill was reported.

Monday.—A new writ was ordered to issue for the borough of Abingdon in the room of Sir F. Thesiger, who has accepted the office of Attorney-General,—In reply to Sir E. HAYES, Sir J. GRAHAM stated that Government felt the deepest anxiety respecting the outrages and crimes that unfortunately prevailed in the counties of Cavan, Fermanagh, and the circumjacent counties, and that every possible means had been taken to repress them. The military and police forces have been recently increased in those counties, and he did not despair of seeing the peace of those districts preserved without recourse to any additional or extraordinary powers. He added, that neither politics nor religion had anything to do with this deplorable state of things.—On going into committee on the Colleges (Ireland) Bill, Mr. J. O'CONNELL presented petitions signed by 300,000 persons against the measure, and Mr. SMITH O'BRIEN observed, that if he entertained any hope of being able to amend this Bill, he would propose a series of amendments for that object; but as he had no hopes of succeeding in any attempt to modify the Bill, he would state his objections to it in detail. It made no provision for the religious instruction of any class, either Roman Catholic or Protestant. It had, therefore, been declared by the Roman Catholic hierarchy to be dangerous to faith and morals. It was also calculated to produce a large field for the exercise of corrupt influence for party purposes, and was, therefore, particularly objectionable to the friends of free institutions in Ireland.—Sir J. GRAHAM said that he should consider it a waste of time to enter into a defence of the general outlines of the Bill, after the ample discussion which had taken place upon them on several former occasions. The diffusion of general intelligence was the best guardian against the exercise of any corrupt influence on the public mind in Ireland.—Mr. O'CONNELL informed the House on the authority of a letter from Archbishop M'Hale, that the alteration which the Government had agreed to make in this Bill had made no alteration in the sentiments of the Roman Catholic prelates respecting it. Their objections to it still remained in full force, and Archbishop M'Hale even went the length of denouncing it as penal and revolting. His (Mr. O'Connell's) objection to this Bill still was that it was an irreligious Bill. First you left religion out of it altogether, and now you only consented to tolerate it.—Lord J. RUSSELL considered the declaration just made to the House by Mr. O'Connell very important. He feared that, unless this Bill were made acceptable to the Roman Catholic prelates, it would not be of much use to Ireland. If the Bill, after it came out of committee, should still remain under their stigma, it would be better not to send it to that country: for in such a case it would rather be prejudicial than beneficial in its consequences. Unless Government consented to further alterations, it would be a question open to serious consideration whether it ought to be supported on its third reading.—The SPEAKER then left the chair, and the House resolved itself into committee, the notice-paper being crowded with amendments to be proposed by different members. The first was one by Lord J. RUSSELL, who, by various verbal amendments, sought to make changes in the Bill, the practical effect of which would be to introduce provision for religious instruction on the part of the State, by causing the halls to be erected by Government, with chaplains, &c., instead of leaving their erection and endowment to voluntary effort.—This raised a debate on the general question of religious or non-religious instruction, in which Mr. C. BULLER, Sir R. H. INGLIS, Sir R. PEEL, Mr. BERNAL, Sir J. GRAHAM, Mr. SHEIL, and other members, took part. On a divison, the amendment was rejected, the numbers being—for the amendment 42, against it 117; majority against it, 75. The first clause was then agreed to. Some slight amendments were made in the intermediate clauses, but nothing of any importance occurred until the committee arrived at the 10th clause, which makes Her Majesty the visitor of the new colleges, and gives her the power of appointing the professors until the end of the year 1848, and afterwards leaves the appointment to be provided for by Parliament, or vests it in Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in default of any provision to the contrary.—Mr. WYSE objected to the latter part of this clause, and moved that on any future vacancy occurring in the professorships, such vacancy should be filled up by such candidates as, after due public examination before competent examiners, should be declared by them (being otherwise qualified by character and conduct) to be the most competent to discharge the duties of such professorships.—After a discussion, in which Mr. O'CONNELL, Mr. SHEIL, Lord J. RUSSELL, Mr. SHAW, Lord J. MANNERS, and other members, took part, the committee divided and negatived the amendment by 141 to 47.—Mr. O'CONNELL divided the committee on the 10th clause, by moving that it be struck out of the Bill, when there were—For the clause 129; against it 24; majority 105. The clause, as likewise the 11th, 12th, and 13th, were then agreed to, and progress was reported.—The Foreign Lotteries' Bill was read a second time, and the Statute Labour (Scotland) and the Dog Stealing Bills were read a third time and passed.

Tuesday.—A new writ was ordered for Exeter in the room of the late Sir W. Follett. A great many Railway Bills were forwarded.—Capt. BERKELEY moved that the resolution "That no private Bill for the construction of railways, or other public works, to which the consent of the Admiralty is required, will be committed until the decision of the Admiralty shall be communicated to the House," be made a standing order.—Lord G. SOMERSET opposed the motion, which was rejected, on a division, by 70 against 22.—Mr. GREENE and Lord G. SOMERSET postponed the resolutions of which they had given notice, touching the future regulation of Railway Bills; and the committee on railways was revived, with the object of agreeing to resolutions in conjunction with the House of Lords, to carry out the common intention of both Houses.—On the motion of Lord J. RUSSELL, the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill was read a first time.—Capt. LAYARD brought the present system of enlistment in the army under consideration, and moved for an address to the Queen, praying Her Majesty to direct an inquiry to be made how far the reduction of the period of service in the army, from the present unlimited term to ten years, would tend to procure a better class of recruits, diminish desertion, and thus add to the efficiency of the service.—Mr. S. HERBERT opposed the motion. He would not assert that the system now in practice in the management of the British soldier was perfect, but he would say that it did not seem very easy to improve it. Both under the direction of Lord Howick and Mr. Macaulay great care had been taken of the moral culture of the army: regimental schools had been established—care had been taken to suit the food, the hours, and the clothing, to the climate in which the regiment was stationed—the system of reliefs had been improved—libraries for the men had been collected, and fives-courts and similar recreations provided for them. These were amongst the improvements recently made, and to them he might add the plan of giving rewards for good conduct, and of military savings banks.—After remarks from Mr. HOME, Sir H. DOUGLAS, and Mr. WILLIAMS, the motion was negatived without a division.—Mr MONCKTON MILNES then called the attention of the House to the evils attendant on the present mode of conducting the public execution of criminals, his object being to obtain leave to bring in a Bill authorising the Judges, when they thought fit, to sanction executions within the walls of prisons. He supported his motion by reference to the example of several of the United States of America, and the progress of opinion in all civilised countries.—While he was speaking, the House was "counted out."

Wednesday.—Lord ASHLEY moved that the dropped order of Tuesday be read for bringing up the report of the whole House on the resolution relative to a grant for lunatic asylums and pauper lunatics.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE objected to the irregularity of the proceeding, and declared his intention of resisting it on account of the great importance of the ill-considered measure to which it referred.—A conversation of some length took place upon this proposition, in the course of which Mr. F. BARING and several other members requested Mr. T. Duncombe to withdraw his opposition.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, however, declared his intention to persevere in it; for his object was to throw over the Lunatic Asylums Bill till next session. He should therefore not only divide on this, but on every other step of it.—A division then took place, in which 15 voted for Mr. T. Duncombe's motion, and 117 against it.—The report was then brought up and agreed to.—The house then went into committee on the Field Gardens Bill, on the motion of Mr. COWPER.—On the first clause being read, Mr. CURTEIS objected to it. It empowered any three rated inhabitants to call a meeting for the purpose of bringing the proposed system into operation in their parish. They might be troublesome persons, of no weight in the parish. He moved that the word "six" be substituted for "three."—Mr. ROEBUCK wished to know whether the bill had now the Government sanction; Sir J. Graham objected to it on a former occasion, because some of its provisions were such as would really supersede the existing Poor Law altogether.—Sir J. GRAHAM said, that those clauses had been withdrawn. In the bill as it now stood the 19th clause substituted the highway-rate for the poor-rate; to that his objections were quite as decided and insuperable, but that clause would be withdrawn with Mr. Cowper's assent. He still doubted whether all the good anticipated from the measure would really be derived from it, but the bill in its amended form would have his support.—Mr. GIBSON suspected the right hon. baronet of a species of cruelty towards Mr. Cowper; the bill was going to be allowed to linger on, and then be extinguished at the close of the session. It was a species of romance too; this was not sound practical legislation.—Mr. COWPER said, the cruelty exercised towards him came from his own side of the house; the right honourable baronet had treated him with the utmost courtesy and propriety in the matter. The 19th clause could very easily be omitted: it was only to meet possible cases, which probably might never arise. The Bill might seem romance to the hon. gentleman, surrounded with all the comforts of life; but it did not seem so to the poor men who had petitioned in its favour. The system of allotments was only objected to by those who were not practically acquainted with it; its tendency, was, and must be, not to lower, but to raise wages. It contemplated the devotion of part of the time of the men to other purposes than labouring for their employer. It was urged, that the labourers had no time to spare for the object now contemplated; but there were seasons of the year when they could not be fully employed; and here would always be occupation for the fringes of their time. When a man was supported merely by money wages, he was greatly at the mercy of his employer and likely to consent to take lower wages, than if he was able to maintain himself for a time by a little property of his own—it tended to make him independent.—Mr. ROEBUCK felt the impropriety of the measure so strongly, that he would at once move that the chairman report progress. It was the peculiarity of this country, as distinguished from some others, Ireland for instance, that the working population were maintained wholly by wages; and the poor man never served so bad a master as when he served himself; he had not capital to maintain himself, or wages to pay himself. Was he now, by a roundabout process, to be deprived of this peculiar privilege? Was he to get sufficient wages to maintain him or not? He was not; but he was to have "the fringes" of his time to himself to eke out his wages. He objected to the poor man having something to fall back upon; it meant that he was to have some other means of support than his wages, some miserable pittance of a garden, useful enough for moral purposes, but mischievous the moment it was to be made the means of subsistence. It was a degradation to the working man, and it would not be for his good. In the case of Mrs. Gilbert's allotments people were lured to take them, and every one of them (he believed) ended by going into the poor-house. A labourer who had got 5*l.* spent it on his allotment, and found himself unable to pay his rent; then would come the eviction clause, and he would be a pauper. He had had at least 20 such cases sent to him.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD felt it his duty to support this Bill. It was a movement in the right direction — in the direction of giving the labourer some independence, and not leaving him entirely dependent on wages. He wanted to see every man his own master, and possessed of such a portion of ground as to render him so; he ought not to be a slave to any employer. The labourer ought not, in his opinion, to be entirely dependant upon his wages. The objection he had to the Bill was, that it did not go far enough. Instead of half an acre, the allotments ought to be at least one acre in extent, and then a labourer might depend upon its produce as a means of subsistence for his family. He hoped the Bill would prove to be the commencement of a better system, and in that expectation he gave it his hearty support.—Mr. MANGLES expressed his perfect readiness to meet the case on which Mr. Roebuck rested his argument. He did not know on what ground the hon. and learned member should lay down as a principle that the labouring man should live by his wages, when it was well known to all who were conversant with the subject that, in the agricultural districts, the labourers were unable to get wages. He was not for the present stating whether the facts which he mentioned supported the views either of Mr. Cowper or of Mr. Roebuck, but he stated what he knew of his own knowledge to be the case. It was only last Sunday fortnight that he met one of the best labouring men of his own parish, who told him that he had been unable to get a single day's work in the preceding week. Mr. Roebuck could look out of his window in some of the fashionable squares, and tell the poor that they should live on their wages, but would he tell them, at the same time, how they were to get them. Mr. Roebuck only showed how little he knew of the state of the agricultural districts when he put forward such arguments. He (Mr. Mangles) would undertake to show, in opposition to the statement of Mr. Roebuck, that one of the greatest evils of the present condition of the agricultural labourers was the utter hopelessness, as a general rule, of their raising themselves in their position. He was convinced that there might be 50 shopkeepers' apprentices or 50 tradesmen or individuals in the other classes who would be found to have raised themselves to a superior condition, for every one similar case among the agricultural classes. He would undertake to show five men who had raised themselves above their position, and who were now small farmers in comfortable circumstances, by means of the allotment system, for every one agricultural labourer that Mr. Roebuck could produce who had so raised himself by mere wages alone. In fact, he never met a single instance of the latter kind in the whole course of his experience, and he did not believe that there was one in existence. He would go farther, and say that he never knew an instance of a landholder who had tried the allotment system, and had let the allotment gardens at a fair and reasonable rent, who did not speak well of the system, and find it to succeed. He might allude to the allotments made by Mr. Henry Drummond, in Surrey, as a proof of this fact. One poor man under that gentleman, to whom he had been speaking on the subject, had so far progressed in the world under it as to have now in his possession a farm of 10 acres of land. And he did not believe there would be found any intelligent agricultural labourer who would not be found to speak favourably of the allotment system.—Mr. ESCOTT said all the advantages of the allotment system on which Mr. Mangles had spoken were those which existed without the interference of the present Bill, and which he believed the Bill would tend to destroy. He objected to allotments being made a parish system, and part of the parish payment to the poor. The moment they established a parochial board to distribute these allotments it would become a mere parish proceeding, and nothing else. His object in rising was to state that he thought the proper course to take would be to endeavour to improve the Bill as much as possible in committee, and then to divide upon the third reading. He would, therefore, advise Mr. Roebuck to withdraw his amendment.—Sir J. GRAHAM said he quite agreed that they ought to proceed in committee upon the Bill. It was a matter of serious importance, and one for the fullest deliberation, whether the measure now offered for their adoption was conducive to the improvement of the agricultural labourers or not. With several of the leading maxims laid down by Mr. Roebuck he entirely concurred. He thought that the labouring population of this country, whether engaged in rural or manufacturing employment, must depend for support mainly on the fruits of their labour and industry derived from the capital of others, and he could not agree with Mr. S. Crawford that labourers would make a happy exchange if they were to become no longer dependant on wages, but on the profits of rural holdings of land. He thought that the great misfortune of Ireland was, that there was no sufficient demand for labour there, and that the great body of the agricultural population were obliged to depend for their existence on small holdings of land, for the possession of which they were, therefore, obliged to make the greatest exertions. He also agreed that experience was the test of theory; but these, after all, were not the points to be decided by the House, but whether gardens at some distance from the residences of the labourers, and given to them at a small rent, would not, under a proper system of management, be conducive to their improvement and welfare; whether such occupation, if tried upon a large scale, was likely to prove beneficial or otherwise; and whether it would have the effect of reducing the rate of wages. He was convinced that, if it were found practically to have the effect of reducing wages, the measure would be one of the most pernicious pieces of legislation that could be adopted; but he did not think it would have that result. Neither did he think, with Mr. Cowper, that the possessor of one of these holdings would be enabled to hold out against his employer for higher wages. He was satisfied that the notion of the measure having such a tendency would be a most fatal delusion to go forth among the people. Wages would not be raised by any such means; but, on the contrary, in any struggle between the labourer and his employer for higher wages, the man of capital would invariably be found to be the stronger party. But he was bound also to observe that he heard with sorrow the fact stated by Mr. Mangles, and which he had no reason to doubt, of an industrious agricultural labourer being left for an entire week at a time without any employment whatever. With respect to the Bill itself he entertained great doubts whether all the benevolent hopes of the honourable gentleman by whom it had been introduced would be realised; but still he thought that the system—all aid from the rates being withdrawn—might be advantageously brought into operation.—Mr. TRELAWNEY should support the motion of the hon. and learned member for Bath, as it was an unnecessary interference with labour. The hon. member for Hertford said that the effect of this measure would be to raise wages. Now, he was satisfied that it would have the effect of lowering them.—Mr. J. S. WORTLEY said that there was no subject with respect to which the testimony was so conclusive as the success of the scheme. Wherever the plan had been adopted, it had been successful, not merely as regarded the physical, but also the moral condition of the labourers. Mr. BRIGHT felt bound to give his vote to the amendment of the hon. member for Bath, as he was satisfied that its effect would be to increase the dependance of the labourers, and therefore add to the mass of pauperism in the country districts. Attaching small gardens to the cottages of agricultural labourers was desirable, but the present measure was intended to afford aid to persons in a state of distress. He had no objection to giving relief, but let it be given under that name.—Mr. DARBY denied the correctness of the statement of the hon. and learned member for Bath, that most of those persons to whom a few years ago allotments were made ultimately took refuge in the poor-house. He had the authority of the late Mrs. Gilbert, who had carried out this system so extensively, to state that the plan had been entirely successful, and that hardly a case ever occurred in which a person having an allotment was taken before a magistrate on any ground of complaint. He was convinced from his own observation that the plan had been productive of much good, and had bettered the condition of the labouring classes. He, however, preferred having a voluntary system of allotments, and he certainly should resist any attempt to introduce a compulsory system into his own parish.—Lord CLEMENTS objected to the Bill. He considered that the adoption of the system of conacre in Ireland had been productive of a great portion of the distress which unhappily prevailed in that country.—Mr. STANSFIELD thought that the whole success of the scheme depended upon its being voluntary. He approved of the principle of allotting garden-fields, but it was most objectionable to adopt a system of enforced charity. —Mr. HENLEY thought that the Bill held out expectations to the labouring classes which it was certain never could be realised. He should support the amendment.—Mr. COWPER denied that the effects of the measure were such as had been described by the hon. and learned Member for Bath; on the contrary, all experience showed that the result of the system, whenever it was adopted, was to ameliorate the condition of the labouring classes, and its tendency, so far from lowering wages, was to increase them. Complaints had been made that there was a compulsory interference with the landowners; now it was notorious that in many parts of the country the labourers were most anxious to obtain allotments of land, but they could not get them from the landowners, therefore the voluntary system in such districts would be perfectly inoperative. It should be recollected that this was not to be a gift on the part of the landlord, but the full value was to be paid for the land.—After a few words from Mr. BOUVERIE, Mr. TRELAWNEY wished to ask the Secretary for the Home Department, whether he had communicated with the Poor-law Commissioners on the subject of this Bill?—Sir J. GRAHAM replied, that he certainly had communicated with the Poor-law Commissioners on the subject matter of this and other Bills, but it did not follow that he was bound by their opinion.—Mr. NEWDEGATE rather concurred with the honourable member for Rochdale, who wished to give the labourer some degree of independence, than with those who desired to keep him in a condition of entire subservience.—After a further short conversation the committee divided. The numbers were—For the amendment, 19; against it, 42; majority, 23.—Mr. CURTEIS then moved that the number of persons on whose requisition a parish meeting may be convened for the purposes of the Bill should be six instead of three, as proposed in the Bill.—After a short conversation the gallery was cleared for a division, but none took place, the word "six" being inserted, as was understood.—Mr. HENLEY moved that the qualification of the wardens should be their being rated to the poor 10*l.*—Mr. COWPER objected to the amendment, which was negatived by 26 to 17.—Mr. COLLETT moved, as an amendment, that in line 17 the words "any churchwarden" should be substituted for the words "officiating minister." After a short discussion,—Mr. COWPER said that if the feeling of the House were in favour of the amendment, he would not oppose it. The amendment was agreed to.—Mr. DARBY moved that the words "landed proprietors, occupiers of land, and inhabitant householders" be omitted, in order to substitute the words "vestry," as he thought the vestry would be the fittest body to undertake the duties which were by the Bill assigned to the meeting so described.—Mr. COWPER acceded to the motion, and the amendment was agreed to. The clause as amended was agreed to.—Upon clause 2 being put,—Mr. BRIGHT moved that the words "other places of worship" be inserted after "churches or chapels," with a view to include dissenting chapels amongst those places upon which notices should be posted under the provisions of the Bill. The amendment was negatived without a division. The clause, with verbal amendments, was agreed to. Clauses 3 and 4 were agreed to. On the 5th clause, which constitutes trustees for the administration of the field gardens, —Mr. COLLETT objected to the officiating minister being appointed in that capacity, and moved that the words "officiating minister" be omitted.—Mr. COWPER resisted the omission, and the committee divided, when the original clause was retained by 37 to 7, and ordered to stand part of the Bill. Clauses 6 to 12 were then agreed to, and 13 struck out. On clause 14 being read,—Mr. M. GIBSON hoped that the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government would assist the committee with his advice upon this Bill. The Home Secretary had lent every assistance in his power. The Bill before them he had every reason to believe was opposed by the Poor-law Commissioners. They would do but little good to the poor by the allotment system. Sir R. Peel was not present at the early part of the night's proceedings, and the legislation of the committee had partaken of a romantic and sentimental character, and his advice would be very seasonable. He did not think the right hon. baronet would consent to the introduction into this country of a system which would reduce the labouring people of this country to a condition similar to that of a large portion of the Irish population. Let the right hon. baronet give his advice now, and not by his silence, perhaps, hold out expectations to Mr. Cowper, which expectations might never be realised.—Sir R. PEEL thought that it would be premature for him to discuss, now that the Bill was in committee, whether or not it was desirable that it should finally pass into a law. He had consented to the Bill going into committee, under the impression that the views of Mr. Cowper were pure and benevolent in undertaking to bring in a Bill which he thought would conduce to the welfare and comfort of the labouring classes; and these views entitled the Bill to a favourable consideration, in order to ascertain whether it could not be brought into a shape which would make it consonant with the public interests. He was not prepared to apply to the rural population of this country those principles of political economy which many hon. gentlemen were disposed to do. He thought that giving the labouring classes small allotments of land might conduce to their welfare and comfort. If they found that the possession of a small quantity of land conduced to the immediate happiness and welfare of these classes, he was very much disposed to look to the immediate practical benefits which would accrue, rather than to the remote tendencies which political economy was disposed to attribute to such a system. He thought that such was the principle on which most landed proprietors practically acted on this question; and if they found that the labourer, by cultivating his small piece of ground, could have the enjoyment of a few flowers, and supply his family with some of the necessaries of life, what the tendency of that might be a hundred years hence he did not know; but they would find that, during their lives at least, they would promote the happiness of the labouring poor, wean them from degraded habits and from vice, and very much, in other respects, add to their welfare. Should the Bill pass through committee, he should be sorry afterwards to find that considerations of public interest should arise to prevent its passing, and he hoped that hon. gentlemen would not now throw any impediment in the way of perfecting the measure as much as possible.—Mr. BRIGHT said that the voluntary system of arrangement would do all the good which was expected to accrue from the allotment system, without doing any of the evils which he thought that system would introduce. He did not see how the hon. member for Hertford could persevere with this Bill, and try to carry it through a third reading. It could not by any possibility be put into action, and if it passed the House it would to all intents and purposes fall as dead as if it had been thrown out upon the third reading.—Mr. COWPER said that in parishes where it was wanted the Bill would be put in force. Where it was not wanted it would not be enforced.—Mr. WAKLEY thanked Sir J. Graham for the manner in which he had assisted in this matter. Mr. M. Gibson made an appeal to the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government, and he had got his answer, and he hoped he was satisfied. He hoped also that the hon. gentleman would now give his support to the measure. He was surprised at the part taken by the hon. member for Durham on this question. He had always understood the object of the hon. gentleman and his friends was to give increased food to the people, and yet he now came forward, and in reference to this Bill, which would have the effect of increasing the food of the labouring classes, advocated the voluntary system. If the principle of the Bill could be extended, and more than half an acre of ground allotted, he believed it would tend greatly to improve the condition of the agricultural labourer. If the Bill had been in any way damaged in its efficiency during its progress through committee, he hoped the Government would stand forward at a later stage, and assist in restoring it to the shape in which it had been originally brought in by the hon. member.—Sir R. PEEL hoped the hon. member would excuse him if he, on the 2d of July, and at half-past 10 o'clock at night, declined to enter into a discussion on the general question of the Corn-laws.—Clause 15 was struck out; 16 was agreed to; 17 was struck out; 18 was agreed to; 19 and 20 were omitted; 21, 22, and 23 were agreed to, as were the schedules.—Mr. BRIGHT said he had given notice of a clause, with the view of giving to the holders of these allotments a remedy against losses sustained by game kept on the land. He knew of many cases in which the crops had been almost completely destroyed by hares and rabbits, but as he had been advised that such a clause would interfere in some degree with the revenue laws and the taxes of the country, and as he thought so important a question as the Game-laws should not be discussed incidentally, he did not intend to bring it forward.—The House then resumed, and the report was ordered to be received on Thursday.—On the motion of Lord ASHLEY, the House went into committee on the Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics Bill, and the clauses up to 45 were agreed to.—The Scientific and Literary Societies Bill was committed, and the four first clauses agreed to; after which progress was reported.—Mr. C. BULLER moved for the appointment of a select committee to consider the expediency of erecting a building in the neighbourhood of the inns of court, for the sittings of the courts of law and equity, in lieu of the present courts adjoining to Westminster Hall, with a view to the more speedy, convenient, and effectual administration of justice.—The motion was agreed to.

Thursday.—Mr. DIVETT brought under consideration the petition of Mr. Jasper Parrott, formerly a Member of the House, and at present one of the magistrates for Devonshire. The petitioner prayed for the protection of the House in a matter affecting its privileges. He had been summoned to give evidence before a select committee on the Poor-law Medical Relief Bill; and having stated certain matters deemed by a Mr. Phillips, of Totness, to affect his character, an action had been brought against him.—After some remarks from Mr. WYNN, Sir R. PEEL, Sir G. GREY, and Mr. WARBURTON, a solicitor of the name of Moore, the London agent of Mr. Parrott's attorney in the cause, was called to the bar and examined. He certified to the authenticity of a copy of the declaration in the action, and gave the names of the plaintiff, attorneys, and London agents. It was ultimately ordered that all these parties should attend at the bar of the House on Monday next.—The LORD ADVOCATE then moved the consideration in committee of the Bill amending the Poor-law of Scotland.—Mr. OSWALD considering that the Bill would be injurious rather than beneficial to Scotland, moved that the Bill be committed that day three months.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD drew attention to the condition of the population, and relief given to the poor, especially in Sutherland.—Mr. LOCH replied, adducing documentary evidence in proof of the great improvement which has been effected in the condition, habits, and character of the population of Sutherland. If the Duke of Sutherland did not give more than 6*l.* to the plate of each parish with which he was connected, his Grace gave much more in the shape of private charity and in providing houses rent-free for his poorer tenantry. No man could be more kind than his Grace was to his people: no man bestowed more upon them whenever a case of distress was brought before him. The Duke of Sutherland had built on his estates in that county 12 schools, at an expense of 200*l.* each, and had given 200*l.* a-year in addition to the salaries given by the Kirk Session for the support of the masters. He thought that an ample foundation was thus laid for the moral and religious education of the poor.—Mr. SHEIL and Mr. REDINGTON both deprecated that particular provision of the Bill which prevented Irish or English immigrants from obtaining a settlement in Scotland, contending that industrial residence ought to confer a settlement in any part of the United Kingdom.—Mr. ELLICE would not go the length of rejecting the Bill altogether, though he wished the Government would postpone it.—Mr. F. MAULE and Mr. P. MAXWELL STEWART opposed the Bill, expressed objections to some of its leading enactments, and recommended a postponement.—After some remarks from Colonel RAWDON and Mr. BELLEW, Mr. ESCOTT alluded to the defence by Mr. Loch of the treatment of the people of Sutherland, which he considered was a mere evasion of the charges which had been made. Mr. Loch had entered into a long history of the meritorious charities of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and seemed to consider that as an answer to the statement that the people of Sutherlandshire had been cleared from their dwellings, and had been allocated afterwards in districts where they could not gain a living by the exercise of their industry.—Mr. D. DUNDAS censured Mr. B. Escott for having introduced the name of the Duchess of Sutherland into this debate, and contended that the defence which Mr. Loch had made of the conduct of the Duke of Sutherland had been at once most complete, most appropriate, and most satisfactory to every just and generous man in the House. The Duke's kindness of disposition was as much nobility to him as the high title which he bore. Reports had come in from the north of Scotland relating to the condition of the poor there. He thanked Mr. S. Crawford for having brought the statements in those reports under the notice of the public, because he was convinced that the more the difficulties of the poor in Scotland were known, the sooner would they be redressed. Still he thought that the people of England, from being unacquainted with the usual mode of living in Scotland, were forming a very erroneous opinion respecting them from the statements which had been published. He had perused the evidence collected by the commissioners, and found that the relief afforded to the poor was by no means sufficient. He would do his best to render it sufficient, and that was the duty of them all, as men and as Christians. He condemned the clause prohibiting Irishmen from obtaining a settlement in Scotland as an inhospitable and an ill-omened clause: and warned the Government that, if it was not withdrawn, it would bring them into trouble not only with their Irish, but also with their Scotch friends.—Sir J. GRAHAM, after complimenting Mr. Dundas on the eloquence of his speech, said the principle of the Bill was admitted to be correct on all hands; the only question was as to its machinery, and that question would be best discussed in committee. He then proceeded to notice in detail the points in which the machinery of the Bill had been improved by the committee up-stairs, and then alluded to Mr. Dundas's observation that the clauses in this Bill relating to Irish paupers were harsh and inhospitable. He was not prepared to say that he would inflexibly adhere to those clauses in committee; but he thought that the law would bear hardly on Scotland, if three years' industrial residence in the sister country gave a settlement to any person except a native-born Scotchman. He thought that the voice of the public demanded an alteration in the existing law. He tendered the present Bill as the means of ameliorating it. He took upon himself the responsibility of pressing it during the present session; but considered that responsibility to be light, when compared with that which would rest upon the House in case the House either deferred or rejected it. A division then took place, when the amendment was negatived by a majority of 76 to 33. The House then went into committee, and after much discussion, and two divisions, 34 clauses were agreed to, when progress was reported. The Constables of the Public Works (Ireland) Bill was read a second time. The reports on the Field Gardening Bill and of the Foreign Lotteries Bill were brought up. The Seal Office Abolition Bill was read a third time and passed.

The House of Commons and the "Repeal" Members.—It appears that the difficulty in regard to the attendance of Irish members, which was considered to be so fortunately surmounted by the counting out of the House on the night of Mr. Hume's intended motion, has again presented itself, in so immediate and tangible a form, as not to be easily avoided on this occasion. Mr. Smith O'Brien and Mr. John O'Connell, both of whom are supposed as Members of the Legislature to be bound to assist in the transaction of public business, which has been so peculiarly heavy this session, have been summoned by the chairman of the committee of selection to attend in committee on the 14th inst. The two hon gentlemen have thought fit, in answer to the chairman's summons, to send very unequivocal letters, refusing to attend, and denying the power of the House to compel them to do so. The letters distinctly intimate that if it be proposed to exercise any "privilege of Parliament" against the two gentlemen, they will not only persist in refusing compliance, but question the power of the House in the Courts of Law.

The Duke of Wellington upon Duelling.—The Duke of Wellington has addressed the following note to one of the honorary secretaries of the Association for the Discouragement of Duelling, in reply to a circular lately issued by the committee suggesting a measure for deciding disputes on points of honour by reference to arbitration:—"London, June 20.—Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Capt. Hope. The duke having been the person who, in the performance of his duty, recommended to her Majesty the issue of the rules referred to in Capt. Hope's letter, his desire to put an end to the practice of deciding disputes by fighting duels cannot be doubted. Every gentleman can form as correct a judgment as the duke can upon the benefit likely to be derived from an association such as is described. Captain Hope, R.N."

Reported Loss of the Apollo Troop-Ship.—Accounts received at Lloyd's on Saturday, from Newfoundland and Halifax, of the 6th and 2d June respectively, contain information relative to the Apollo troop-ship from Halifax for Quebec, which gives reason to believe that she has been lost, with from sixty to eighty persons drowned. The Apollo left Halifax on the 1st June, with artillery and drafts for Canada; and, on the 6th inst., information was received at St. John's, Newfoundland, that a vessel had been lost at St. Shots, and that she was either the frigate Spartan or the transport Apollo; but they were not able to trace the report to any authentic source. It is known, however, that the Spartan arrived at Quebec on the 4th June, and that the Apollo sailed from Halifax on the 1st ult., for Quebec.

Royal Commission of Fine Arts.—It will be recollected that the result of the exhibition of fresco paintings in Westminster Hall last summer was the selection by her Majesty's Commissioners of six artists, who were commissioned to prepare cartoons, to be subsequently (if approved) executed in fresco, for the decoration of the six arched compartments in the House of Lords. These cartoons were to be accompanied by coloured sketches and specimens of fresco painting, and sent in for exhibition during the first week of the present month, each artist being guaranteed the sum of 400*l.* as his remuneration for the same. By the terms of the notice issued by the commissioners, the subjects of these frescos were required to be illustrative of the functions of the House of Lords, and of the relation in which it stands to the Sovereign. Three of them were required to be personifications or abstract representations of Religion, Justice, and the Spirit of Chivalry; and the remaining three (corresponding with such representations and expressing the relation of the Sovereign to the Church, to the Law, and, as the fountain of honour, to the State), to illustrate the following historical events:—"The Baptism of Ethelbert; Prince Henry, afterwards Henry V., acknowledging the authority of Chief Justice Gascoigne; and Edward the Black Prince receiving the order of the Garter from Edward III." The names of the six artists commissioned were as follow:—Messrs. Redgrave, Thomas, Cope, A.R.A., Horsley, Dyce, and Maclise, R.A.; but the commissioners, not binding themselves to adopt the work of either unless fully approved, and being desirous of giving opportunity to other artists to exhibit specimens of their ability, gave notice at the same time that the six subjects above mentioned were offered for general competition, and that three premiums of 200*l.* each would be awarded to those artists who should furnish specimens respectively deemed worthy of one of them, by judges appointed to decide on the relative merit of the works. This offer has been taken advantage of by upwards of 30 artists, whose works arranged round the walls of Westminster Hall, were opened to the public on Monday. The exhibition is in many respects far more interesting than any which have preceded it. The cartoons (37 in number) include some very beautiful designs. They are each 16 feet high by 9 feet wide. The finished sketches sent in by some of the artists are perfect gems of art, and the majority of the specimens of fresco painting show a great improvement on those exhibited last year. The first three of the subjects above named, were given to Messrs. Maclise, Horsley, and Thomas, and the last three to Messrs. Cope, Redgrave, and Dyce. Of these, the cartoon, sketch, and fresco, executed by Mr. Maclise, will, perhaps, be considered the best, both in inventive prodigality and superior knowledge of the modes in which he has wrought. Besides the six commissioned cartoons, premiums have been allotted to the works of three other artists. Mr. Armitage (who gained the first prize at the first cartoon exhibition which took place in the hall), Mr. Tenniel, and Mr. Noel Paton. The subject of Mr. Armitage's work is "Religion, and the three Christian Virtues," that of Mr. Tenniel is "Justice," and that of Mr. Paton is the "Spirit of Religion."

The Bar.—We have on various occasions noticed actions at law and other matters in which Mr. Augustus Newton, of Cheltenham, has been concerned, and more especially his proceedings against Lady Ricketts, the mother of his wife, and widow of the late Admiral Ricketts, in all of which the Courts and Juries decided against Mr. Newton. It now appears that the following order has been affixed in the hall of the Middle Temple:—"The Masters of the Bench having fully investigated the charge preferred against Augustus Newton, Esq., barrister of this society, and having heard him in his defence, are unanimously of opinion that his conduct at the bar, as proved before them, has been in several instances highly unprofessional, and is deserving of severe censure. And they do order that he be excluded from the hall for the period of two years from this date. And that this order be affixed to the screen in the hall.—Dated 5th June, 1845."

Dr. Wolff's Mission to Bokhara.—Dr. Wolff continues much indisposed from the effects of his late mission. He has lately suffered much through swellings in his feet occasioned by a worm called rishta, which attacks all strangers in Bokhara. Latterly his right hand has been disabled by a most painful swelling in the wrist. Sir Benjamin Brodie has this week opened the wrist where it was most affected, when a long Bokhara worm made its appearance, which Sir Benjamin extracted by winding it round a piece of paper.

University College.—The distribution of prizes to the students of the faculty of arts and laws at this College took place on Saturday last, in the presence of about 400 visitors. The prizes were delivered by the Marquis of Normanby, who presided on the occasion. Marylebone and Paddington Hospital.—The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of this intended edifice was performed by Prince Albert on Saturday, with the usual forms, on the site near Cambridge-terrace, Paddington-road. His Royal Highness was received by a deputation of the parochial authorities, the Bishop of London, Lords Beverley and Manvers, Mr. B. Bond Cabbell, the Dean of Chichester, and a great number of clergy. His Royal Highness having inspected the plans for the building, which were explained to him by Mr. Hopper, the architect, proceeded to the spot where the arrangements had been made for laying the stone. The whole of a very large space in which several thousands of persons were accommodated, was covered by an enormous marquee from the manufactory of Mr. Edgington, which effectually protected the company from the showers and continual gusts of wind, and without it the ceremony could hardly have been performed. The Bishop of London commenced the proceedings by a short address. A prayer was then read and the stone laid. The children of the parish then chaunted a hymn, and the bishop pronounced his blessing, which terminated the ceremony. In the evening the friends and patrons of the institution dined together at Freemasons' Tavern, in celebration of the important proceedings of the day. Prince George of Cambridge took the chair, supported by Earl Manvers, the Danish Minister, the Earl of Beverley, Admiral Sykes, B. B. Cabbell, Esq., and several clergymen of the diocese.

Society for improving the Condition of the Labouring Classes.—The first general meeting of this society was held last week at Willis's Rooms. Lord Ashley presided, and was supported by Lord Littleton, Lord Alford, Sir J. D. Paul, the Bishop of Norwich, Lord F. Fitzclarence, Lord Calthorpe, the Hon. W. Cowper, M.P., Lord Stavordale, R. B. Sheridan, Esq., M.P., Viscount Ebrington, W. J. Hamilton, Esq., M.P., the Hon. and Rev. Sydney Osborne, &c. The attendance in the body of the room was very scanty, and for the most part consisted of females. The report stated that the committee had, during the past year, been active in their attention to the system of field garden allotments for agricultural labourers, and with the view to carry it out had made purchases of land at 22 places within a short distance of the metropolis, at Edmonton, Edgeware, Dulwich, Mitcham, Bexley, Hendon, Isleworth, Romford, Acton, &c. In all these places a certain number of acres now belonging to the society were divided among a certain number of labourers as field gardens; at Thames Ditton 4 acres were divided amongst 16 tenants, and so in proportion at all the other places. At Edmonton, the rector had kindly determined to appropriate 25 acres of his glebe for the same purpose; and there appeared to be a general disposition in all the districts to which the committee had extended their exertions to forward this mode of ameliorating the condition of the labouring classes. The society had also purchased in the neighbourhood of Pentonville a space upon which to erect model houses for the use of the labouring classes, and had already commenced the construction of a court, in which some of the dwellings would be of three rooms each, and double houses to afford accommodation for two families each. One side of the court was to be occupied in this way, and on the other side were to be erected houses for the accommodation of four families each, and one large house of thirty rooms to accommodate widows or other single females of old age, at a rent not exceeding about 1*s.* 6*d.* per week. In this way the society would be enabled to afford to this class of persons the advantage of comfortable well-ventilated lodgings for a far less rent than they at present paid in the most unhealthy and pestilential abodes.

Another object which the society had in view, and proposed carrying into practice, was the establishment of a fund for granting loans at the lowest rate to the labouring classes, an accommodation which the committee, upon the best consideration, felt convinced would be productive of beneficial results. On the whole, the committee expressed the most confident hope and expectation that, with the support of the public, they should be enabled to snatch from the filth and misery in which they were involved in their abodes, the poor of the metropolis who, not unfrequently, in the most unhealthy localities were found 50 and 60 in number, of all sexes and ages, occupying a single apartment not exceeding in dimensions 22 feet by 16. The receipts of the society in the past year amounted to 4,626*l.*, and the expenditure to 3,724*l.* including 1,000*l.* for the purchase of land near Pentonville, and upwards of 1,300*l.* for the erection of model buildings, which, with sundry other expenses, left a balance in hand of 900*l.*—The adoption of the report was moved by Lord Calthorpe, who expressed his entire approval of the allotment system, which, by experience, he knew to be equally beneficial to the landlord and the labourer. The resolution was seconded by the Hon. W. Cowper, who said it was gratifying to observe the increasing interest which of late the wealthier classes in this country were taking in the condition of the humbler classes; and he hoped that, ere long, England would not be subject to the taunt, hitherto, he feared, well-merited, of being divided into "Two Nations," as had been described. A closer union, he trusted, of the classes thus distinguished was fast approaching; and when that should be consummated, England would be again what she was of old, unusually prosperous, with a happy and united people. The Bishop of Norwich, in moving the first resolution, in approval of the principle of forming model houses for the use of the labouring classes, expressed his entire concurrence in this branch of the society's exertions, and his hope that the Legislature would ere long take the subject into consideration. There was nothing so much wanted among the poorer classes as the improvement of their dwellings, and the encouragement of habits of comfort and cleanliness. It would be useful to create amongst them artificial wants, so as to lead them to aim at a better position than they were in, and consequently to increase their self-respect, to raise them above the notions of pauperism, and create within them a spirit of independence. The resolution having been seconded by Lord Alford, and supported by the Rev. Dr. Gilley, was agreed to; after which Capt. Scobell moved a resolution approving of the field-garden system, of which he had had for 14 years practical experience on his own property, and the beneficial effects both to landlord and tenant he could vouch for. The system, which had originated in only three parishes in Somerset, was now in operation in upwards of 200 parishes in that county. The Hon. Sydney Osborne seconded the resolution, which was agreed to, after which the committee and officers for the ensuing year were appointed.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending June 28:—West Districts, 125; Northern, 138; Central, 135; Eastern, 204; Southern, 208; Total, 830; males, 421; females, 409. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1281; males, 660; females, 621.

Liverpool.—The Health Committee of the town-council of Liverpool made a report to that body on Wednesday, of the operations of the baths and washhouses for the poor during the year just ended. The report was of a most favourable character, and showed that whilst affording most material accommodation to the poor at a very cheap rate, the single establishment yet in operation had paid its expenses, and left a surplus of upwards of 50*l.* The building cost between 2000*l.* and 3000*l.* The new baths and washhouses now erecting in the north end of the town will cost nearly 7000*l.*, but will not be opened till next year. So promising, however, are their anticipations that the committee strongly recommended the council to proceed to the erection of a third establishment of the same description in a more central locality, and there is no doubt the recommendation will shortly be acted upon. Thus, while the corporation of London have contributed only about 500*l.* towards a similar object, the municipal authorities of Liverpool have spent 10,000*l.*, and most likely will soon devote 3000*l.* or 4000*l.* more to the same purpose.

Portsmouth.—On Tuesday evening Sir G. Cockburn and Sir W. H. Gage, Lords of the Admiralty, and Captain Hamilton, R.N., Second Secretary to the Admiralty, accompanied by the Baron Brunnow, arrived at the residence of Admiral Sir C. Rowley, Commander-in-Chief, and dined with Sir Charles and a select party. On Wednesday morning they embarked on board the Black Eagle, and steamed out to Spithead on a visit of inspection to the experimental squadron. The barge of the Commander-in-Chief was in attendance to convey their lordships from their yacht to the various ships. The first ship visited was the St. Vincent, 120, flag-ship of the squadron, on board of which the distinguished visitors remained upwards of an hour, and were entertained by Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, who accompanied the party over his ship. Their lordships left the St. Vincent at a quarter past 1 o'clock, when Baron Brunnow was saluted with 13 guns, and also by the Swedish corvette now at Spithead, which compliment was acknowledged by the St. Vincent. On leaving the St. Vincent, Rear-Admiral Parker followed the barge of their lordships in his barge, with his flag flying in the bow. The visitors then went on board the Trafalgar, 120, Captain Martin, by whom they were escorted over the ship. They then went to the Queen, and afterwards to the Albion, 90, Commodore Lockyer. Baron Brunnow expressed himself much gratified with the inspection of the various ships, and the hospitable reception he met with at the hands of their gallant captains. About half-past 3 o'clock their lordships left the Albion, and re-embarked on board the Black Eagle, when the Admiralty flag was run up to the main, and the steamer left the anchorage, steering through the line formed by the two divisions of the squadron, the bands playing the usual salute, and the Marines upon the poop presenting arms as the yacht passed. On coming broadside on to the Swedish corvette, the Admiralty flag was lowered in compliment. Their lordships returned into harbour at 4 o'clock.—Sir Charles Ogle, Bart., Admiral of the Blue, will succeed Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Bart., in the chief command at this port, on the expiration of Sir C. Rowley's period of office. Captain Sir Richard Grant (1828) will be Flag-Captain to Sir Charles Ogle. Sir Richard goes out in the St. Vincent to witness the movements of the experimental squadron. The papers announce the promotions of Lieutenants John Cheene, of the St. Vincent, Hector Tause, of the Albion, and William F. Fead, of the Trafalgar, to be commanders, in consequence of Her Majesty's late visit to the fleet at Spithead. These officers have been selected, because they were the lieutenants who have been longest in the ships. —By letters from Ascension to the 25th April, we have accounts of a dreadful catastrophe having happened to the Brazilian slaver, captured by the Wasp, on board of which Mr. Harmer, the midshipman, and 10 men of the Wasp, in charge, were murdered by the prisoners, who took possession of the prize. The slaver, however, was retaken by the Star, 6, Commander Dunlop, when Lieutenant Wilson was put aboard to take her to Sierra Leone. It appears that 10 days after Lieut. Wilson took charge of the recaptured prize and parted company with the Star, he was caught in a heavy squall and capsized about 200 miles off Cape Three Points. Lieut. Wilson, with two Kroomen, and some of the pirates who were retaken in the schooner, and five seamen succeeded in cutting away some spars and making a raft, which they finished just before the slaver settled down and foundered. They did not save any provisions fit for consumption, and only a small quantity of water, which being soon exhausted, the Kroomen commenced drinking the salt water, which killed them both. The quartermaster and the pirates also died from the same cause, the quartermaster having previously become raving mad. 20 days after they left the schooner, and, being still upon the raft, they fell in with the Cygnet, 6, Commander Layton, to windward of Whydah, and when taken off the raft by the Cygnet's boat, the survivors presented a most horrifying spectacle, being literally a mass of putrifying sores. Commander Layton, with much prudence, sent the poor fellows on board the Wasp for conveyance to Ascension, where they arrived quite recovered on the 22d. The Heroine, 6, Lieut. Foote, has arrived at Plymouth with some of the pirates who massacred Mr. Harmer and the men of the Wasp, who have been sent home for trial.

The Lords Committees have decided that the preamble of the Leeds and West Riding Junction has not been proved, that the preambles of the Newcastle and Berwick, and of the Leeds and Thirsk have been proved. The Standing Orders Committee have passed the following Bills:—Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton; Dublin and Belfast; Liverpool and Bury; the Cornwall, Manchester, and Birmingham (Ashton branch); Manchester South Junction; the Altrincham, Lynn, and Dereham; London and Brighton (Horsham branch); Londonderry and Enniskillen; Ashton, Staleybridge, and Liverpool (Ardwick and Guide bridge branches); Oxford and Rugby; Cork and Bandon; West London Extension and Lease; Great Western (Dublin, Mullingar, and Athlone); Great North of England (Clarence and Hartlepool Junction); Richmond (Surrey); Liverpool and Manchester; Newry and Enniskillen; North Union and Ribble Navigation Branch. Their Lordships also decided that, in the case of the South Wales line, the standing orders had not been complied with. The Commons Committee on the Portsmouth lines have decided that so much of the Bill as related to the South-Western branch line between Guildford and Godalming should be passed; and that so much as related to the same line between Fareham and Portsea be also passed; that the preamble of the Direct Portsmouth Atmospheric line, as laid between Epsom and Portsmouth, be passed without a branch to Chichester. In stating this decision, the chairman particularly wished to say that the committee expressed no opinion whatever on the atmospheric principle—either for or against—but they thought that it was a line which ought to be made, with due protection for Lord Grantley and the gentlemen in his neighbourhood. The promoters of the atmospheric line might lay down an atmospheric tube or not, as they pleased. The committee also decided that so much of the Brighton, Chichester, and Portsmouth Bill as referred to the line between Chichester and Portsmouth was passed, subject to an arrangement as to the terminus at Portsea. The chairman stated that it was a direct understanding that the tube, if laid down, was not to interfere with the locomotive line, and they thought that the tube had better not be carried into Portsmouth town, but that that portion should be a locomotive line. The committee did not bind the companies to the terminus at Portsmouth, but suggested that all the companies should use one terminus.—The committee on the North Kent district have decided that the preambles of the London, Chatham, and North Kent Bill, and of the London and Croydon Atmospheric (Sydenham to Chatham and Orpington, and Chatham to Chilham) have not been proved. The committee gave no decision on the South Eastern line (Hungerford Bridge to Chilham, with branches) as it was only a project. They have also decided that the preambles of the London and Croydon Widening, the Tunbridge and Tunbridge Wells, and the Greenwich Widening have been proved; and resolved that the following lines stand over until another session:—Gravesend and Rochester, South Eastern (Maidstone to Rochester), London and Croydon (Maidstone, Ashford, and Tunbridge), South Eastern (Branch to Deal and Extension of the South Eastern, Canterbury, Ramsgate, and Margate). A return has just been published of all the railway bills applied for during the present session, from which it appears that the estimated expense of the 188 schemes projected amounts to 92,921,771*l.*, the money proposed to be borrowed being to 30,276,883*l.* The week's enumeration of new schemes embraces no fewer than 14. Amongst them may be mentioned the Birmingham and Oxford Junction, which proposes to connect the North with the West of England; the Gloucester, Aberystwith, and Central Wales, and with a capital of one million and a quarter; the Great Sicilian, to skirt the north-west coast of Sicily; the Bengal Great Western, 425 miles from Calcutta to to the interior; the Carlow and Kilkenny; the Manchester, Liverpool, and Great North of England; the Auxerre, a branch of the Paris and Lyons; the Bremen and Bremen Hafen, 40 miles from Bremen, to the harbour on the Meser; the British Guiana, for connecting Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice; the direct West of England, a broad gauge line, from Reading and Newbury to Taunton; the Birmingham, Thame, and Buckingham; the Birmingham, Warwick, and Daventry Junction; the Swedish General; and the Regent's Canal line, from Paddington to Limehouse. The alphabetical list, with names, descriptions, and places of abode of subscribers to new projects, just published by order of the House, shows that the total amount of railway subscriptions, by persons who have subscribed 2000*l.* and upwards, for lines before Parliament in the present session, amounts to 61,603,707*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* The return occupies 150 folio pages, and the number of lines including branches and main lines, amount to 209.—Meetings were held last week at Darlington and Hull, when it was resolved to lease the Hull and Selby to the York and North Midland Company, and to lease and ultimately sell the Great North of England to the Midland, and North Midland, and Newcastle and Darlington Companies on terms agreed upon between G. Hudson, Esq., and the Directors of the Great North of England Company. At the meeting of the York and North Midland Company on Saturday, Mr. Hudson brought before the meeting a proposition, now occupying the attention of some of the leading railway companies, for presenting a testimonial to Mr. George Stephenson. He stated that when the Newcastle and Berwick and North British lines were completed, Mr. Stephenson would have carried out the construction of an uninterrupted route of railway communication from London up to Edinburgh, and proposed that, as Mr. Stephenson was a native of Northumberland, that a statue might be erected on the bridge about to be erected over the Tyne, at Newcastle, which was intended to be one of the most magnificent railway works yet constructed in this country.

Ireland.

Dublin.—The Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland for some days past have been assembled at Maynooth for the purpose of completing the arrangements connected with the new administration of the College. The Very Rev. Dr. Montague has, from growing age and infirmity, resigned the Presidentship of Maynooth, and is to be succeeded by the Very Rev. Dr. Renehan, the Vice-President. Professor Whitehead, a near relative of Lord Ffrench, and one of the reverend gentlemen who was summoned to London at the instance of the Premier, during the Parliamentary discussions on the Endowment Bill, has been appointed Vice-President. The prelates have determined to establish a professorship of Ecclesiastical History, and have appointed the Rev. Dr. Russell to fill the new chair. The rev. gentleman was associated with the recently appointed Vice-President in his late visit to London, at the instance of Sir R. Peel. The bishops have likewise resolved upon the appointment of an additional professor of theology to co-operate with the three professors at present in office, when the number of students shall have increased to the number proposed by the new bill. They have further recommended the appointment of an additional dean, to take place also whenever the exigencies of the establishment may render it necessary. Both these appointments will take place at a concursus of the heads and visiters of the College, pursuant to the statute. It is understood that, in pursuance of the wishes of the prelates and the lay visiters, a building committee will be appointed for the purpose of conferring with the architects of the Board of Works, respecting the most eligible manner of disposing of the funds placed at their disposal for the enlargement of the College. These parties will, of course, determine whether the present buildings are to be enlarged, or whether an entirely new edifice, in a more desirable situation, is to be constructed instead. On account of the dampness of the present site, in winter especially, the professors and students concur in a desire for removal to a more healthy locality, and it is stated that the architect of the Board of Works, on a recent visit of inspection, expressed his disapproval of the arrangement and site of the present building. In regard to the New Colleges Bill, the prelates have had under consideration the modifications proposed by Government. The result of their deliberations is not generally known, but the Evening Post states that, having already, at the synod held in Dublin, unanimously adopted a memorial and resolution, embodying their opinions, and suggesting the changes which they considered indispensable, the prelates did not deem it advisable, under the circumstances, to take any further step.—The Archbishop of Dublin held his annual visitation in St. Patrick's cathedral last week, and delivered an elaborate charge, in which he discussed at length the policy of the Maynooth Bill, repeating the leading arguments of his speech on the same subject in the House of Lords. His Grace maintained that the grant was not to be looked upon in the light of a gift, but as a vote out of a national fund to which Roman Catholics contributed as well as Protestants; that it was quite different in its nature from a gratuity given by a private individual; and that Roman Catholics have a right to part of the national property. He did not anticipate that Roman Catholics would be converted to Protestantism by the superior education of their priests; but he expected that they would derive much benefit from it. The State had no power to convert Roman Catholics, but it might mitigate the evils of the system by providing them with a better general education. With respect to the vow which they, as clergymen, had taken "to banish and drive away all erroneous doctrine contrary to God's word," he thought that duty should be confined to persons within their own communion. With respect to those not of our communion, there was no way of banishing the error but by banishing or driving away the individual—an operation which in these days could evidently not be performed. He concluded a long address by exhorting the clergy to cultivate a spirit of forbearance, charity, and toleration, and to approve themselves diligent in cultivating science and general literature, which was one of God's appointed means of making men wise unto salvation.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association was held on Monday, Sir Simon Bradstreet, Bart., in the chair.—Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL, M.P., read a letter from Mr. Steele detailing the further progress of his mission to the north of Ireland, and stating the various places he had visited.—Capt. BRODERICK having handed in a sum of money from Cork, alluded to the favourable result of the registry in that city, and urged the electors not to pledge themselves to any candidate who would not be recommended by Mr. O'Connell and the Repeal Association.—Mr. M. O'CONNELL having announced the receipt of 29*l.* from Ardagh, proceeded to advert to the late murder in the county of Cavan, and expressed his conviction that it was the duty of every individual to use his best exertions to hunt out the perpetrators of that atrocious deed. On concluding his observations, he read a letter from Mr. O'Connell, detailing his fruitless opposition to the new Colleges Bill, and expressing his renewed conviction that "the British Parliament is quite unsuited to the protection of the civil and religious liberties of the people of Ireland." The following is the conclusion of this letter:—"As to the other measures intended for Ireland, nothing in any degree satisfactory is even intended to be brought forward in the present session. Lord Stanley's Bill, in the House of Lords, is a laughing-stock to the community: its machinery is only worthy of the philosophers of Swift's 'Flying Island;' and you will have perceived, by the report of the proceedings in the House of Commons last night, that Sir J. Graham is himself ignorant of the nature of the one other Bill for Ireland, which is under preparation in the Attorney-General's office. Lord Devon's commission has placed beyond doubt the accumulating and increasing misery of the agricultural population of Ireland. Our political grievances are many and iniquitous: the insufficiency of the Irish representation—the insufficiency of the electoral franchise—the insufficiency of Irish municipal reform—the burden of the established Church—the exhausting evils of absenteeism—all these, aggravated by physical misery and destitution, are all, all, left unredressed and unheeded by the British Legislature. In truth they have not time, even if they had the inclination, to attend to our business, ever occupied as they are by their own. Can, then, there be found one single rational being in Ireland to deny that there is but one remedy, and that to be found only in the restoration of our Irish Parliament. No man can be loyal to the Monarch, or attached to the connection with Great Britain, who does not see that the only means of preserving the connection between the two countries is by the restoration of the Irish Parliament. I return, therefore, to Ireland, more deeply convinced than ever of the necessity of the Repeal of the Union. I return to that struggle with unabated ardour and continuing perseverance—to seek for it by legal, peaceable, and constitutional means, and none other. But to seek for it with a determination and continuousness that before long must insure success. Hurrah, then, for Repeal!"—Mr. DOHENEY called attention to the frightful state of the county of Cavan, and suggested that Mr. O'Connell should be requested to come back to Ireland for the purpose of exerting himself to restore peace in the disturbed districts. He attributed all the unfortunate occurrences which had taken place to the injudicious legislation of English statesmen, and stated that Ireland was animated by the hope that every bad act introduced by the base oligarchy of England to insult and injure her would be repealed by the independent people of Ireland when the Act of Union was abolished. He also moved the adoption of an address of sympathy to Mr. Smith O'Brien, on the occasion of the attack made upon him by Mr. Roebuck.—Mr. GRATTAN, M.P., seconded this motion. In the course of his speech he alluded to the state of Cavan, denounced the assassin of Mr. Booth, and vindicated his own tenantry in that county against any share of blame in connection with that transaction. The rent for the week was 382*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*

Cork.—On Monday last, the 30th ult., a conflict took place between the police and the country people at Ballinhassig fair. The countrymen pelted the police with stones, and the latter at length fired, when eight of the countrymen were killed and a large number dangerously wounded.

Cavan.—There are no accounts of further outrages in the disturbed districts. Reinforcements of military continued to arrive, and the excitement throughout the county was gradually subsiding. The magistrates of the county assembled in the Court-house of Cavan last week, Lord Farnham presiding, and adopted an address to the Lord-Lieutenant, describing the circumstances connected with the horrible murder of Mr. Booth, and urging the necessity of prompt and decisive measures for the restoration of order. The magistrates also addressed a requisition to the High Sheriff for a general meeting of the county, to consider the present state of the district, and resolved to invite the Roman Catholic bishop, Dr. Browne, and his clergy, to co-operate at the meeting. Alarming rumours, growing out of the murder of Mr. Booth, were rife in Dublin on Wednesday. One party stated that the Orangemen had killed Mr. Steele—another that the Catholics had assassinated the Rev. Dr. Martin, of Killishandra; both stories, however, happily want confirmation. It is also stated, and we believe correctly, that the child of Mr. Booth, who had his arm fractured by a fall from the gig when his father was shot, has since died.

COURT OF ARCHES.—The Case of Mr. Oakeley.—Sir H. Jenner Fust on Monday gave judgment in this important case, which has excited so much interest throughout the country. We have a full report of the judgment in type, but a press of other matter compels us to postpone it to next week. At present we have only room to state that the sentence of the Court was, that Mr. Oakeley's license be revoked, and that he be not permitted to perform any Ministerial duties in any church or chapel within the diocese of London, or within the province of Canterbury, until he has renounced his present heresies and errors: the sentence to be published in St. Margaret's Chapel on Sunday, the 6th inst., and Mr. Oakeley to be condemned in the costs of the suit.

News of the Week.

On Monday Sir R. Peel made an official statement of the course he intends to pursue respecting the numerous Bills brought in by Government, and still before Parliament. The measures, he said, with which Government will proceed this session are the Irish Colleges Bill, the Scotch Poor-law Amendment Bill, the Jewish Disabilities Bill, a Bill to consolidate the Customs Acts, and a great number of unopposed Bills for England and Ireland. The Commons Enclosure Bill, the Drainage of Lands Bill, &c., will be proceeded with by having morning sittings. Among the measures which Government intend to postpone are the Medical Bill of Sir J. Graham which has caused so much excitement in the profession, the Parochial Settlements Bill, and the Charitable Trusts Bill. With regard to Lord Stanley's Irish Landlords and Tenants Bill, Sir R. Peel would not give a decided answer, but from the tenour of his observations there is little doubt that it will also be postponed for the present session. Lord J. Russell, after the Ministerial statement, withdrew his Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, finding it impossible to obtain a sufficient number of Government days to ensure its progress. On Friday, on the motion for going into committee on the Commons Enclosure Bill, Mr. S. Crawford brought forward his amendment for the postponement of the Bill till next session. After a long discussion the amendment was negatived by 121 to 11, and the House went into committee. Several clauses were then agreed to, and the remainder were passed in Tuesday's and Thursday's sittings, without any important discussion. On Monday the House went into committee on the Irish Colleges Bill, when Sir T. D. Acland moved the insertion of a clause providing that the president and officers of the Colleges be required to make a declaration, the object of which was to ascertain their belief in the principles of the Christian faith. The motion was opposed by Government on the ground that it would be evaded as a religious test, and regarded as at variance with the professed object of the Bill. On a division the motion was negatived by 105 to 36, and the remaining clauses and the preamble of the Bill were agreed to. On Tuesday Lord Palmerston brought on his motion on the Slave-trade convention, the chief object of which was to obtain a return of the names of witnesses examined before the Commissioners, and extracts from the evidence they had given. The motion was resisted by Government, and negatived on a division by 94 to 51. On the same day Mr. Cowper's Field Gardens Bill was read a third time and passed. On Wednesday Lord Ashley's Lunatic Asylums Bill, after a long discussion, was carried through committee and ordered to be reported. Mr. Macaulay then moved, in the absence of Mr. Rutherford, the second reading of the Scotch Universities Bill, the object of which is to abolish the tests by which many adherents of the Free Church party are prevented from taking degrees or holding office in any University of Scotland. The discussion which ensued was long and animated, and the Government were vehemently attacked for supporting different systems in different parts of the empire. The second reading, however, was lost; but only by the small majority of eight. On the same day Mr. Watson's Roman Catholic Relief Bill was rejected by a majority of 42. On Thursday, on the motion for the third reading of the Irish Colleges Bill, Mr. Bernal Osborne brought forward an amendment for an inquiry into the expediency of throwing open Trinity College to Roman Catholics and Dissenters. After a long debate the amendment was lost by 168 to 91; and the third reading of the Bill was carried by a majority of 151.

The revenue returns for the quarter ending on Saturday last have been published this week. They show an increase on the year of 847,178*l.*; but a decrease on the quarter of 739,847*l.* This is attributable to the important reductions made by Sir R. Peel at the beginning of the session in the customs and excise duties; and although at first sight the decrease appears considerable, it is satisfactory to find that it falls far short of the Premier's calculation. In the Customs, for instance, Sir R. Peel calculated that the reduction of the duty on sugar, and the abolition of the duties on cotton, staves, &c, would reduce that branch of the revenue for the quarter by the sum of 603,000*l.*, whereas the actual diminution is only 369,387*l.* In the Excise, Sir R. Peel calculated that the abolition of the duties on glass and auctions would entail a reduction on the quarter of 223,000*l.*, whereas the loss is only 149,908*l.* The other branches of the standing revenue show a considerable increase on the quarter. The Stamps have increased 132,000*l*; the Assessed Taxes 10,000*l.*; and the Property-tax 157,000*l.* The Post-office and Crown Lands show neither increase nor diminution for the quarter, the returns being identical with those of the corresponding quarter of last year. The Post-office however shows, on the year's account, an increase of 47,000*l.*

On Saturday Her Majesty and Prince, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, went in the char-a-banc to Bushey house, to pay a visit to the Queen Dowager. On Sunday the Queen and Prince Albert, and the King of the Belgians, attended divine service in the Chapel Royal Buckingham Palace. On Wednesday Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the King and Queen of the Belgians, honoured the performance at Drury-lane Theatre with their presence. Her Majesty and the royal party have taken their usual walks and rides during the week. It is stated that the Queen and Prince Albert, after taking a farewell of the King and Queen of the Belgians on Monday morning, will proceed by railway to Gosport, and there embark on board the royal yacht for Cowes. Her Majesty and the Prince contemplate sojourning at Osborne house until the close of the week. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal will accompany Her Majesty.

Parliamentary Movements.—Captain Bennet, Conservative, has been elected member for West Suffolk without opposition. The election for Dartmouth has terminated in the return of Mr. Moffatt, the free trade candidate, the numbers being for Mr. Prinsep, 111; Mr. Moffatt, 125; Majority, 14. The election for Exeter has terminated in favour of Sir John Duckworth, Conservative, who polled 670 votes more than General Briggs, the free trade candidate. At Abingdon, the Attorney-General has been re-elected by a majority of 30, the numbers being for Sir F. Thesiger, 156; Gen. Caulfield, 126. The new Solicitor-General, Mr. Kelly, will not be re-elected for Cambridge without a contest, Mr. Shafto Adair having come forward to oppose him on the Whig interest. The contest is expected to be so close, that measures are said to be in progress to secure a seat for Mr. Kelly elsewhere, in the event of his defeat at Cambridge. It is stated that this object will be attained either by the retirement of Mr. B. Escott, from Winchester, or by that of Mr. Bodkin, from Rochester. It is generally reported that Mr. Hudson, the great railway proprietor, is to be the next member for Whitby, Mr. Chapman having determined to retire on the dissolution of Parliament.

THE REVENUE.—The returns for the year and quarter ended on the 5th July, have been published this week. They show a decrease in the Customs and Excise for the quarter, but to a much smaller extent than that anticipated by Sir R. Peel at the beginning of this session in proposing the reduction of the Customs and Excise duties. The total revenue for the YEAR is 51,067,856*l.*, being an increase over that of the year preceding of 847,178*l.* In the Customs, the increase is 36,886*l.*; Excise 119,397*l.*; Stamps 328,820*l.*; Taxes 30 925*l*; Property Tax 14,291*l.*; Post-office 47,000*l.*; Miscellaneous 255,679*l.*; to which must be added Imprest and other moneys 122,142*l.*—making a total of 955,440*l.* The decrease is confined to Crown lands, 20,000*l.*, and Repayments of Advances 88,262*l.*—making together 108,262*l.*, which being deducted from the above sum of 955,440*l.*, gives an increase on the year of 847,178*l.* On the QUARTER there is a decrease of 739,847*l.* In the Customs this decrease is 369,687*l.*; Excise 149,908*l.*; Miscellaneous 408,535*l.*; to which must be added Imprest and other moneys 19,756*l.*; Repayments of Advances 92 203*l.*—making a total of 1,040,089*l.* On the other hand, the Stamps show an increase of 132,043*l.*; Taxes 10,693*l.*; Property Tax 157,506*l.*—making together 300,242*l.*, which being deducted from the above sum of 1,040,089*l.* gives a decrease on the quarter of 739,847*l.* The Post office and Crown lands do not appear in this calculation, the quarter's return in both cases being identical with that of 1844, exhibiting neither increase nor decrease.

Baronetcy.—The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, granting the dignity of a Baronet of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto John Francis Davis, Esq., Governor of Hong Kong.

Law Appointments.—Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, M.P. for Cambridge, has been appointed Solicitor-General, in the room of Sir F. Thesiger, promoted to the office of Attorney-General.

Diplomatic Appointments.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint J. F. Crampton, Esq., now Secretary of Legation in Switzerland, to be Secretary of Legation in the United States; and N. S. Scott, Esq., some time paid Attaché to Her Majesty's Legation in Spain, to be Secretary of Legation in Switzerland.

East India Company.—The Hon. W. Leslie Melville was elected an East India Director on Wednesday last, in the room of the late Major-Gen. Sir J. Bryant.

New Commission.—The Queen has appointed Lieut.-Col. Sir F. Smith, Mr. Airy the astronomer royal, and Professor Barlow of Woolwich, to be the commissioners for inquiring into the merits of the broad and narrow railway gauge.

Death of Lord Seaford.—Charles Rose Ellis, Baron Seaford, of the county of Sussex, so created in 1826, died suddenly last week, at his seat, Woodend, near Chichester, in his 74th year. In 1798, he married the only child of Lord Hervey, eldest son of the Earl of Bristol, and by her had two sons and a daughter. Her ladyship died in 1803; and in 1810, his lordship married Lady Hardy, relict of Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Hardy. His eldest son, Lord Howard de Walden, Ambassador to the Court of Portugal, succeeds to the title and estates.

Funeral of Sir W. Follett.—The mortal remains of this distinguished lawyer were consigned to their last resting-place in the vaults beneath the altar of the Temple Church, on Friday. Among those present to pay the last tribute of respect to the deceased's memory, were the whole of the Judges (with the exception of Lord Denman, who was unable to attend), the Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, Sir R. Peel, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Vice-Chancellor of England, the Duke of Marlborough, Earl Carnarvon, Vice-Chancellors Wigram and Knight Bruce, Lord Campbell, Sir T. D. Acland, M.P. for North Devon, Mr. J. W. Croker, Mr. Green, M.P., W. Brougham, Esq., W. Wingfield, Esq., the Attorney-General, Lord Langdale, and upwards of 200 of the principal members of the Common Law and Equity Courts. On entering the Temple the procession formed on the terrace of the Inner Temple, and moved up King's Bench-walk, through Taufield-court, to the western entrance of the Church, preceded by the benchers of the Inner and Middle Temples, two and two. The Rev. Mr. Hewlett, the Reader, and Archdeacon Robinson, Master of the Temple, preceded the coffin. Mr. Burge, Q.C., as treasurer of the Temple, Chief Justice Tindal, Sir J. Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Crowder, Q.C., the Lord Chancellor, Sir R. Peel, and the Vice-Chancellor of England, acted as pall bearers. The chief mourner, R. B. Follet, Esq., the brothers and immediate relatives, and the judges, noblemen, and others present, followed two and two. On entering the church the procession filed off to their respective places, and the burial service was commenced by the choir chaunting the beautiful anthem, "I am the resurrection and the life." Archdeacon Robinson then read the service, and the body was deposited in in the catacombs, immediately beneath that of the late Lord Thurlow. The beautiful anthem of Handel was then sung, "His body is buried within the grave, but his name shall live for ever." The church was hung with black, and the scene altogether was one of the most solemn and impressive that can be imagined.

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The French Government received accounts on Saturday of the successful conclusions of the negotiations which have been going on for some time past with the court of Rome, under the auspices of M. Rossi, in respect to the Jesuits. The Débats says that the result of the negotiations is perfectly satisfactory, and much more prompt than could have been expected. The demand made by M. Rossi on the part of the French Government was, that all the establishments belonging to the Jesuits in France, with their chapels and the schools under the directions of the order, should be closed, and that the members of the order, who had united for the purpose of living in common should be dispersed. It appears, however, that although the Jesuits are in point of fact to be expelled from France, their expulsion is not in consequence of the orders of the Pope, who positively refused to meddle in the affair, but in consequence of orders from the General of the Jesuits, who, taking into consideration the delicate position of the French Ministry as regards the Chambers and the country, thought right to advise the Jesuits in France to close their establishments, without offering a useless resistance to the measures of the Government. As to a demand made by France, having for its object to obtain from the Holy See an encyclical letter to the French bishops, inviting them to discontinue their opposition, particularly as regards the law on public education, it appears that the Pope still refuses compliance. The papers are, of course, filled with comments on the result of these negotiations, which appears to be the very opposite of the wishes and expectations of the high church party. The Univers Religieux, which is the organ of the extreme party in the Church, and which had announced only a few days before the complete failure of M. Rossi in his negotiations, is overwhelmed with grief at the fate of the Jesuits. "This news," it says, "which no letter from Rome had prepared us for, breaks our hearts; but nothing can shake our faith. If Rome ordains it, the Jesuits will submit. The Church of France will struggle on without them, as she has done heretofore. Their departure deprives her of none of her rights, but adds to her duties. God will not suffer her courage to sink under such trials. The movement excited by the ordonnances of 1828 was the origin of the revival of religion of which we are witnesses to-day." The Globe praises the wisdom displayed by the Court of Rome in comprehending what influence public opinion possessed under a Government like that of France, and in perceiving that the dislike to the Jesuits by no means excluded a truly religious feeling. "In obtaining this spiritual intervention," says the Débats, "the Government has given a fresh guarantee for the maintenance of moral order, and has taken from all those who pretend to be faithful Catholics all pretext for protesting against measures ratified by the adhesion and the concurrence of the chief of the Church." The Quotidienne, a Legitimist organ, and at the same time an advocate of the clerical interest, including perhaps a portion of what is called the high church party, has a long article on the subject, in which it declares "that the Papal decision, so far as it concerns the civil state, the constitutional principles, the purely legal organisation of France, is a fault—an enormous fault—the consequences of which must very shortly be felt either by the church of France or by the Holy See itself." The Constitutionnel, in mentioning the fact, denies that any credit is due to the Government for what it has done; the whole merit of the proceeding, it contends, being due to M. Thiers, who brought the subject before the Chambers, and called forth such a demonstration of feeling against the Jesuits, both in the Chambers and in the country, as to compel the Government to yield to its influence. The articles of the other Opposition journals are merely an echo of this sentiment, without bringing forward any other argument worthy of notice.—It was rumoured that immediately after the return of M. Rossi from Rome, the Moniteur would publish a royal ordinance separating the direction of ecclesiastical affairs from the Department of Justice, and converting it into a special Ministry, which will be confided to the successful negotiator. "This," says that journal, "is one of the conditions of the concessions made by the Court of Rome."—The Chamber of Deputies has virtually finished the business of the session. It met on Friday to receive the report of the committee on petitions, and is not to meet again till the Chamber of Peers shall have wound up the business before it, after which the Deputies will meet once more to close the session. In the sitting of the Chamber on Thursday, the budget of receipts was finally adopted by a large majority, the votes for it being 240, while only 20 mustered against it. On Monday the Chamber adopted the Bill relative to the grant of 400,000 f. for the redemption of slaves, and the formation of agricultural establishments in the French colonies. The Algerie gives the following as positive:—"After much discussion the Emperor of Morocco has at length informed our representative that he will ratify the treaty of the 18th March. The delay fixed for the ratification would expire on the 18th June. The principal reason assigned by the Emperor for the non-ratification of the treaty was that he was bound by treaties with all the powers of Europe to treat each of them on the footing of the most favoured nation, and he was convinced that they would demand for the frontier of the coast the same concessions as were made to us by land." The crops in the environs of Paris present the most cheering aspect. In Brie, Beance, and Picardy, rye is beginning to ripen; the heads of the wheat are in blossom, as also the vines. The season having been rainy, the oats, barley, sainfoin, and potatoes promise to be most abundant; the beet-roots are superb. Paris is every morning supplied with immense quantities of fresh vegetables. The apple-trees in Normandy are already covered with fruit.

SPAIN.—We have advices from Madrid, of the 3d inst., but they are of very little interest. Rumours of the most contradictory nature were spread as to the Queen's visit to the Basque provinces. According to the semi-official print Heraldo, her Majesty will not proceed to that quarter; but it was generally believed that she would come to no determination on the subject before her arrival at Saragossa. Her Majesty's political or medical advisers seemed to differ in opinion as to the virtues of Santa Aguada waters, and the beneficial effects of the air of Navarre and Biscay.—Some slight disturbances are said to have occurred at Seville on the 26th, when a crowd of persons assembled and shouted "Long live the Constitution of 1837;" but on the appearance of an armed force, they dispersed without offering any resistance.—The acquittal of the Expectador on the charges brought against it by the Government is considered a great triumph by the liberal party, and has evidently widened the breach between it and the Government.

GERMANY.—A letter from Berlin, of the 28th ult., states that the King and Queen of Prussia are to have a meeting for three days in the month of August, at the Castle of Stolzenfels, on the Rhine, with their Majesties King Louis Philippe and Queen Victoria. The Queen of Prussia will go in the beginning of July to Kissingen, where the King will join her to accompany her to the Rhine. It is said that the King of the French and the Queen of England will be invited to pass some days at Sans Souci.—The Duchess of Kent and her son, the Prince of Leiningen, have arrived at Vienna.—Letters from Konigsberg, of the 18th state, that the long-agitated affair of the intended marriage of a young Jewish physician, Dr. Falkson (who desired to marry an accomplished Christian lady of that city) is now decided by a resolution sent from Elburg. The minister Eichhorn had decided against Dr. Falkson, and the King, to whom he repeatedly applied, found that a marriage between Jews and Christians is incompatible with existing laws.

SWITZERLAND.—Letters from Berne, of the 4th, state that the Jesuits had been already placed in possession of the parochial church of the Franciscan friars at Lucerne. Mr. Scott, the new Secretary of the English Legation in Switzerland, had arrived at Berne.—A letter from Basle, of the 4th, states that the small town of Thusis, which, after Coire, was the most manufacturing and richest in the canton of the Grisons, had been entirely destroyed by fire.

ITALY.—A letter from Rome in a Bordeaux journal, says:—"The order of the Knights of Malta is entering on a new phase. For some time past the members have had in view to procure the little isle of Ponza, to the south-west of Terracina. This island belongs to the King of the Two Sicilies. The Knights would undertake to establish there, and keep up a quarantine. Now that the Archduke Frederick (commander-in-chief of the Austrian navy) has entered into the order, the affair appears to have received a new impulse, for there is some idea of raising this young prince to the dignity of Grand Master."—Cardinal Capaccini died on the 15th ult., at Rome. Although raised to the purple so late as the 21st April last, he had long been a faithful servant of the Holy See, having been successively Nuncio in the Netherlands, at Naples and Portugal, besides holding other important offices.—In Tuscany a company of bankers, merchants, and landed proprietors, has been authorised by the Grand Duke, it appears, as far back as the month of April last, for the construction of a railway between Leghorn and the Papal States, there to meet another line, of which Rome will be the starting point. This railway will be 107 miles long; the capital required amounts to 31,150,000 Tuscan livres, or 1,050,000*l.* sterling, subdivided in shares of 1000 Tuscan livres, or about 33*l.* sterling each, the whole of which has already been subscribed, it is said by the [illegible] of the company. It will be commenced as [illegible] various necessary preliminary surveys are [illegible].—Another letter from Rome states that [illegible] company is in treaty with the Pontifical [illegible] for the construction of railroads through [illegible] States. Their offers are said to be most advantageous. They require the concession of the lines only [illegible] years, and they undertake in return to complete [illegible] own expense the famous church of St. Paul, near Rome, and to give 50,000 scudi to the Propaganda. The company is said to possess already a capital of 3 [illegible] scudi.—According to accounts from Naples, of the 25th ult, a new eruption of Vesuvius was daily expected. Some flames had already been seen, and a slight flow of lava had taken place in the direction of Naples.

GREECE.—A letter from Trieste in the Piedmontese papers states that General Grivas has been killed in a duel with General Kallergi, aide-de-camp to King Otho. If that intelligence be correct, serious disorders may be apprehended at Athens, which is garrisoned by 2000 irregulars, entirely devoted to General Grivas.

TURKEY AND SYRIA.—Letters from Constantinople, of the 18th of June, mention that the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia had arrived there that day from Sebastopol. Great preparations are making for fêtes to be given on the occasion of his Imperial Highness's visit.—Letters from Syria, of June 9, announce the breaking out of a fresh insurrection in the Lebanon. An engagement between the Maronites and the Druses had taken place at Buccah, in the plain between the two Lebanons, which had terminated in a loss on each side of from 100 to 150 men. The roads between Damascus and Jerusalem are no longer safe; and no caravan can travel by that route without a strong escort. The Arabs are from 40,000 to 50,000 strong, and are plundering right and left. An attempt had been made on the life of the French Consul at Damascus, and the whole country was, in fact, in a state of complete disorganisation. The Turkish authorities were, as usual, occupied in exciting the Druses against the Maronites. It is now believed that there can be no peace for Syria without the interposition of the Great Powers.

MALTA.—A proclamation at Malta, stating that the Sicilian dollar should be legalised at the rate of 4*s.* sterling, has revived the old controversy as to the circulation of English silver in the colony, where it is not merely a token, as in England, but a legal tender to an unlimited amount. The Anglo-Maltese Bank, in their address to the local government, express their satisfaction at the declaration that the standard of value in England shall be considered the legitimate standard of value, but they consider that the law which establishes the Sicilian dollar at 4*s.* should be accompanied with a regulation by which British silver should not be a legal tender for more than 40*s.* They also think a compensation of 2*d.* per dollar should be allowed to the present holder, 4*s.* 2*d.* being the value at which the coin is held. The Maltese complain at being obliged to take British silver at its nominal value, and lose the 10 per cent. on their coinage, which our Government makes by way of seignorage.

RUSSIA.—The Constitutionnel publishes a letter dated from the frontiers of Russia, the 17th ult., which states that the check suffered by the army under the orders of Count Woronzow, and the difficulty of maintaining a strong military force in the provinces now half deserted, force the Emperor to adjourn the definite pacification of the Caucasus. Not only will there be no more fresh troops sent there, but it is the intention of the Emperor to diminish the number of the troops already there. It is supposed that 50,000 men distributed in the numerous forts of the Caucasus may be regarded as sufficient to maintain the defensive and the status quo.

UNITED STATES.—The Shakspeare packet arrived at Liverpool on Monday from New York, with papers one day later, the interest of which may be summed up in the announcement of the death of General Jackson. The following particulars of this event are from the New York papers of the 17th June:—"The event for which the nation had been resignedly looking for some time past has at last occurred, and the venerable Jackson is no more. The news, although it was anticipated, produced a marked sensation in this city. Many persons immediately closed their stores—flags were hoisted half-mast high on the liberty poles—and throughout the community all seemed impressed with the feeling that a mighty man had departed for ever. General Jackson's name has long been associated with the history of this country, and will be now enrolled on the list of worthies who have done the republic no mean service. He had many faults, of which friends and enemies alike made as much as they could: but he had also many virtues, and let them only be remembered now! Amid the quiet and solemn shades of the Hermitage, and close by the ashes of his wife, 'After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well.'" The Louisville Democrat contains the following:—"The term of General Jackson's eventful life closed on Sunday, 8th inst., at six o'clock. On Sunday morning the report reached Nashville that he had expired, owing to his having fainted away, in the attempt to remove him from his chair to his bed. He, however, recovered for a few hours. A short time before his death he took an affectionate leave of his friends and domestics, retaining to the last his senses and intellect unclouded. He expired with the utmost calmness, expressing the highest confidence in a happy immortality through a Redeemer. The simple announcement of this melancholy though long expected event, will excite the deepest emotions in the hearts of the American people. The memory of Jackson belongs to his country. Her history will contain the record of his valuable services, his sterling patriotism, and a nation's gratitude will be his monument. The funeral, we understand, was to have taken place yesterday morning. The Common Council last evening passed resolutions appropriate to the occasion, appointed a joint committee to confer with other citizens, and report at a special meeting a plan for a more general manifestation of the public sorrow, in view of this melancholy dispensation of Providence. General Andrew Jackson was born Mar. 15, 1767. and died June 8th, 1845, in his 78th year." There is no other news by this arrival, except the rumour that the Hon. Louis M'Lane, of Baltimore, formerly Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James's, has received from President Polk the appointment to the same post, and that he will shortly succeed Mr. Everett, the present Minister. Mr. M'Lane was for some time Secretary of the United States, but resigned his office in consequence of an unwillingness on his part to assist in carrying out the views of the then President, General Jackson.

WEST INDIES AND MEXICO.—By the Medway steamship we learn that the weather in the islands is most favourable to the prospects of the planters, but there is no political news beyond the intelligence of the release of Santa Anna from the castle of Perote, after a sort of half-mock, unmeaning trial. He was sentenced to be banished from Mexico for life. The Medway shipped him at the river Antigua, about 14 miles from Vera Cruz, whither he had arrived under an escort from the existing government. He was afraid of trusting himself in Vera Cruz, on account of popular feeling running high against him. The steamer accordingly ran down the coast, and took him from one of the government gun-boats. He was accompanied by his wife, her brother, and stepfather, nephew, and daughter, and seemed pretty well at ease. His wife, who is only 16 years of age, is represented as a remarkably pretty and interesting woman, and seemed to feel the position of her husband very keenly. The fallen president brought an immense quantity of luggage on board, and about 20,000 dollars in specie. He landed at Havannah, but what his future intentions are, or whither he means to bend his steps, no one knew. On the departure of the Medway from Vera Cruz on the 2d of June, all was tranquil in the interior.

NEW ZEALAND.—The ship Mid Lothian from Sydney arrived off Falmouth on Monday, and the Captain sent the following written communication to the agents to Lloyd's, by one of the pilot-boats:—"April 2, 1845, lat. 35, 43 S. long. 177, 56 E. spoke the Mars, whaler, of New Bedford, who reported having seen her Majesty's ship North Star three days previously, working into the Bay of Islands; also reported that the natives there and the crew of her Majesty's ship Hazard, and British troops having had an encounter, the flagstaff had been pulled down, and the town of Kororaika burnt; about 100 natives had been killed and wounded, and about 18 or 20 of the English, the commander of the Hazard himself being badly wounded. The English settlers had all left for Auckland. All quiet when he left."

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—The Banking (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed—a clause, proposed by the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, to empower the Royal Bank and the Hibernian Banking Company to issue notes, having been negatived.—The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of the Jury Lists (Ireland) Bill, which he had framed with the intention of preventing the recurrence of an error similar to what had befallen in the case of the Queen v. O'Connell.—After some comments from Lord CAMPBELL, Lord DENMAN expressed his satisfaction at the introduction of the Bill, the operation of which he hoped would not be confined to Ireland, but extended to the United Kingdom.—The LORD CHANCELLOR stated that if the present Bill passed, he would introduce another relative to England. The Bill was then read a second time.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY, in moving for returns relative to the coasting trade, expressed his fears that the coasting coal trade, that great nursery for our seamen, would be destroyed by the facilities which were now afforded of bringing inland coal by railroad to the metropolis.—The Earl of DALHOUSIE considered the fears of the noble Marquis groundless. Supposing inland coal were brought by railroad at three farthings per ton per mile, that for 250 miles would be 15*s.*, while coal sea-borne from Newcastle was carried at a cost of only 7*s.* 6*d.*—Lord HATHERTON thought there was some foundation for the fears expressed, because he looked forward to the possibility, within the space of a few years, of inland coal being carried by railroad at a farthing per ton per mile, or 5*s.* 3*d.* for the entire carriage. But though interested in inland coal, and desirous of seeing the metropolis abundantly and cheaply supplied with it, yet he would be sorry to witness the coasting trade diminished, as it was the great means of supplying our navy, the source of our maritime strength.—A brief discussion arose during which Lords ASHBURTON, STANLEY, COLCHESTER, HADDINGTON, and other peers urged upon Government the necessity of protecting the coasting trade; and the Duke of WELLINGTON, in addition, recommended that their Lordships, while considering the coasting trade, the coal trade, and railways, would not overlook the necessity of providing adequate lights along our shores.—Lord BROUGHAM said that, though he valued the coasting trade, as being, on account of its dangers and difficulties, the best school for rearing able seamen, yet the true mode of maintaining it was by the removal of all restrictions on our industry, and the consequent extension of our commerce. There was no ground, however, for the apprehensions entertained as to the decay of the coasting trade.—Lord KINNAIRD said that sea-borne coal, by reason of its greater strength, would always be preferred to inland coal for manufacturing and steam fuel. He advised Lord Londonderry to turn his attention to breaking up the great coal monopoly of the north.—After a reply from the Marquis of LONDONDERRY, the subject dropped, and the Games and Wagers Bill, and the Real Property Conveyance Bill passed through committee.

Monday.—On the motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, his Bill to enable the owners of settled estates to defray the expense of draining their lands, was read a second time, his Grace having extended the Bill to Ireland, at the request of the committee to which it was referred.—Lord CAMPBELL laid on the table a Bill to correct an error in the Law of Libel Act, which was read a first time.—On the motion of the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, a resolution was made a standing order, for the purpose of regulating the appointment of railway directors in any future Bill for the construction of new railways.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE having alluded to the predicament into which Mr. Craven Berkeley has been cast by the unwarranted insertion of his name in the Glasgow, &c., Navigation Company's Act, as noticed in our Commons' Report of Friday, gave notice to move that another standing order be added, to the effect "that no names should be recited in a Bill as liable in any pecuniary amount, until it had been first proved before the standing orders' committee that the names were inserted with the consent of the parties themselves."—Lord BROUGHAM recommended the passing of an Act "to relieve Mr. Craven Berkeley from the legal liability under which he lies, on account of the fraudulent conduct of the parties who promoted the Act in question, and of the carelessness of the Legislature."—Earl FITZHARDINGE stated that the sum for which his brother was sued in this case, was 35,000*l.*; and the costs already incurred in defending the action was 400*l.*—On the motion of Lord KINNAIRD, the Arrestment of Wages (Scotland) Bill was read a second time.—The Earl of ABERDEEN moved the second reading of the Brazils Slave-trade Bill. The effect of the measure would be to enforce the first article of the treaty of 1826, which enacted that within three years after the ratification of the treaty subjects of Brazil trading in slaves should be treated as pirates. This article had been hitherto rendered nugatory by the appointment of mixed commissions, to try offenders, which had taken the matter out of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. In fact, ever since the conclusion of the treaty it had been systematically violated by the Brazilian Government, who, though they had admitted its validity, had impeded its execution by every means in their power. The Bill was read a second time.—Lord BROUGHAM then moved the second reading of the Bill for the Administration of Criminal Justice. By this measure it was proposed to fix upon certain places as assize-towns, at which, as at the Central Criminal Court, all prisoners within a certain circuit should be tried. The state of criminal justice was such that it was necessary to adopt some such measure as the present or to appoint a greater number of judges, which would be attended with much inconvenience.—Lord CAMPBELL thought a consolidation of the kind would be very beneficial. Great advantage would be derived from the appointment of a new commission with power to inquire into the whole subject, and to redivide the assize districts of England and Ireland. He also suggested that an interchange on circuit of the English and Irish judges would be desirable.—The LORD CHANCELLOR concurred in the necessity for a new commission; but, though he did not consider the Irish judges in any way inferior to their English brethren, he did not think they could administer justice so successfully in England. As the report of the late commission was unsatisfactory, he should feel it his duty to recommend the appointment of a new one with more extensive powers.—Lord DENMAN feared it would be long before a satisfactory report was presented. No one could doubt that more frequent gaol deliveries were needed, but he was averse to a permanent winter circuit, and thought such deliveries should only take place occasionally.—Lord BROUGHAM, after the declaration made by the Lord Chancellor, would not press the bill any further. As regarded new circuits, he thought they should be permanent, not occasional; and though he entertained all respect for the Irish bench, he did not think they had such an acquaintance with the feelings and habits of the people in this country, as to enable them to discharge judicial functions in England.—The Duke of RICHMOND objected to the enormous increase to the county rates which the measure would cause.—The Bill was read a second time, on the understanding that it will go no further this session.—The Timber Ships Bill, the Ecclesiastical Union (Ireland) Bill, and the Dog-stealing Bill, were read a second time; and Lord Denman's Administration of Criminal Justice Bill was committed and amended.

Tuesday.—Lord BROUGHAM gave notice, for Monday next, to move an address to the Queen, praying Her Majesty to order the new Houses of Parliament to be made ready for occupation, with temporary fittings, by the beginning of the next session, and to give instruction to have the buildings rendered fire-proof. The noble and learned lord asked if the office of Advocate-General of Bengal had as yet been filled.—The Earl of RIPON replied that he had no official information on the subject, and added that it was very difficult to find competent persons to take it.—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH remarked that this office, which was thus going a begging, was worth, to a competent person, between 10,000*l.* and 11,000*l.* a year; and complained that the last holder of it, though laudably zealous in the discharge of his duties, was the very worst advocate in the courts. The only reason he ever heard assigned for his appointment was, that he was the son of the chairman of the Court of Directors. Lord Ellenborough hoped this last appointment would not be made a precedent.—The Earl of RIPON stated, as a curious matter of fact, that the appointment had been offered to 8 or 10 learned gentlemen, and had been refused by them all.—On the motion of Lord KINNAIRD, the Assessment of Wages (Scotland) Bill passed through committee.—The Earl of ABERDEEN laid on the table a copy of the treaty of commerce, trade, and manufacture, between Her Majesty and the King of the Two Sicilies.—On the motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, the Drainage by Tenants for Life Bill passed through committee.—In reply to the Earl of CLANCARTY, Lord STANLEY said that Government was not this session prepared to propose any alteration in the law relating to medical charities, and the relief of the poor in Ireland.—The Documentary Evidence Bill was read a second time.

Thursday.—On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the Assessment of Wages (Scotland) Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of the Earl of ABERDEEN, the Brazil Slave-trade Treaty Bill was read a third time and passed.—The Duke of RICHMOND presented a petition from a superannuated superintendent of police, named Baker, complaining that an action had been brought against him by a Mr. Harlow, for evidence given before the select committee of their lord-ships' House, on the subject of gaming and gaming-houses.—The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that a select committee be appointed to search for precedents.—Lord CAMPBELL moved, as an amendment, that the plaintiff and his attorney be called to the bar of the House.—After a debate, shared in by Lords BROUGHAM, COTTENHAM, and DENMAN—the latter of whom assured the House that there was no disposition in the courts of justice to encourage actions provoking collision with Parliament, but hoped that the House would pause before denying to any subject of the Queen the opportunity of obtaining justice—there was a division, when Lord Campbell's amendment was rejected by 33 to 22.—The appointment of the select committee to search for precedents raised another debate, in which Lord STANLEY, the Earl of ELLENBOROUGH, and other peers, took part, after which the committee was nominated.—The Duke of RICHMOND having called attention to a certain petition against some proposed railway (the name of which he did not mention) in which it was alleged that 11 or 15 names of contractors or subscribers had been forged, moved for a committee to inquire into the circumstance. The motion was agreed to.—The Marquis of BREADALBANE presented petitions complaining of the conduct of certain landowners in Scotland in refusing to grant sites on any terms for the erection of churches for the use of congregations of the Free Church of Scotland—The Earl of CAWDOR and the Duke of BUCCLEUCH entered into explanations of their conduct, to prove that they had neither acted tyrannically nor intolerantly towards the Free Church.—The Duke of BUCCLEUCH said he had reason to complain of the manner in which these reverend gentlemen had gone about the country exciting the people by the strongest language. He had been held up to his own tenants as a godless tyrant, and denounced in that character at the administration of the sacrament by those persons among his own tenants and servants. With respect, however, to the charge of refusing sites for the Free Church, he had decided on each case as it arose, and on its own merits. He had refused a site in the parish of Cannobie because there was a Free Church in the next parish, which was not half full; and he had directed his agent to make arrangements to prevent the administration of the sacrament on the road-side.—On the motion of the Earl of St. GERMANS, the Ecclesiastical Unions (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.—A petition presented by the Earl of CHICHESTER, from the Church Missionary Society, gave rise to a short discussion on the subject of New Zealand. Lord STANLEY said that it was the fixed determination of the Government to maintain inviolate the treaty by which the sovereignty of New Zealand was ceded to the British Crown. His interpretation of the treaty of Waitangi was, that, except with the intelligent assent of the natives, the Crown had no right to take possession of the land; and having no such right, it had neither the right nor the power of handing over to others that which it did not possess.—The Foreign Lotteries Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—Several Railway Bills were advanced, amongst others the Dublin and Galway, which was passed.—Mr. BAINES presented a petition from Messrs. Scott, shipbuilders, Greenock, praying that certain officers of the House might be allowed to attend in the Court of Common Pleas, to identify the person of the hon. member for Cheltenham (Mr. Craven Berkeley) against whom an action had been brought in that Court. The hon. member moved that the officers have leave to attend.—Mr. BERNAL objected to granting so extraordinary a prayer, and explained the circumstances out of which the motion against Mr. Berkeley rose. He said that the hon. member for Cheltenham's name had been placed without his consent on the list of Directors of the Glasgow and Greenock Steam Navigation Company, and the action was brought for the recovery of the cost and expenses of a steam-ship, built at Glasgow to the order of this company.—Mr. C. BERKELEY denied that he had at any time, either directly or indirectly, sanctioned the adoption of his name as a director of the company. He had been invited to subscribe and act as a director, and had given a distinct and positive refusal. The use of his name was therefore without his knowledge or authority. He was quite ready to assist as far as lay in his power to a full and searching inquiry into all the circumstances of the case.—Sir G. CLERK thought the prayer of this petition was quite unprecedented. There had occurred cases in which the evidence of officers of the House was necessary in Courts of Justice, and the House had always permitted them to attend, but this was a peculiar case in which the attendance of officers of the House was sought to identify an hon. member which identification could easily be procured by other means. He feared that the petition had some covert object, and as the case was not altogether free from suspicion, he would suggest that the motion be negatived.—The motion was then put and negatived without a division.—In reply to Mr. BOUVERIE and Mr. SHEIL,—Sir T. FREMANTLE stated that he had received an account of an affray which had occurred in the neighbourhood of Cork, between the police and some people assembled on the evening of a fair day. He regretted to say that the accounts which had been published in the papers were substantially correct. Several lives had been sacrificed, but whether the police were to blame or not he could give no opinion. He trusted it would be found that they were not, but had merely fired in self-defence, their lives being in imminent danger. An attempt had been made to rescue a prisoner in custody for rioting; the police had taken him into a house, which the mob attacked, demolishing the doors and windows, and at last the police fired in self-defence. Should the Coroner's inquest not search the matter sufficiently, Government would institute a special investigation.—On the motion of Lord LINCOLN, the order was read for the committal of the Commons Enclosure Bill.—On the question that the Speaker leave the chair, Mr. S. CRAWFORD brought forward his amendment for the postponement of the Bill till next session. He looked upon it as a measure intended for the protection and advancement of landowners and lords of manors. It gave every security for the rights of landlords, none for the rights of the poor; on the contrary, it offered a bribe to the present holders of small common rights to sell that which they had no right to sell—namely, the privileges of future generations. He denied that the poor benefitted by the employment occasioned by inclosures, and contended that that employment was at best merely temporary, and that in the long run it was not productive of benefit, but of substantial injury to the poor. Ten millions of acres were liable to be legislated upon by this Bill, and he therefore contended that it was incumbent on the House to consider most carefully, whether it was adopting the best means for that purpose. Such an extent of land ought not to be thrown out of the hands of the House into the hands of any body of Commissioners. There were 161 clauses in this Bill. Was it fair that a Bill of such importance should be taken into consideration at the present late period of the session? He thought not; and, therefore, looking upon it as a measure most unjust to the poor, he moved that it be committed this day three months.—Colonel SIBTHORP seconded the amendment. He objected to constituting another board of Commissioners, being fully impressed with the conviction that no good had been conferred upon the country either by the Poor Law Commissioners, the Tithe Commissioners, or other body of Commissioners appointed within the last 16 years.—Lord WORSLEY defended the course which he had pursued on this question since he had first taken it up in 1837. He gave a history of the Bills which he had introduced upon this subject in 1842 and 1843, and of the changes subsequently introduced into them by the committee to which they had been referred. Having explained the circumstances under which the present Bill was introduced into the House by Lord Lincoln with his full consent, he proceeded to observe that it would be necessary to make several alterations in it, in order to enable it to work well. He should therefore be very sorry if the Bill were not allowed to go into committee during the present session.—Mr. HUME felt it necessary to oppose this Bill and to support the amendment. There were interests so large connected with this Bill that he was surprised its passing should be considered as a mere matter of course. All lands worth enclosing were already enclosed; if not, let each case of inclosure be decided by the House, not by a body of Commissioners, on its own merits. The Bill was nothing but a landlord's Bill, and it took from the labouring man the advantages of air and exercise which he enjoyed at present upon the commons of the kingdom. He objected to the measure on principle, and was certain that if it were passed into law it would be injurious, both morally, physically, and socially, to the population at large.—Mr. TRELAWNEY denied that this was a landlord's Bill. He admitted that there were several parts of it which were objectionable, but he thought that they might be amended in committee.—Mr. HENLEY supported the motion for a committee.—Lord PALMERSTON intended to give his support to the general clauses of the Bill, but reserved to himself the right of making some alterations in them in committee. He differed from Mr. Hume on the point that this was a landlord's Bill, and considered it to be a Bill peculiarly beneficial to the interests of the agricultural labourer. There were 30,000,000 acres of uninclosed land in England and Wales, of which it was expected that 10,000,000 would fall under the purview of this Bill. He calculated that the inclosure of every 50 acres would give additional employment for one labourer and his family; and if so, when the whole of the waste land was enclosed, it would give support to 200,000 additional labourers with their wives and families. He viewed the Bill with great satisfaction, and thought that it ought to be entitled, a Bill for the better support of the agricultural labourers in England and Wales.—Lord LINCOLN observed, that Mr. Hume alone was opposed to the principle of this Bill, and if his objections were just, he ought to object to enclosure Bills altogether. There was nothing objectionable in the principle of this Bill which was not equally objectionable in that of every private enclosure Bill ever passed. It did not infringe on the rights of the poor; on the contrary, it provided more fully than had ever been done by private legislation for the preservation of every right which could possibly exist. In many cases hitherto the rights of property had not been sufficiently preserved, and why? Because they had hitherto been adjudicated on by committees of that House, and because the poor had no means of appearing before them. If the course proposed in this Bill should be adopted, the claims of the poor would be investigated at a very small expense. It would also reduce the expense of enclosure Bills to one-tenth of their present amount; for all the enclosures which the Commissioners recommended would be contained in their annual report, and would be incorporated in one general public Bill. If the Commissioners infringed any rights of property in their report, every gentleman in the House would have the power of noticing it when the Bill came before the House, and of moving that that particular enclosure should be struck out of the Bill when it went into committee. He then defended the details of the Bill at considerable length, and concluded by recommending it to the favourable consideration of the House.—The House divided on Mr. S. CRAWFORD'S amendment, when there appeared—Ayes, 11; noes, 121. It was accordingly negatived, and the House resolved itself into committee.—The remainder of the evening was consumed in discussing the early clauses in the bill. On arriving at the 33d clause, the Chairman was directed to report progress and to ask leave to sit again. The Foreign Lotteries Bill was read a third time and passed.—The Turnpike Trusts (South Wales) Bill, and the Constables Public Works (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.—On the motion of the Earl of LINCOLN, leave was given to bring in a Bill to empower the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to appropriate the area of Darby-court, in the parish of St. James's, Westminster, for building purposes.—On the motion of Mr. BOUVERIE, leave was given to bring in a Bill to abolish deodands.

Monday.—A new writ was ordered to issue for Cambridge, in the room of Mr. FITZROY KELLY, appointed Solicitor-General.—Sir R. PEEL stated the course he means to pursue relative to the numerous Bills brought in by Government and still before Parliament, and those that are yet to be introduced. Beginning with railway measures, the Premier said that before the end of the week Sir G. Clerk would lay on the table a minute of the Board of Trade, suggesting an alteration in the functions exercised by that Board on railway matters during the present year. The Board will still require that all Bills connected with the subject of railways be laid before them, and they will report to Parliament whether any peculiar public injuries will necessarily be inflicted by the passing of such Bills; but the Board of Trade will be relieved from the duty of deciding on their comparative merit. The right hon. baronet announced that Sir F. Smith, Professor Barlow, and Professor Airy, had been appointed to consider and give their opinion upon the question of uniformity of gauge. Sir R. Peel, having disposed of the railway measures, said that he was resolved to proceed with the Irish Colleges Bill, giving it precedence over everything else. Then he intended to go on with the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill, then the Jewish Disabilities Bill, then a great number of English and Irish Bills to which there is no opposition. The measures which he said he was obliged to postpone were the Physic and Surgery Bill, the Justices' Clerks Bill, Clerks of Petty Sessions Bill, Parochial Settlement Bill, Merchant Seamen's Fund Bill, and the Charitable Trusts Bill, &c. He hoped, he said, to carry the Commons Enclosure Bill, by devoting to it the morning sittings. Respecting the Landlord and Tenants Bill, he gave an evasive answer. A Bill to consolidate the existing Customs Acts is yet to be introduced. Touching the Irish Registration of Voters and Municipal Amendment Bills, the Premier said he was not to blame for not having brought them forward this session, having had so many more important measures to carry.—Lord J. RUSSELL said he would have proceeded with the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill if Sir R. Peel would have given up a sufficient number of Government days; but as he would not, it appeared to him that no good purpose would be answered by pressing the Bill this session to a second reading.—On the motion of Mr. DIVETT, Mr. David Phillips, Surgeon of Totness, the plaintiff in the action against Mr. Jasper Parrott, for evidence given before the select committee on the Medical Relief Bill, was called to the bar and examined. He said that Mr. Parrott had made a statement respecting him before the Committee on Medical Relief, which was not only false, but as he believed maliciously false. He had lost in consequence all his parish business; but could not say how far he had suffered in his private practice. He had endeavoured to obtain redress both from the board of guardians at Totness and from the Poor Law Commissioners in London; but ineffectually. He had therefore brought this action for words spoken before the Committee, coupled with words spoken by Mr. Parrott before the board of Guardians at Totness. In so doing he had no intention to offend against the privileges of the House. He was sorry if he had infringed them; and if he had done so he had done it unintentionally. He was now aware that he had been guilty of a breach of privilege, and was willing to let the House take such steps as it might think fitting for the protection of his character. He was sharply cross-examined, for the purpose of extracting from him an admission that the action was brought solely upon the words spoken before the committee; and the declaration was put into his hands for that purpose. The witness, however, either was or appeared ignorant of the legal effect of the declaration which he admitted had been read over to him.—A very long and desultory discussion respecting the course to be adopted for the vindication of the privileges of the House ensued, of which it would be useless to attempt a summary; and at last Mr. Phillips and his attorneys, Mr. Charles Edwards, of Totness, and Mr. Thomas Baker, of Lime-street, having severally declared their contrition and promised to take no further steps in the prosecution of the action, were dischaged from custody.—On the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, the House then went into committee on the Colleges (Ireland) Bill.—On the 14th clause Sir T. D. ACLAND moved the addition of this proviso:—"Provided always, that any person appointed to be president, vice-president, or member of the governing body of each of such colleges shall, before he enters upon the duties of any of the said offices, make and subscribe the following declaration:—'I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare that I acknowledge and receive the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as containing the revealed will of Almighty God.'"—Sir R. INGLIS, Mr. COWPER, and Lord J. MANNERS supported the amendment. It was opposed by Sir J. GRAHAM, Sir R. PEEL, and Mr. GLADSTONE, all of whom expressed regret at being obliged to oppose a motion proposed by an hon. member for whom they had so high a respect and regard. The committee divided on it—For the amendment, 36; against it, 105; majority, 69.—Mr. HINDLEY moved the rejection of the clause altogether, and divided the committee—For the clause, 100; against it, 0; majority, 100. The remaining clauses, with some amendments, and the preamble of the Bill, were agreed to.—Sir T. FREMANTLE obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Fishery Act, a Bill to amend the Grand Jury Act for Ireland, and a Bill to continue the Unlawful Oaths Act for two years more, but omitting the clause which made it an offence for persons to have in their possession pass-words, or other insignia of unlawful societies, without being able to account for them.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws regarding the criminal jurisdiction of the assistant barristers in Ireland.

Tuesday.—The House sat from noon to 4 o'clock in committee on the Commons Enclosure Bill, and clauses down to 69, inclusive, were agreed to.—After an hour's respite, the House resumed its sittings, and several Railway and private Bills were forwarded.—Mr. WARBURTON presented a petition from Mr. C. Berkeley, praying the House to allow its officers to attend as witnesses in the case in which he is sued by the Messrs. Scott. The prayer of the petitioner was granted.—Lord PALMERSTON moved for a return of the names and description of the witnesses examined before the mixed British and French commission, appointed to inquire into the best means for suppressing the slave-trade; and of copies or extracts of the evidence given by those witnesses. The noble lord at great length expatiated on his efforts to put down the slave-trade by treaty or otherwise, and contended that had the right of search conventions of 1831 and 1833 been maintained, and had not Spain, and Portugal, and Brazil, systematically, scandalously, and dishonourably violated their engagements, slavery would now be at an end. He condemned the treaty just concluded with France, as abrogating for ever the mutual right of search between the two countries, without substituting anything equivalent for accomplishing the purpose which England and France professed to desire. He valued the right of search as the most efficacious means of putting down the slave-trade. He charged the Government with having pusillanimously yielded to the bullying of France. It was said there was an equivalent in the arrangement made that the two squadrons, one English and the other French, were to guard the West coast of Africa. The Right of Search was much more extensive. It extended to the West Indies, the Brazils, to Africa, and a certain limit round the Isle of Madagascar. The present arrangement was confined to the West of Africa; and even in respect to this it would be ineffective, unless the English and French contrived to move together like Siamese twins, and hunted in couples. Lord Palmerston vehemently condemned the wording of the preamble. The preamble of the treaty stated that, "Whereas the Queen of Great Britain and the King of the French, considering that the convention of the 20th Nov., 1831, and the 22d March, 1833, have effected their object in preventing the use of the English and French flags in carrying on the slave-trade, but finding that this odious traffic still exists." Was it meant to be said, and had a British Plenipotentiary put his name to a declaration, that the British slave-trade had not been put down? It was a grievous calumny on this country to say so. He was astonished that any person should have put his name to the false and calumnious imputation which it threw upon the country. The ninth article said that the slave-trade should be put an end to in the colonies. Could any one read that article and say that the slave-trade did not exist in the British colonies? What other meaning could be attached to it but that there was in the British Parliament and British nation such a desire for the re-enactment of slavery in the colonies, that it was necessary for the Crown to interpose? The noble lord having asserted that, in this as well as in all other parts of their foreign policy, the Government had exhibited weakness or assumed a low tone, said he was not prepared to move any resolution condemnatory of their conduct, because he knew he would be left in a minority, but was determined to press for the evidence he required, believing as he did that that evidence went to prove the necessity for a right of search as a means for effectually crushing the slave-trade.—Sir R. PEEL taunted Lord Palmerston with not having brought forward a resolution, instead of merely moving for papers. The fear of being left in a minority was not a motive that would deter men who had strong feelings on any subject from recording them in a solemn form. After replying to the multifarious topics introduced by Lord Palmerston in his speech, Sir R. Peel came to the immediate question of the late convention. He said:—"I have no apology on the part of the Government to offer for this convention. I believe that it was a prudent measure. I believe that it is calculated to produce a more cordial and efficacious co-operation on the part of France to put down the slave-trade than would have taken place under our former treaties. The noble lord has adverted to the refusal of France to ratify the treaty of 1841. But is he under the opinion that the refusal to ratify that treaty after it was signed on the part of France was a case of war? The noble lord has expressed no such opinion. He says that, after the refusal on the part of France to ratify the treaty, we submitted. Now that is not the case. I agree with the noble lord that the refusal to ratify the treaty was an unprecedented act, but I also agree that, although an unprecedented act, it was not a case to provoke warfare between the two countries. But the reason why the treaty was not ratified was that the Executive Government, controlled by the popular opinion and the opinion of the popular assembly in France, had not the power to ratify it." He denied that there was anything in the preamble of the treaty disgraceful to this country. In his own convention of 1831 Lord Palmerston had committed precisely the same error, if it were an error, which he charged Ministers with having committed in the convention of 1845, as he proved by reading its preamble. He also defended the ninth article of the treaty from the attack which had been made upon it, and showed that it merely meant that in carrying on the slave-trade in future the subjects of either power would not only be guilty of an offence against the municipal law of their respective countries, but also against a solemn engagement made between the two countries. The provisions of the convention of 1845, applying to a line of coast extending from 10 to 16 degrees of south latitude, were on that account geographically superior to those of the previous conventions. If to this consideration was added another, that they would be carried into effect with the cordial co-operation of France, he thought that there could be little doubt that we had now a more powerful instrument for the suppression of the slave-trade than we had under the defective convention of Lord Palmerston. He then proceeded to state, that in withholding the evidence for which his lordship had moved, he did not withhold it because it proved the importance of the right of search, but because the evidence of the eight officers (five English and three French), examined before the mixed commission, referred to matters which it might not be consistent with the interests of the public service to publish. He was, therefore, compelled to adhere to the answer which he had given on a former occasion to the noble lord, and to refuse the publication of this evidence. In conclusion Sir R. Peel called upon the House to bear in mind that this treaty had been signed by the Duke de Broglie and Dr. Lushington—men standing high for talent, integrity, and humanity, and distinguished throughout their lives for their persevering and vigorous efforts to combat and control this abominable crime of dealing in the blood and sinews of our unfortunate fellow-creatures. Those two gentlemen had signed this treaty, which no consideration in the world would have induced them to sign, had they not been convinced that they were placing in the hands of their respective Governments the most efficacious instrument for the suppression of the slave-trade.—Mr. SHEIL thought that instead of drawing comparisons between the merits of the conventions of 1831 and of 1845, and of passing eulogiums on the public services of Dr. Lushington and the Duke de Broglie, it would have been better had Sir R. Peel noticed Lord Palmerston's assertion, that the evidence given by the naval officers before the mixed commission established this point—that the right of search was indispensable to the suppression of the slave-trade. He then entered into a minute criticism on the details of the present convention, and denounced it as a treaty which was giving France a home upon the deep, and was domesticating her upon the ocean. He considered it likely to lead to a collision between the two countries, if the greatest discretion and caution were not exercised by the officers of the two squadrons.—Sir R. INGLIS admitted that Sir Peel had upon the whole, given a successful answer to the animadversions of Lord Palmerston on this treaty; but felt that the objections which his Lordship had urged against the preamble of it had been well sustained, and had not been refuted. He also thought that the ninth article of the treaty had not been explained in a manner capable of protecting it against the comments of Lord Palmerston, and therefore he could not refrain from expressing his regret that the name of Sir R. Peel was subscribed to it. It had been said that the House could not have expected so large a discussion on so small a motion; but he contended that on a motion like the present Lord Palmerston had a right to enter into a review of the proceedings of the British Government with respect to slavery in every part of the world. He then proceeded to call the attention of the Government to the revival, or rather to the creation of slavery in our colony of Sierra Leone, under the pretence of encouraging voluntary emigration to our West Indian colonies. He understood that the liberated negroes were now placed in a stone-yard at Sierra Leone, and that they were there left open to the solicitations of emigration agents from Trinidad, Jamaica, and our other colonies, where there was a demand for labour. He had hoped that a stop would be put to such a practice.—Sir CHARLES NAPIER condemned the policy of this treaty. The right of visit would be found as obnoxious as the right of search, and would create before long as much irritation in France. He considered this treaty to be very likely to lead to numerous collisions between the officers of the two squadrons.—Mr. B. HOPE regretted that Sir R. Inglis had introduced into this debate the condition of the liberated negroes of Sierra Leone. He could neither assent to the facts of Sir R. Inglis, nor to the deductions which he had drawn from them. He repeated what he had stated on a former occasion—that the liberated Africans could provide better for themselves in the West Indies than they could in Sierra Leone. There was a deficiency of employment at Sierra Leone, which often compelled the liberated negroes to seek work in the neighbourhood, and whilst there they were often recaptured by the native chiefs, and again sent into slavery. In the West Indies they were well-paid, well-fed, and, if they were so disposed, religiously educated.—After a few words from Captain PECHELL, Lord PALMERSTON briefly replied. After denying that he had ever spoken disparagingly of France, he proceeded to answer the arguments of Sir R. Peel, and to confirm his former statements. He was willing to make a bargain with Sir R. Peel. He would be perfectly content if Sir R. Peel would give him the name of the witnesses examined, and extracts from such parts of their evidence as related to the value of the mutual right of search as an instrument for suppressing the slave-trade. If Ministers objected to this modification of his original motion, he should take the sense of the House upon it.—Sir R. PEEL intimated his dissent from this offer.—The House divided, when 51 voted for the motion, and 94 against it.—Mr. GRIFFITH then brought up the report on the Colleges (Ireland) Bill.—Mr. WYSE proposed a resolution for annexing the new Colleges to the University of Dublin under the conditions of the Irish Act of 1793.—After a few remarks from Sir J. GRAHAM and Mr. SHAW, the resolution was negatived. The report was then agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Thursday. The Field Gardens Bill was read a third time and passed.

Wednesday.—The House had a morning sitting for the purpose of considering in committee the Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics Bill, which, after a discussion of about six hours, in a very thin House, was carried through committee, and ordered to be reported on Friday.—At the afternoon sitting Sir J. Duckworth took the oaths and his seat for Exeter.—Mr. Rutherford being unavoidably absent, the second reading of his Scotch Universities Bill was moved by Mr. MACAULAY, who stated that its object was to abolish tests in the Scotch Universities. By the union between Scotland and England, the integrity of the Scotch Established Church was secured, one of the conditions being the imposition of the tests required from the professors in the universities. But in 1712 the British Legislature passed an act, almost surreptitiously, at least without the knowledge of the people of Scotland, by which the presentation to livings was restored to lay patrons; and from this act has sprung all the schisms and distractions which have disturbed the Scottish Church, down to that great disruption which has occurred in our own time, when 470 ministers threw up their manses, and with a large majority of the people founded the Free Church of Scotland. By the strict letter of the contract of the union the tests were requisite; but, in spirit, it was otherwise. Were the old fathers of 1707 to re-appear, they would recognise the Church of Dr. Chalmers as the Church of the act of union. By the enforcement of the tests, they would shut out from the universities more than one-half of the Presbyterian people of Scotland. What was the object of these tests? They were described as being for "the glory of God, the safety of the Church, and the prosperity of the university." It was not the first time that the "glory of God" was made a pretext for the injustice and the temerity of man; and as to the safety of the Church and the prosperity of the University, were either promoted by tests which made Dr. Chalmers a schismatic, and which shut out Sir David Brewster from St. Andrew's? He emphatically called on those around him to remember that on the decision of that night depended whether or not there was established a rival College, endowed by that great body whose munificence and enthusiasm had already been so signally displayed. At present such were the temptations and prizes in other pursuits, that there was found a difficulty in obtaining eminent men to fill the University chairs. Throw out this Bill; let a rival institution be founded; diminish the pupils and the resources of the universities; and they would see mere pedagogues—the shallowest "dominies"—filling the chairs of Adam Smith, Dugald Stewart, Black, Leslie, and Playfair. The Government in supporting tests in this instance opposed their own arguments in refusing to introduce them in their new Irish Colleges. Now, what could the country think of a Minister who one day came to the House and asked it to establish colleges without tests; and, yet, on another day, came and asked them to impose tests, which had fallen into disuse, with greater strictness than ever, and for the purpose of excluding those whom the tests were originally introduced to protect? A Government which like the present, was guided by no principle whatever; which on great questions did not know its own mind from one week to another; which was tossed about from one side to another like a reed shaken by the wind; which was against tests at Limerick, for tests at Edinburgh; against tests at Belfast, for tests at Glasgow; which was against tests on Monday, for tests on Tuesday, and against them again on Wednesday—it was impossible that such a Government could command public respect or confidence. Was it strange that such a Government should be fast losing the confidence of one-half of the people, without making the least progress towards the confidence of the other half? Turning to those around him, he called on them to stand by him in this day of danger, threatening ruin to the universities of Scotland; and concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.—Sir J. GRAHAM was in favour, as a general principle, of tests, as a security for theological integrity, though he was opposed to their application in Ireland, on account of the peculiar circumstance of the country. In England and Scotland, the clergy of the respective establishments were taken from the universities; in Ireland, those of one church were taken from Maynooth, Trinity College supplied the establishment, and the new colleges which they were about to found were for the mixed education of the laity. The university tests in Scotland were not directed against episcopacy, but against Socinianism, Arianism, and the errors of Popery; and though they had fallen into disuse for about half a century, yet as far back as 1808 no less than 25 professors out of 31 had subscribed in the University of Edinburgh, while in the other four universities the tests had been enforced since 1690. He feared that under the existing circumstances of Scotland, sectarian education in that country was now inevitable. The tests prescribed by statute were intended for the security of the Established Church, the destruction of which was the undisguised object of the Free Church party, and the Government acting for the Crown, in the maintenance of existing institutions, could not do anything to endanger the Church. By law, compact, and experience, they were bound to oppose the Bill. He therefore moved as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day three months. —Mr. J. WORTLEY reviewed the legal and constitutional portion of the question, and opposed the Bill.—Sir G. GREY urged the impolicy of maintaining these tests, which he illustrated by adducing the case of the late Sir D. Sandford, who though an Episcopalian, was Greek Professor in the University of Glasgow. By enforcing them, sectarian differences would be perpetuated and aggravated with fatal effect on the future welfare of the community. –Sir R. H. INGLIS and Mr. PRINGLE both advocated the necessity and obligation of maintaining the tests. —Mr. C. BULLER contrasted the policy pursued by Government with respect to tests in Ireland and Scotland, which he regarded as not merely inconsistent but mischievous.—The LORD ADVOCATE recapitulated the reasons which have induced the Government to oppose the Bill; and after some remarks from Mr. P. M. STEWART, Sir ROBERT PEEL denied that the principle on which the Government had proceeded, in proposing academical institutions in Ireland, was necessarily applicable to other parts of the United Kingdom. In these projected colleges, their object was a good secular education for the laity, free from sectarian conditions; but that was wholly different from interfering with ancient institutions from which the established churches of the respective countries received their clergy. The universities of Scotland were, by compact and statute, connected with its Established Church, and the abolition of the required tests would not only be a violation of the act of union, but equivalent to declaring that in Scotland there shall be no establishment whatever. He would not consider Parliament precluded from entertaining the question, if the majority of the people of Scotland were disposed in favour of a change: but national compacts were not lightly to be broken, when there was no feeling manifested by the people in the presentation of petitions. Since the Bill had been introduced, the General Assembly had addressed the House against it; and Government felt themselves bound to give their support to the maintenance of the tests.—Lord J. RUSSELL pointed out the humiliating dilemma in which Government had placed themselves. Hitherto tests had been advocated as matters of principle, or condemned as snares for scrupulous consciences; but the Government adopted neither the one principle nor the other, but manifested an utter indifference on the subject. He contended that these tests, whilst they were nothing but cobwebs to some, were no guards against either atheism or infidelity. Bolingbroke, Hume, and Gibbon, all of whom were infidels, had not scrupled to take the sacrament when the sacrament was the passport to office, and yet they were all three good Tory authors and good Tory supporters of Church and State. Sir R. Peel had told the House that he would not accede to the abolition of these tests, because there was no feeling of the people of Scotland in its favour. The argument that the General Assembly had petitioned against the Bill had little weight, seeing the petition came from the party interested, that portion of the clergy who were the excluding body. He entreated the House not to permit the Government to lead them to palter with great principles, but to decide on the second reading of the Bill according to merits rather than expediency.—On a division there appeared –For the second reading of the Bill, 108; Against it, 116; Majority, 8. The narrowness of the majority by which the Bill was lost, caused a loud burst of cheering from the Opposition benches. —Mr. WATSON then moved that the House go into committee on the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the object of which is to remove from the statute-book those penal enactments which still stand unrepealed against Roman Catholics. — Sir J. GRAHAM urged the lateness of the hour, and the absence of the law officers of the Crown, as a reason for not at present proceeding with the Bill. He was favourable to its principle, but the details required great legal knowledge and attention. The Government have requested the criminal law commissioners to prepare the draft of a Bill for effecting the required object; this Bill is in progress, and will probably be introduced next session.—After some debate, there was a division, when the Bill was rejected by a majority of 42.

Thursday.—The House met at noon, and went into committee on the Commons Enclosure Bill, the remaining clauses of which were agreed to.—At the five o'clock sitting, the third reading of the Irish Colleges Bill having been moved, Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE, in a speech of some length, moved "that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry to be made into the amount of the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, from rents of college lands, endowments, and bequests, fees on matriculation on taking degrees, and from every other source; also, into the manner in which that income is expended, the number of senior and junior fellows, of professors, scholars, and all other officers of the college, with the amount of salary and allowances to each of them, with a view to ascertain whether the income or funds at present applied solely to the benefit of Protestants in Trinity College, Dublin, might not be beneficially extended, so as to make Roman Catholics and Protestant Dissenters eligible, if otherwise qualified to all scholarships, and to all such fellowships, professorships, and other offices in Trinity College, Dublin, as are not intended for ecclesiastical purposes, or immediately connected with ecclesiastical endowment."—Mr. BELLEW seconded the amendment.—Sir T. FREMANTLE opposed the motion, on the ground that no abuse or misappropriation of funds has been alleged, and that the advantages of Trinity College for the purposes of education were as open to Catholics as to Protestants. The allegation that Government in refusing to sanction an inquiry into the funds of Trinity College, were maintaining Protestant ascendancy, was as unreasonable as the imputation that they were promoting Catholic ascendancy by increasing the endowment of Maynooth, where no Protestant could be educated at all.—After some observations from Mr. REDINGTON, Mr. HAMILTON expressed his satisfaction that Government were resolved to resist the motion. The circumstances under which Trinity College had been founded, rendered it ridiculous to suppose that it was intended for any other purpose than the promotion, in Ireland, of the Protestant religion.—Mr. WARBURTON remarked that all instruction in the liberal arts and sciences was prohibited by the charter of Trinity College, in any part of Ireland except within the college walls, unless by special license from the Crown. It was, therefore, evident that the founders of Trinity College contemplated it as sufficient for the academical necessities of Ireland, and under these circumstances, it was not unreasonable to ask for an inquiry, in order to ascertain if the means of the college were really sufficient for the purpose for which it was established.—Sir R. H. INGLIS replied that no necessity existed for the inquiry, as it was in the power of the Crown, on the advice of its confidential advisers, to correct whatever might be found in the institution at variance with the objects for which it was established.—Mr. HUME, Mr. LEFROY, Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL, and Mr. SHAW, took part in the debate. The latter argued that it was mere quibbling with words to suppose that Queen Elizabeth, whose sovereignty was denied by the Catholics, could have established Trinity College for any other than Protestant purposes. Yet at present seven of the fellowships were open to Roman Catholics, and one was actually held by a Catholic.—Mr. SHEIL criticised the conduct of Government, in neither consulting with nor attending to the representations of the Roman Catholic prelates in founding these colleges. Their demands were deemed unreasonable; yet in Trinity College the professors of metaphysics, geology, and anatomy, were required to be Protestants. Ireland contained 8 millions of Catholics, yet there was no one Catholic in office who could represent to the Government their feelings and wishes—it was otherwise when the Whigs were in power. The argument that intention and prescription required Trinity College for Protestant purposes, was the one which had been set aside in the cases of Lady Hewley's Charities and the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. Lord Bacon laid it down that we should tolerate the Catholics; and his sentiments ought to be taken as conclusive of the intentions of the founders of Trinity College. In the Government of Ireland there was nothing they should be so much afraid of as fear. He claimed for the Catholics full, unmodified equality, civil and ecclesiastical; and he warned them that their refusal of this just demand might create such an insurrectionary spirit in Ireland, which, though doubtless it would be put down, would only secure a tranquillity with which desolation was associated, and the conversion of one of the finest islands of the world into a solitude. –Sir R. PEEL considered that their best answer to Mr. Sheil's impassioned declamation was the fact of their having introduced measures on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Ireland which were opposed to the conscientious feelings of a majority of the people of this country. In establishing these colleges, they had adhered so completely to the principle of perfect equality, as to refuse any supremacy to that Established Church with which their predilections were associated; and in spite of the appalling picture of possible dangers presented to them, he believed that they had succeeded in satisfying the moderate portion of the Roman Catholic body. He refused to interfere with Trinity College. Its revenue was about 25,000*l.*—a less sum than they had permanently assigned as an annual grant to Maynooth. Admitting the ability of the speech of Mr. Osborne, he critised the terms of his motion as not being very intelligible; and Mr. OSBORNE having observed across the table, that he was not responsible for it, not having drawn it up, Sir R. Peel made the House merry by amusing comments on this disclaimer of the authorship of such an enigmatical production. He concluded by expressing his strong desire to see peace and harmony established in Ireland, for which he was willing to make any sacrifice. After remarks from Sir V. BLAKE and Colonel SIBTHORPE, Lord J. RUSSELL said he was in favour of opening Trinity College. He considered the comparison between Trinity College and Maynooth as incomplete and invalid. He admitted the difficulties in the way of Ministers, of which not the least was their former acts and professions. He supported the amendment, but not with the view of opposing the third reading of the Irish Colleges Bill, which, however imperfect, he should support. On a divison there appeared—For the amendment, 91; against it, 168; majority, 77. On the question that the Bill be read a third time, Sir R. INGLIS moved, as an amendment, that it be read a third time that day three months. This amendment being informal, it was put as a simple negative to the third reading. After some remarks from Lord EBRINGTON, the third reading of the Bill was carried by 177 to 26, and the Bill then passed. The Drainage (Ireland) Bill, the Joint-stock Company's Bill, the Coal Trade (Port of London) Bill, and the Art Unions (No. 2) Bill, were read a second time. The Bankruptcy Declaration Bill and the Merchant Seamen's Bill passed through committee.

The Suspension of the Rev. F. Oakeley.—There was an unusually large attendance at Margaret-street chapel on Sunday morning, partly in consequence of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust's order that Mr. Oakeley's suspension should be declared in the course of the service, and partly in consequence of a rumour that the Rev. W. U. Richards, the assistant-minister, would address the congation on the course of proceeding adopted by the Bishop of London. At 11 o'clock Mr. Richards came from the vestry-room into the chapel, accompanied by five or six little boys in surplices, all of whom, with the minister, stooped at the foot of the altar, and reverently bowed to a large wooden cross which was placed on the table. Prayers were read, the minister standing the whole time, even during the communion service, with his back to the congregation. At the close of the communion service, Mr. Richards ascended the pulpit in his surplice, and gave for his text the 11th chapter of St Mark, 5th verse, but the sermon contained no allusion to what has recently occurred. The offertory followed, the money being collected by the boys in purple purses, bearing in front a large cross. The prayer for the church militant concluded the service. At the close of the prayers, and, indeed, at every stage of the service, the congregation expected the reading of the order for suspension, but no intimation of the matter was given, and the only unusual thing was the absence of Mr. Oakeley himself.

The late Fire at Quebec.—A public meeting was held on Friday, at the London Tavern, the Lord Mayor in the chair, to contribute for the relief of the suffering inhabitants of Quebec. The Right Hon. Fox Maule, Mr. Pattison, M.P., Mr. Baring, M.P., Mr. Glyn, and other gentlemen addressed the meeting. Appropriate resolutions were adopted, and though the meeting was only thinly attended, a considerable sum was subscribed in the room.

The May Meetings.—An unusually large sum has been placed to the credit of the religious societies by the last May meetings. The following are the pecuniary results of the appeals made by the principal societies:—Church Missionary, 105,249*l.*; British and Foreign Bible, 85,817*l.*; London Missionary, 82,876*l.*; London Missionary (jubilee fund), 21,000*l.*; Religious Tract, 54,104*l.*; Wesleyan Missionary, 109,188*l.*; Colonial Missionary, 3388*l.*; Irish Evangelical, 2641*l.*; Foreign Aid, 5180*l.*; British Reformation, 1514*l.*; Home Missionary, 8600*l.*; Primitive Methodist Missionary, 2567*l.*; London City Mission, 9579*l.*; London School Union, 9561*l.*; British and Foreign Sailors, 2072*l.*

Her Majesty's Troop-ship Apollo.—We feel great pleasure in stating that the fears entertained last week respecting the safety of the Apollo, have proved to be premature, as will be seen from the enclosed letter received at the Admiralty yesterday. "Lloyds, July 11, 1845. Sir,—In further reply to the inquiry addressed to this office by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, on the 28th ult., I have the honour to subjoin an extract of a letter received this day from Liverpool, announcing the safe arrival of her Majesty's troop-ship Apollo, at Quebec, on the 14th ult., which intelligence I presume to have been brought by the ship Robinson, Wilburn, arrived yesterday at Liverpool. I have, &c., J. LODGE.—Capt. W. A. B. Hamilton, R.N."—(Extract.) "Liverpool, July 10.—Her Majesty's troop-ship Apollo, from Halifax, at Quebec, June 14."

Fairlop Fair.—Friday the 4th being the first Friday in July, the annual fair held on the spot where once stood the "Fairlop Oak," in Hainault Forest, took place according to annual custom, and owing to the fineness of the day many thousands from the metropolis and the populous villages on the borders of the forest attended it. The fair, which used formerly to extend to three days, the last being Sunday, is now confined to one, it being found that the charter under which it is held does not allow more. The Essex road presented a scene of much commotion from an early hour in the morning till late in the evening, by the numerous vehicles passing along—the miniature frigates of the blockmakers, shipwrights, and watermen's societies, each drawn by six horses, forming the principal attraction.

Sudden Turn of Fortune.—One of those sudden accessions of fortune that occasionally happen has lately occurred to a poor woman, named Caroline Boothby, living in Earl-street, Seven Dials, who has been discovered to be the rightful owner of valuable freehold property in the neighbourhood of Bethnal-green, and which she will in a short time be put in possession of, the estimated value being 30,000*l.* She was previously gaining a precarious living by needle-work, and at times was unable to procure the common necessaries of life.

Aeronautics. — On Monday evening Mr. Green ascended with his balloon, called the "Albion," from the garden of the Albert Saloon, at Hoxton. It was his third ascent this season, making on the whole, his 302d ascent. On this occasion he was accompanied by his father, now upwards of 70 years of age, and by the son of the proprietor of the tavern. The exhibition attracted many thousands of spectators to the fields and highways in the vicinity, and the gardens of the tavern were well filled. The balloon having attained a considerable altitude, bore away in a direction for Essex, where the travellers were landed in safety.

The Napoleon Museum.—The various items composing the Museum which has recently been exhibiting to the public under this title, have been sold by auction by Mr. Sainsbury, the proprietor. They comprised an endless collection of objects connected more or less with Napoleon's history, medals—orders, relics, articles of clothing, busts, enamels, &c. The prices fetched by the different lots were about one-fourth of what Mr. Sainsbury paid for them; and on the whole the sale failed to command good prices, notwithstanding the presumed interest of the objects.

Thunder Storm.—From 10 o'clock on Sunday night the heat, which was excessive during the day, gradually increased so as to become most oppressive, and the metropolis and its vicinity was visited with a thunder storm, the atmosphere being constantly illuminated with vivid flashes of sheet and forked lightning, while at intervals peals of distant thunder were heard. About three on Monday morning the whole southern hemisphere became dark with clouds charged with electricity, and the thunder was so frequent as to resemble the continual roar of artillery. At four o'clock the rain fell in torrents for about 10 minutes, and during that time the lightning, which was attended by heavy peals of distant thunder, was most vivid to the southward, after which the clouds dispersed, leaving the atmosphere much cooler and purer. The storm did not approach the northern suburban districts, but on the banks of the river, and in parts of Essex and Surrey, it was severely felt. The hailstones in some places were the size of marbles, and did an immense deal of damage amongst the hot and greenhouses. In Lord Saye and Sele's grounds at Erith, there were upwards of 4000 panes of glass broken. The storm appeared to come from the S. W., and to make a complete circuit to the E. and N. It visited Dorset and other western counties in the afternoon of Sunday, and increased in violence as it proceeded eastward. Considerable damage was done by the storm in parts of Worcestershire, and we have noticed its peculiar effects at Nottingham under our provincial news.

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending July 5:—West Districts, 123; Northern, 132; Central, 148; Eastern, 194; Southern, 206; Total, 803; males, 403; females, 400. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1245; males, 615; females, 630.

Gravesend.—A few nights since the letter-bags were abstracted from the post-office in this town shortly before the arrival of the mail; and, although every exertion has been made to trace them, and a reward of 50*l.* offered, no tidings of them have yet been obtained. The daily papers state that so greatly was the population of Gravesend increased by the influx of visitors on Sunday last, that the requisite quantity of food to supply the cravings of appetite could not be procured, and many persons had to leave without obtaining either dinner or tea. As a proof of the demand, ham was sold at 6*s.* per lb., and half-quartern loaves 6*d.* each.

Liverpool.—The steam-ship Great Britain, which sailed from Dublin on Thursday week, arrived in the Mersey the same night, amidst the cheers of assembled thousands, who went out in numerous steam-vessels for the purpose of accompanying this leviathan of the deep to the harbour. On Saturday, as there was a light spring-tide, a very short draught of water was necessary in order to get the Great Britain safely into the graving dock. After every exertion, by trimming coals, cables, anchors, &c., the ship was drawing 14 feet 8 aft, and 12 feet 6 forward. Captain Hosken, seeing this, immediately ordered a bolt to be taken out of the bow, allowing the foremost compartments to fill with water. This, in a short time, brought the ship to 14 feet aft, and 13 feet 1 forward, putting her in the trim required, and, at the same time, affording satisfactory proof of the utility and efficiency of the water-tight bulk-heads. Not a drop of water found its way into the adjoining compartment, though not less than 50 tons were allowed to enter at the bow of the vessel. She sails from Liverpool to New York on the 26th inst.

Nottingham.—The most terrific storm of lightning and rain that has been felt here for a long time past was experienced on Sunday evening. Shortly before 10, the heavens seemed to open in one immense stream, and poured down the water in a perfect torrent. The drains were filled immediately, the streets ran with one continuous current, and, having no vent, the water forced its way into the houses of the inhabitants, causing the most serious damage. For nearly an hour and a half this tremendous gush from the heavens continued. The first effects of the storm were felt in the lower parts of the town, where the kitchens of the inhabitants were immediately flooded, and the occupants were obliged to leave their houses. At the time the lightning was the most vivid, a party of men and women had assembled in a public-house, on Tollhouse-hill, and, during its vivid flashes, one man, named Greenwood, residing at Radford, kept continually uttering oaths, and wishing that the lightning might strike some of the women blind. Scarcely had he uttered the wish than a flash struck him to the earth. On being taken up, it was discovered he was totally blind. His eyes were completely turned up, and the whites only visible. He was removed to the hospital, where he now lies blind and dumb. The damage done to the crops, both of hay and corn, is immense. In the county of Nottingham immense tracts of land exhibit nothing but floating hay; corn is beaten down to the ground, and stacks drenched through. At Leicester, 30 miles off, not a drop of rain fell, while at Birmingham the flood was so great that fire-engines had to be at work all night to draw the water from the houses. At Derby the flood was very much felt, and throughout Lincolnshire, Staffordshire, and Suffolk, the storm raged with immense fury.

Portsmouth.—The experimental squadron, now lying at Spithead, will leave their anchorage on Tuesday next, and, under the command of Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, will proceed on their trial cruise to the Bay of Biscay. Her Majesty and Prince Albert will accompany the ships a short distance in the royal yacht. The Earl of Haddington, First Lord of the Admiralty, the Hon. H. T. L. Corry, the secretary, and one of the six lords of the Admiralty, will attend on Her Majesty in the Black Eagle steam yacht. Rear Admiral Bowles, C.B., one of the Lords of the Admiralty, with Commander Farquharson, and other officers, will attend the movements of the squadron in the Lightning, steam-tender. The Duke of Portland and the Duke of Devonshire have hired the Wonder, merchant steamer, for the occasion, and will be accompanied by Captain Sir W. Symonds. The Earl of Yarborough, the Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron, will go out with the fleet in his brigantine-yacht, the Kestrel, and the Earl of Wilton will also be present in his schooner-yacht the Xarifa. A number of other yachts belonging to the various squadrons will also assemble at Spithead on Tuesday, and the whole will doubtless form a brilliant spectacle. The Austrian Ambassador, family, and suite, accompanied by the Right Hon. L. Corry, principal secretary to the Admiralty, arrived on Friday afternoon to inspect the experimental squadron. They first proceeded on board the Excellent, Captain Sir T. Hastings, and witnessed the gun-drill, &c., after which they embarked in the Black Eagle, steam-yacht, and went out to Spithead, where they visited the flag-ship St. Vincent, 120, and the Trafalgar, 120, Captain Martin. On leaving the St. Vincent, the Austrian standard was run up at the fort, and a salute of 19 guns fired. From the Trafalgar his Excellency and party re-embarked in the Black Eagle, and proceeded to Cowes, and inspected the Royal yacht squadron, having been saluted by Commodore the Earl of Yarborough, in the Brigantine Kestrel. After remaining about an hour, the party returned to Spithead, and proceeded on board the Superb, 80, Captain Corry, with whom his Excellency and party dined, returning in the evening to Ryde. Baron Brunnow, the Russian Ambassador, remains on a visit at this port, and has taken a house for the season at Ryde.—The friends of Lieutenants Hawkey and Pym have given notice to the clerk of the Arraigns, that those gentlemen will surrender and take their trial for their alleged participation in the death of Mr. Seton at the present assizes at Winchester, which commenced on Thursday. Messrs. Crowther and Cockburn are retained for their defence. The prosecution is ex officio, under the charge of the Town-clerk, who has retained as counsel the Recorder of Portsmouth, Mr. Rawlinson.

Railways.

Mr. Hawes on Thursday night last laid on the table of the House of Commons the report of the Select Committee appointed to investigate the charges brought against Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham, of the Ordnance Department, and Mr. Hignett, solicitor to that Board, in the petition of the South Eastern Railway Company. The report, accompanied with the evidence, which extends to a considerable length, was ordered to be printed; but great care has been taken in the mean time to prevent its contents from transpiring. The Times of yesterday, however, states the general purport of the report. Capt. Boldero has incurred the animadversion of the Committee for having trafficked largely in railway shares, through Mr. Hignett, solicitor to the Board of Ordnance, who, it is stated had no authority whatever to act on behalf of the Board as represented by him in his letters to the railway authorities. The Committee also report that it had come to their knowledge that Mr. Bonham, in 1836, being then a member of the House of Commons, had 100 South-Eastern Railway shares allotted to him, which he sold at 3*l.* per share premium. The Committee lastly reprobate the conduct of Mr. Wray, of the South-Eastern Railway, in connexion with some of the transactions impugned, and condemn the system of canvassing members and public boards practised by railway companies. The following Bills were read a third time and passed by the House of Lords on Saturday:—Eastern Counties (Ely and Whittlesea Deviation), Manchester and Birmingham (Ashton branch), Ashton, Staleybridge, and Liverpool Junction (Ardwick and Guidebridge branches), Ulster Extension, Manchester and South Junction and Altringham, Trent Valley, North Wales, London and Brighton (Horsham branch), Londonderry and Enniskillen, and Chester and Birkenhead. The Lords Committees have decided that the preamble of the Caledonian Bill, the North Wales Mineral, Richmond and Surrey, Bristol and Exeter, Liverpool and Manchester Extension, and the Dublin and Belfast Junction has been proved. The Standing Orders Committee have passed the following Bills:—The Edinburgh and Northern, the Wear Valley, Great Southern and Western (Ireland), Cockermouth and Workington, Preston and Runcorn Brook, Norwich and Brandon, Glasgow Junction, Preston and Wyre, London and South Western Extension, Newry and Enniskillen. The Commons Committee have decided that the preamble of the following Bills has been proved:—Gravesend and Rochester enlargement, Monmouth and Hereford, Ashford and Hastings (Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings line), the Launceston and South Devon, the South Devon, Tavistock and branches (with amendments, and an expression of doubt as to the fitness of the line in an engineering point of view); the South Wales, with an amendment of the preamble prohibiting the extension of the line beyond Chepstow in the present session, with a branch to Monmouth. They have also postponed the Doncaster and Goole till next session, and rejected the Southport and Euxton Junction.—The York and Scarborough line, 50 miles long, which has been completed within the space of 12 months, was opened on Monday with the usual rejoicings, in the presence of an immense concourse of spectators from all parts of the surrounding country.—Great excitement has been created in the Isle of Wight by the threatened construction of a railway through the island. The landowners have held a public meeting, headed by Lord Yarborough, Sir R. Simeon, &c., and appointed a committee to watch and oppose the proceedings of the railway projectors.—While the Isle of Wight repudiates railways, Jersey receives them with open arms. A project is on foot for distributing over the island a complete system of railway communication, assurances of support having been given from the states. About 50,000 souls will be accommodated with railway facility, and by means of it the time occupied in the voyage from Southampton to St Helier will be, it is calculated, reduced from sixteen to seven hours.—The inhabitants of Windsor have appointed a committee consisting of the mayor and magistrates, to secure the formation of a direct railway from Windsor-bridge to Sloane-street.—The Kennet and Avon, Ellesmere and Chester, and Birmingham and Liverpool Junction Canals are to be converted into railways.—A project has been formed for uniting the Great Western Railway with the Eastern Counties line, by a tunnel under London from Paddington to Shoreditch, under the New-road to Finsbury-square, and then turning off. By means of branch tunnels Tottenham-court-road, Somers-town, King's-cross, Islington, and other districts are to be benefitted. Mr. Robert Stephenson is the engineer.

Ireland.

Dublin.—The anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne on the 1st inst., passed off without the least disturbance, and the accounts from the north concur in stating that in no one instance was there an attempt by the Orangemen to celebrate the day by processions or party displays of any kind. Although, however, one commemoration day has passed over satisfactorily, it is still thought necessary to take precautions to warn the Orangemen against marching on the ensuing 12th of July; and with this view the Earl of Roden has published a circular, advising all Protestants to abstain from processions, and condemning the conduct of the Repealers of Down, Armagh, and Tyrone, who have advised the Orangemen to adopt them.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association, which took place on Monday, in Conciliation-hall, was greatly crowded. Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by several of the leading members of the body, was present, and upon his entrance was loudly cheered. Mr. M. O'Connell, M.P., presided.—Mr. RAY read a letter from Mr. T. Steele, in which the head pacificator gave a flourishing account of the success of his mission to the north, and stated that "a mighty and sanctified change has come over the spirit of the stern but noble-hearted people of Ulster."—Mr. DAVIS moved the adoption of a draught of a petition to be extensively distributed in Ulster for the purpose of obtaining signatures, praying the House of Commons not to pass any bill touching the tenantry of Ireland, without enacting therein a clause, recognising and saving whole the custom commonly called "the tenant-right of Ulster."—Mr. O'CONNELL seconded the motion, and denounced any attempt to interfere with the existing tenant-right as a scheme of robbery by the landlords. He pledged himself to make every exertion in his power not only to preserve the present tenant-right for the people of Ulster, but to extend it to every other part of Ireland.—The petition having been adopted, Mr. O'CONNELL said that he had a few observations to make on the subject of his recent mission to England. He denied that he had ever made any declaration of total absence from his Parliamentary duties, as was asserted by some of the English journals. What he had said was, that he should not go over unless for the purpose of endeavouring to effect some good or to avert some evil. He was also reported to have declared himself favourable to mixed education, and to have given an opinion to the effect that the political part of the New Colleges Bill would do no harm to Ireland. Now, both those reports were utterly untrue. As to mixed education, he admitted, that at one time he was favourable to it, but he had since changed his opinions, and since the introduction of the new bill he had invariably declared himself averse to it. He then recounted the steps which he and Mr. Smith O'Brien took in the House of Commons in opposition to the New Banking and Colleges Bills, and stated at great length his objections to the latter measure, denouncing it as penal, restrictive, and having a tendency to corrupt the youth of the country. Notwithstanding the assistance which Lord J. Russell had given them, they were left in a miserable minority. He, therefore, flung the Bill to Ministers at their own risk, and came over to rouse the people of Ireland to struggle against it. He inculcated the necessity of conciliating persons of all religious opinions, and earnestly condemned the system of Ribbonism and Molly Maguireism, which is spreading through the country. He adverted to the recent fatal collision between the police and the country people in the county of Cork, where 14 innocent persons lost their lives, and held it up as a warning to all to abstain from outrage and violence. He also alluded to the assassination of Mr. Booth, and called upon wretches like his murderer to recollect that the red arm of God's vengeance was raised against them, and that, if their crime was unrepented, their final doom was as certain as it was horrible to contemplate. He concluded by calling on the Repeal wardens to rally with him for tranquillity, Old Ireland, and the Repeal. A resolution was adopted to the effect that the Rev. T. Maguire's speech at the Cavan meeting of magistrates should be printed and circulated in Cavan and the adjoining counties. Mr. H. GRATTAN and Mr. J. O'CONNELL addressed the meeting at great length, reiterating their opinions on the New Education Bill.—The week's rent was 407*l.* 7*s.*

Cavan.—A remarkable and most influential meeting of the nobility, clergy of both persuasions, and gentry of the county of Cavan, was held on the 2d inst. in the open space before the Court-house of that town, in pursuance of a requisition addressed to the High Sheriff, signed by a great number of magistrates and deputy-lieutenants. The attendance was numerous, and combined the leading men of all parties in the district; amongst others, Lords Headfort and Farnham, the Protestant and Roman Catholic Bishops of the diocese, Father Maguire, and the Rev. John Martin, of Killeshandra, and many more of equally adverse politics, all of whom met and spoke in the same spirit, each pledging himself to exercise his influence in suppressing the frightful conspiracy against life and property which has for the last few months raged in this locality. Mr. O'Reilly, the High Sheriff, presided, and several resolutions condemning the recent murders and acts of violence in the county, were adopted. Among the speakers were the Marquis of Headfort, Lord Farnham, the Lord Bishop of Kilmore (Dr. Leslie), the Roman Catholic Bishop (Dr. Browne), the Rev. T. Maguire, parish priest of Ballinamore, Rev. Mr. Martin, the Hon. S R. Maxwell, &c. The speeches of the two bishops were remarkable for their spirit of mutual benevolence and co-operation, and Mr. Maguire's speech, in which he vehemently denounced Molly Maguireism, and other forms of conspiracy, and enjoined the Catholics to unite cordially with the Protestants in discovering the perpetrators of the recent murders, produced a great sensation upon the meeting. No less than 10,000 persons were present, and although there were occasionally loud cries for Repeal, the meeting passed off in the most orderly manner.

York.—The inquest on the bodies of the countrymen killed last week in the affray with the police at Ballinhasig fair, has been in progress for some days past, but no verdict has yet been returned. The subject was adverted to in the House of Commons on Friday, when Sir T. Fremantle, the Secretary for Ireland, gave an explanation of the affair to which we must refer our readers for the official details.

Arches Court.—The Office of the Judge promoted by Hodgson v. The Rev. Frederick Oakeley.—Judgment.—The decision of the Judge of the Arches was delivered in this important case on the 30th ult. The Court was more fully attended than usual. The Dean of Chichester sat near Her Majesty's Advocate, and there were also many of the clergy of the Church of England, as well as members of the Church of Rome, present, who appeared to take deep interest in the decision. Sir H. Jenner Fust said the question he was called upon to decide was a most important and peculiar one, more especially considering the dissensions which now unhappily existed among certain members of the Established Church. A great responsibility had, in this instance, been put upon the Court; but it had no alternative—it must discharge its duty. Under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, the Court might have taken more time to consider its judgment, but recollecting that this was the last regular day of term, and that if its decision were not given now, it must go over the long vacation, it thought the most advisable course was that the question before it should not for so long a period as four months remain undecided. This was of importance not only to the party cited, but to the public interest, and it therefore was desirous of giving an early decision. The question came before this Court by virtue of letters of request from the Lord Bishop of London, under the provisions of the Church Discipline Act. The allegations the bishop had thought right to send at once to this Court for consideration. There had not been any defence set up, and the Court had to take upon itself the duty of considering the case, without having heard argument on the part of the defendant. The Rev. Mr. Oakeley, in fact, had admitted that some offence had been committed by him against the canons and the laws ecclesiastical of the Church of England. The learned Judge then stated at length the articles exhibited against the Rev. Mr. Oakeley. The principal charge against him was his published letter, addressed to the Bishop of London. He admitted most of the articles exhibited against him. He admitted that in 1839 he subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles, that he was a member of the Church of England, and licensed by the Bishop of London. He admitted that he was the author of the letter complained of, and that he resided in the diocese of London, consequently that he was within the jurisdiction of the Court. The admissions of Mr. Oakeley, however, he must observe, were extremely guarded in language; therefore it would be necessary for the Court to inquire how the articles had been proved. At first there was a doubt whether the case had been stated on the part of the promoter with sufficient exactness, and the Court would have been happy to have heard the arguments of counsel upon that point, but Mr. Oakeley had not thought proper to instruct counsel or to take any steps for his defence. Mr. Oakeley declared himself in favour of the doctrines of the Roman Church. In this case the Court had not the assistance of counsel. Mr. Oakeley did not appear, and therefore he must come to the best conclusion he could as to the contents of the published letter. It was not for the Court to say what could have induced Mr. Oakeley not to defend his suit, but, as he before said, in taking that course he had placed the Court in considerable difficulty. The learned Judge then read the letter addressed by Mr. Oakeley to the Bishop of London, and commented upon its contents as he proceeded. The name of the Rev. Mr. Ward was alluded to, but as respected the conduct of that gentleman the Court on the present occasion had nothing to do with; that was a subject which could only be settled between Mr. Ward and the University of Oxford; what the Court had to decide was the conduct of Mr. Oakeley towards his diocesan. Mr. Oakeley admitted that he was accountable to the bishop for his conduct, and therefore that Court had to decide whether that conduct was against the discipline and doctrines of the Church of England, and brought the rev. gentleman under ecclesiastical censure. Mr. Oakeley contended that he had a right to maintain, if he pleased, the doctrines of the Romish Church. What the Court had to decide was, whether the rev. gentleman had acted contrary to the tenor and spirit of the Thirty-nine Articles, to which he had voluntarily subscribed. The Court was bound by the letter addressed to the Bishop, and to form an opinion upon it to which it was fairly entitled; it must carefully examine its contents. At page 7 of the letter was the following:—"Now, with respect to myself, it is no news to your lordship, or to the public at large, that almost as soon as the measures against Mr. Ward were announced, I felt myself called upon to declare that I sign the articles in the sense which Mr. Ward vindicates. This was little more than a repetition of what I said years ago; for as far back as 1841 I put out a pamphlet, the object of which was to prove historically that the articles were intended to include the Catholics of the time." Mr. Oakeley had not abstained from taking a step which he himself had described "as likely to be thought a disturbing movement," and he must take whatever consequences followed it. Mr. Oakeley, in his letter, then proceeded to draw a distinction "between holding Roman doctrine and teaching it:" and on that distinction he very much relied. In a qualified sense clearly had he used the word "teaching;" for if he had taken it in its ordinary sense, no explanation of its meaning would have been required. The passage to which the Court referred was on the 11th page of the pamphlet. "I wish," said, Mr. Oakeley, "your Lordship, then, very particularly to observe that in the passage of my pamphlet on Tract XC., to which I refer in my letter to the Vice-Chancellor, I not only draw a distinction between holding Roman doctrine and teaching it, but in a note to that passage I explain very fully what I mean by not teaching, and how very far I carry out the principle which is involved in that distinction. I say, 'As respects teaching, however, there is no duty which I hold more sacred than that of abstaining in sermons and other acts of public ministration, from the statement of theological opinions or the recommendation of devotional practices, allowed, as I conceive, by the articles, but foreign to the views and habits of our Church. And generally, I will say, even of what are called 'Church principles,' that it seems to me far better to imply them in our public teaching, than to assert them in a dogmatical and controversial way.'" Accordingly, it appeared that Mr. Oakeley purposely abstained from teaching in his ministrations those doctrines which were propounded in the articles of the Church of England, and he defended this course upon the ground that theological and doctrinal disputes were not the proper subject of public instruction. But Mr. Oakeley proceeded still further to insist upon the distinction between holding and teaching certain doctrines, and in the following passage he again referred to the case of Mr. Ward and the University of Oxford, with which the Court had nothing to do, except as it indicated and explained the views and feelings of Mr. Oakeley. It was to be observed, however, that from the pamphlet, it appeared that the University had repudiated and renounced the doctrines of Mr. Ward, and that Mr. Oakeley placed himself exactly in the same position as that gentleman. Mr. Oakeley stated—"I now wish to draw your lordship's attention to the following point:—The distinction in question is, as I contend, wholly irrelevant to my question with the University, for, in the University, it is not the practice of teaching certain doctrines which it even apparently impugned, but the claim to hold them. Mr. Ward himself never claimed to teach Roman doctrine; on the contrary, he urges over and over again, that such a procedure would be highly wrong under our circumstances. What he maintains, and what the vote of Thursday seems to deny, is the honesty of subscribing the articles in a certain sense. The University, then, cannot pretend to let me off on the ground of the above distinction; for with respect to it I differ in no way from Mr. Ward, whom it has, by the hypothesis, condemned. Mr. Ward does not claim to teach. I claim to hold." But what was the force of the distinction between holding and teaching? If a man merely held certain doctrines, and never taught or published them, how could the University, how could the bishop or the Church, know what were the doctrines held? Again, it was here to be observed that Mr. Oakeley placed himself exactly in the same position with Mr. Ward. "I differ in no way from Mr. Ward," were the words used. But Mr. Oakeley proceeded:—"But with your Lordship, I contend, this distinction ought to, and will, receive consideration. Were I to be found teaching Roman doctrine in my public ministrations in your Lordship's diocese, I should, as I feel, most deservedly expose myself to your Lordship's censure. It is plain that your lordship, as a bishop of our Church, could not and would not suffer it." Mr. Oakeley here admitted that the Roman doctrine and the doctrine of the Church of England were not compatible. If he had not thought so, he would never have said, as he here did say—"Were I to be found teaching Roman doctrine in my public ministrations in your Lordship's diocese, I should, as I feel, most deservedly expose myself to your Lordship's censure. It is plain that your Lordship, as a bishop of our Church, could not and would not suffer it." Mr. Oakeley admitted that he could not be allowed to preach this Roman doctrine, but he insisted upon being permitted to hold it. The Court, however, could not follow Mr. Oakeley in this distinction. It was the duty of every clergyman of the Church of England to renounce and drive away error, and he could not be permitted to hold what he himself allowed that he ought not to teach in his public ministrations. But Mr. Oakeley had gone further on this point, and had said, "It may be replied that my public declaration on the subject of subscription precludes me from preaching against the Roman doctrine. Most assuredly it does. If my obligations as an English clergyman require me to controvert the doctrines of Rome, then I freely admit that I do not fulfil those obligations. But surely, My Lord, if I be justified in considering that there are things among us to be done more important than controverting dissent, a multo fortiori am I bound upon any Catholic principles whatever not to be harder upon what your Lordship acknowledges to be a branch of the Catholic Church, than upon those who are not even members of the Church of England." The Court could not fail here to observe that Mr. Oakeley had made the candid and important admission that he could not and would not controvert the doctrines of the Church of Rome. He said, "If my obligations as an English clergyman require me to controvert the doctrines of Rome, then I freely admit I do not fulfil those obligations." But he proceeded to say, "It would indeed be hard to expect of me that I should spare Dissenters at the expense of Catholics. However I do not imagine it possible that so preposterous a demand could be deliberately set up in any quarter. I take it for granted that I am generally supposed to controvert Dissent; in that case I admit that I might not unnaturally be called upon by those who consider our Church as a via media to controvert supposed error in an opposite direction. But controversy of any sort is not my line." Mr. Oakeley, however, was not required to spare either Dissenters or Catholics—but the mercy he chose to show to one was no ground for showing mercy to the other. If he chose to abstain from controverting the errors of dissent, that was no reason why he should be permitted to abstain from controverting the errors of Rome. Mr. Oakeley in his pamphlet had, however, taken pains to explain that his own practical conduct was in strict consistency with the distinction he took between holding and teaching. He stated (page 15)—"I will make one or two farther remarks only in connexion with this part of the subject. My flock never so much as hear a (characteristically) Roman doctrine from my lips. If those doctrines be not intrinsically true, certainly I take the course of all others calculated to explode them. No Roman doctrine makes its way to the minds of those who are under me through my intervention. I very much doubt whether 20 members of my congregation, or one poor person in my district (except actual Roman Catholics), know even what Roman doctrine is. Again, I have seen in some newspapers and magazines of the day, an objection to my distinction between 'holding' and teaching, founded upon the alleged impossibility of not teaching (by implication) that which is in the mind of the teacher. The teaching, it is said, of one who holds a certain doctrine must needs be tinctured with that doctrine. This, no doubt, would be true, it what is called 'Romanism' implies a certain tone, or habit of mind, distinct from Catholicism. I suppose, for instance, that a Socinian could not hold his baleful heresy without in a certain way teaching it. And so again, no doubt a strictly Catholic temper results in strictly Catholic teaching, even though doctrine be not directly brought forward. So far, then, I acknowledge the truth of the remark. But I deny that the teaching of one who holds Catholicism in the Roman form, but who studiously abstains from exhibiting specially Roman doctrine, will be in any way different from that of another who holds (essential) Catholicism at all, though in a less full-grown state of development, excepting, indeed, that I think he is less likely to allow particular Catholic truths to protrude in his teaching, above others. The objection, therefore, tells in no degree more strongly against what are denominated 'Romanisers,' or 'Romanists,' than against all teachers of a 'Catholic' profession, but rather, as I believe, less so." What was the distinction between Catholicism in the Roman form and essential Catholicism, the Court confessed its inability to discover. Up to this part of the letter, however, it would be observed that Mr. Oakeley had only claimed a right to hold, and not to teach these Roman doctrines; but in the latter part of the pamphlet he had claimed also a right to proclaim and publish them. Mr. Oakeley supposed the following question to be put to him, and the form of this question showed that Mr. Oakeley had referred to the whole range of doctrine held by the Church of Rome. "But here I shall be asked," he said, "Is, then, your claim to hold (as distinct from teaching) all Roman doctrine," (all Roman doctrine) "no more, after all, than the assertion of a right to a merely speculative opinion? Because, if so, you are doing yourself injustice, and coming forward in an obnoxious character for no sufficient purpose." His answer to the question thus put was answered as follows—"I reply frankly that my opinion is not merely speculative. I hope none of my opinions on religious subjects are merely speculative. If I say that the view in question is not practical, I mean that it in no way affects my teaching, except negatively. I do not follow out a particular line of action either in public or in private with any view of making converts to Rome. I could wish, as best I might, to make people good Christians in the Church of England; I think that this is work enough for me. But, more than this, if I see any one disposed to join the Church of Rome, my arguments with such an one are always in arrest, generally even in contravention, of that step; though, even were it otherwise, I do not see how those could very consistently charge me with 'tempting' persons to 'schism' who are continually urging myself and others who think with me to quit the Church of England." Such was Mr. Oakeley's notion of the conscientious discharge of his duties as a clergyman of the Church of England. To his mind it was sufficient merely to abstain from encouraging conversion to the Church of Rome. He himself held Roman doctrine—he claimed the right to publish that doctrine; but he—a clergyman of the Church of England, bound by his ordination vows to drive away all erroneous and superstitious doctrines—felt himself rightly performing his duties by merely recommending members of the Church of England not to become converts to the Church of Rome. But he proceeded—"Now, then, I crave your Lordship's kind attention for awhile, that I may say what I do mean by the exceeding reluctance I feel to accept anti-Roman limitations of our Articles and Prayer Book. I will try to analyse the feeling under which I regard it as a point of duty to my own communion, to extract, nay, and if so be, extort, the most Catholic meaning possible from her apparently anti-Catholic determinations; and why, moreover, I cannot consent to draw those distinctions between the 'Catholic' and the 'Roman' sense, upon which some of my respected friends are disposed to lay so great a stress." He here admitted that if he could not by fair argument and reasonable deduction, he would by every means and at every hazard extract—nay, extort—a Catholic meaning from the doctrines of the Church; and he subsequently, as he had previously, admitted that by Catholic he meant a Roman meaning. But the pamphlet proceeded—"My, lord, I am not in the number of those who are able to draw a line between the earlier and the later decisions of the Catholic Church. I can understand those who make a broad difference between 'primitive' and 'patristic' Christianity; but I cannot follow the further distinction between 'patristic' and 'mediæval.' How early what is called 'dogmatic theology' had its rise in the Church, it is, I suppose, difficult to decide, since even Paul speaks of a 'form of sound words,' &c., and St. John begins his Gospel as if it were a creed. But if it be hard to fix the date of its commencement, still harder would it seem to determine the limit to its expansion. Certainly I cannot imagine the creed of the Church to have been put into its final shape in any of the earlier centuries. We all know that the course of dogmatic theology runs parallel to the course of heresy; and it will not, I suppose, be contended that heresy had its ultimate issue in the fifth or the sixth century of Christianity. The ramifications of heretical invention would appear to be almost indefinite and incalculable: but so many as are the extravagancies of theological error, so many also must be the safeguards of orthodoxy. I will never believe that the strong current of dogmatic theology was suddenly frozen up in the fourth or sixth century of the Christian era." In this passage Mr. Oakeley stated his inability to draw any distinction between the primitive Christianity of the three first centuries and the papistical Christianity of subsequent ages. He recognised no distinction between the age before and after the heresy of Arius, and he regarded the Council of Trent and the Council of Nice of equal authority, and the intermediate councils of the same validity as either. He said, "I believe the Church to have been ready at Trent as at Nicæa with her scholastic definitions and exclusive anathemas." Here Mr. Oakeley was treating of the Church of Rome. The Council of Trent had been called by Pope Pius the Fourth, and its decrees had been ratified and confirmed by his authority. What Mr. Oakeley said was that the Church of England did not contravene the authority of this and of the other later councils. Mr. Oakeley could not believe that the Church would attempt to do so. His words were—"With these feelings your Lordship can hardly wonder that I should deem too well of my Church to suppose, without overpowering reason, that she directly and unequivocally contravenes the decrees even of the later councils. What a body of divines in one corner of the world good men, I doubt not, in their way, yet surely exposed, and apparently not superior to exterior influences), set about deliberating to call into question the solemn acts of the assembled prelates of Christendom!" Such was the manner in which Mr. Oakeley, a member of the Church of England, thought it right to speak of the Reformers by whom and by whose successors the yoke of Rome had been thrown off. Such was the language which Mr. Oakeley addressed to a bishop of the Church of England, and by which he professed to explain his own views and doctrine. Surely Mr. Oakeley should have paused before he dealt in such disparaging language towards those learned and pious men. He should have remembered that these reverend persons had not spontaneously contravened the doctrines of the Church of Rome—that they had been called upon by the convocation to lay down the doctrines of the Church of England—that the doctrines so by them laid down had been ratified by the convocation and by the sovereign. He should have remembered that they had again been ratified and confirmed by another sovereign and by the legislature—by the canons of the Church—by the Act of Uniformity—that they were every day in practice, and were the rule and guide of the Church and of her members at the present day. These were the persons whose labours had been so recognised—whose laborious research had laid down the true doctrine of the scriptures, and yet these were the men of whom Mr. Oakeley had felt himself justified in saying "that they were good men, he doubted not, in their way, but surely exposed to and apparently not superior to exterior influences." Very different had been the language used in relation to these good and learned persons by the learned Judge, Lord Stowell, who had been so long the ornament of his profession. The case of "the Queen's Proctor v. Stone" (1 Hag. C. R. 424) was a criminal proceeding against the reverend defendant for denying the divinity of our Saviour. The Court would read the proceedings in that case, as in almost every respect they were applicable to the present. (The Court then read at length Lord Stowell's judgment in the case cited. The articles of the Church were therein called "the production of men eminent for their learning and piety—the great luminaries of the Church.") In that case as in the present the defendant had signed, not once only, these articles; and he had or ought to have signed them ex animo, and in the ordinary and obvious sense and construction of the words. (The Court continued to read the judgment of Lord Stowell in the same case, and to apply the remarks made in that case to the present.) Mr. Oakeley had attempted in one portion of his letter (p. 33) to defend himself upon the ground of his place of ministration being a chapel and not a parish church, and consequently that no one was bound to attend its service. But the license would never have been granted to that chapel unless there had been in the parish a want of church accommodation, and on this point Mr. Oakeley had drawn a distinction which was quite untenable. (At the conclusion of Lord Stowell's judgment, the Court proceeded.) Such was the manner in which Lord Stowell had spoken of the articles and Reformers of the Church of England; but what was the conclusion to which the Court must come, having attentively read and considered the letter of Mr. Oakeley, as to his views and opinions of those articles? Mr. Oakeley professed his belief in the whole range of doctrine, from the first council to the last, held by the bishops of the Church of Rome. Then the question arose—was there any one doctrine in the whole range of Roman doctrine inconsistent with, and opposed to, the doctrines of the Church of England? If there was any one doctrine so opposed to the doctrines of the English Church, Mr. Oakeley had been guilty of the offence wherewith he was charged in the present articles. Mr. Oakeley had not professed a preference of one Roman doctrine over another. He held the doctrines all equally. He held them all as laid down by the Council of Trent—the whole range of them—not one more than the others. If there had been any change introduced in the doctrines of the Church of Rome, Mr. Oakeley should have stated it. The Court must assume that the doctrines of Trent were still held by the Church of Rome—were still professed by Mr. Oakeley. The Court, therefore, did not think it necessary to refer to the strong and conclusive authorities which have been quoted by the counsel for the promoters. By the 39 articles alone would the Court test the soundness or the unsoundness of Mr. Oakeley's opinions. Through the whole of these articles the Court need not travel. The time would not permit it, nor was it necessary. It had been truly stated in argument, that these articles had been drawn up in direct opposition to the doctrines laid down in the Council of Trent. Mr. Oakeley had assumed as true the doctrines of that council, and those doctrines seemed only to be a repetition of the former doctrines of the Church of Rome. What, then, to pass over the first five, was the sixth article of the Church of England? that Holy Scripture contained everything necessary to salvation, and that any thing not written therein, nor proved thereby, was not required to be believed by any man. The foundation of the Church of England then was, that her doctrines rested exclusively upon Scripture—but the Church of Rome, in addition to the Scriptures, added tradition, and placed tradition upon the same footing as, and made it of equal authority with, the Scripture. This was an obvious distinction, and formed an insuperable barrier to the union of the two churches. The 19th and 21st articles of the Church of England were pretty much to the same effect. In them was a positive re-affirmance of the doctrine laid down in the sixth article. Upon that article what possible doubt or cavil could be raised? By what mental reservation could Mr. Oakeley have avoided the plain and obvious meaning of this doctrine? On the other hand, under the pain of anathema, the Church of Rome required tradition to be received as of the same binding authority as Scripture. The Court asked, then, by what means could any man "extort," much less "extract," any Catholic or Roman meaning from the 6th article of the Church? The Court would pass over the doctrines of original sin, the works of supererogation, and other doctrines, not because there was no distinction between the opinion of the two churches on those points, but because the distinction between them would be more easily traced in some others. The Court would pause at the 22d article, which pronounced purgatory and the invocation of saints as not to be proved by Scripture, but rather repugnant thereto. By what mental reservation could this article, again, be received in a Catholic sense? The article itself stated that these doctrines were the doctrines of the Romish Church, the whole range of which Mr. Oakeley believed. He, therefore, differing from his church, believed that purgatory was "no vain thing." The doctrine of purgatory had been known long before the Council of Trent. It had been proclaimed in the Council of Florence, and had been first recognised in the eighth century.—(Glossary to Linwood's Provincialia.) But it was not necessary to refer to the councils of the Church of Rome. The Court must assume that the doctrine of purgatory was a Romish doctrine; for in the article of the Church of England it was so stated to be. The article repudiated and renounced that doctrine; but from his own admissions Mr. Oakeley must clearly support and maintain it. The Court would next refer to the 25th article, in which all the sacraments, except the two of Baptism and of the Lord's Supper, were rejected as not being of divine authority. What, then, was the doctrine of the Church of Rome on the question of the sacraments? It was to be found in the seventh section of the Decrees of the Council of Trent. There instead of two sacraments, seven sacraments were appointed; and of those seven, several specially and by name rejected in the articles of the Church of England, were received and decreed by the Church of Rome under the pain of anathema. This doctrine had for ages been the received and recognised doctrine of Rome.—(Gloss. to Linwood.) The 25th article also declared that the sacraments were not to be carried about, and on this point the Church of Rome again differed from the Church of England. The Court would next refer to the doctrine with regard to the Supper of our Lord. Transubstantiation was in that article clearly rejected, but in the 13th section (c. 4) of the Decrees of the Council of Trent, anno 1551, that doctrine was positively laid down. Here again was a positive contradiction and irreconcileable difference. The canons of the Church of Rome were, too, as strong in favour of transubstantiation as the Decrees of the Council of Trent. That doctrine had been laid down in the Councils of Lateran and of Constance.—(Gloss. to Linwood.) The carrying about of the eucharistic elements was equally the subject of differences between the churches. How was Mr. Oakeley to get out of these difficulties? In the mind of the Court it was impossible to raise a doubt as to the sense or meaning of the words used in the article. The receiving of the sacrament in both kinds was no less a matter of difference between the Church of England and the Church of Rome. In the 21st section of the Council of Trent (anno 1562), it was laid down that one kind alone should be administered to the laity, and by the article of the Church of England, this doctrine was as distinctly denied. The sacrifice of the Mass was by the Church of England declared to be blasphemous and vain, but the Church of Rome (Decreta Concilii Tridentini, 22 sec., anno 1562), under the pain of anathema, decreed the observance of that service as a propitiatory sacrifice. Was it necessary for the Court to go further than this? It was not necessary to travel through each article of the Church of England. Upon almost all the Church of Rome differed from that church, and as Mr. Oakeley agreed with the former, he could not agree with the latter. The Court could not think that the words of the articles admitted that Catholic or Roman meaning which Mr. Oakeley contended for. No man could entertain a doubt that Mr. Oakeley was a professed Roman Catholic; and the Court being satisfied of this, it had no hesitation in saying, that the promoter of the suit had proved his case, and that Mr. Oakeley was liable to ecclesiastical censure. What should be the amount of that censure or punishment the Court had now to consider. Mr. Oakeley had professed doctrines utterly inconsistent with and opposed to the doctrines of the Church of England; and he had given no explanation, he had offered no justification, for such conduct. If, then, in any case, surely in this case, the Court must pronounce a severe sentence, in order to prevent other persons from falling into those errors into which, in the opinion of the Court, Mr. Oakeley had fallen. The sentence of the Court, therefore, was, that the license of Mr. Oakeley, as minister of St. Margaret's chapel, be revoked; that he be not permitted to perform ministerial duties in that chapel, or in any other church or chapel within the diocese of London, or within the province of Canterbury, until he should declare his willingness to renounce, and should renounce, his present heresies and errors. This sentence to be published in St. Margaret's chapel on Sunday the 6th day of July; and Mr. Oakeley to be condemned in the costs of these proceedings.

News of the Week.

THE privilege question in the House of Lords, which caused so much discussion last week, has terminated, like the recent one in the House of Commons, in the discharge of the offending parties after making an humble apology to the House, and promising to discontinue the actions they had brought. In the course of the discussion, Lord Brougham advised the House to leave the matter in the hands of the Judges, and protested earnestly against the undue assertion of Parliamentary privilege, as contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. Lord Campbell, on the other hand, urged the propriety of commitment in all cases, and recanted his former opinion in favour of pleading, expressing regret that when Attorney-General he had advised the House of Commons to plead, since it has formed the foundation of all the subsequent invasions of their privileges.—On Tuesday, Lord Stanley announced that the Irish Landlords and Tenants Bill will not be proceeded with this session. On the same day, the Earl of Clarendon submitted a resolution to the effect that the produce of Spain and her colonies should be admitted on the same terms as that of the most favoured nations. The question at issue turned on the proper construction of particular treaties; and Ministers opposed the motion on the ground that these treaties applied to persons, not to produce, and that while we were bound to treat the subjects of Spain as the subjects of the most favoured nation, we were not obliged to receive the produce of that country on the same terms. The motion was negatived by a majority of 28 to 14; and a similar motion brought before the House of Commons by Lord Palmerston, on the same night, was negatived by a majority of 175 to 87. The Lunatics Bill has passed through committee in the Commons, after a very energetic opposition on the part of Mr. Duncombe. The Scotch Poor-law Amendment Bill and the Commons Inclosure Bill have also passed through committee, though not without considerable opposition and several divisions on the different clauses. On Tuesday, the Coal Trade Bill passed through committee, after an ineffectual attempt on the part of several members to abolish the duty of 1*d*. per ton now levied on coal in the metropolis, for the purposes of public improvements. On Thursday, Sir R. Peel moved the second reading of the Lord Chancellor's Bill for the removal of disabilities from Jews appointed to municipal and corporate offices. The Premier stated that the measure was intended to meet the difficulty which occurred last year in the case of Mr. Salomons, who, after creditably filling the office of Sheriff, had been debarred from entering upon that of Alderman, to which he had been freely elected. Sir R. Inglis met the proposition with a decided negative, on the ground that it was a Bill to naturalise the whole Jewish nation, and that it would render the working of a Christian constitution impossible in this country. He therefore moved, and Mr. Plumptre seconded, an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. Lord J. Russell cordially supported the Bill, and on a division the second reading was carried by 91 to 11.

From France we have accounts of an atrocity, fortunately but seldom heard of in modern history. This act, which has called forth a unanimous expression of horror from the Paris journals, is nothing less than the destruction, by fire, of an entire tribe of Arabs, by the French troops in Algeria. The unfortunate victims had taken shelter in their caverns, in numbers variously stated at from 800 to 1000, and were there suffocated, with their wives, children, and cattle, by lighted faggots thrown into the entrance by the French, and kept burning for many successive hours. The perpetrator of this crime is Colonel Pelissier, one of the commanding officers in the Dahra. The Paris papers are loud in demanding his immediate punishment; and from what has transpired in the Chambers, it is certain that public feeling will not allow the Government to pass over the affair with any formal expression of censure.—From Texas we learn that President Jones has officially announced the receipt of a proposition from Mexico, to treat on the subject of Texan independence, and that hostilities have been suspended in consequence. The particulars are not given; but it is understood that the chief condition insisted on by Mexico is, the refusal of Texas to be annexed to the United States or any other power.—The details of the fatal conflict in New Zealand, of which we gave a brief summary in our last, will be read with melancholy interest. In addition to the loss of 13 lives on the part of our troops and settlers, the destruction of merchandise is said to be not less than 40,000*l*. The subject was brought before Parliament on Monday, and Mr. C. Buller intends to make it the ground of a substantive motion in the early part of next week.

Home News.

COURT.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the King and Queen of the Belgians, left Buckingham Palace on Tuesday for Portsmouth. After witnessing the departure of the experimental fleet, the royal party proceeded to Osborne House, and remained there until Thursday, when they returned to town. In the afternoon of Thursday the King and Queen of the Belgians left the Palace for Dover, on their return to the Continent. The Queen Dowager also arrived in town on Thursday from the Isle of Wight, where Her Majesty has been residing for a few days.

Parliamentary Movements.—It is currently reported that Parliament will be prorogued either on the 5th or 7th of the ensuing month.—The election for Cambridge terminated on Tuesday, after an exceedingly hard contest, in the return of the Solicitor-General by a majority of 17 only; the numbers being for Mr. Kelly 746, Mr. Adair 729.

Commercial Treaty with Naples.—It is officially announced that the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and the two Sicilies, which was signed at Naples on the 29th April last, has been ratified by the King of the two Sicilies, and that the ratifications of this treaty were exchanged at Naples on the 25th ult., from which time the provisions contained in it will have come into operation. By the provisions of the treaty, which include Malta and Gibraltar, the vessels of each country, and the merchandise which they contain, being the produce of that country, when entering the ports of the other, are placed on the same footing with respect to tonnage and other duties, as if they were vessels bearing the national flag. The diminution of 10 per cent. enjoyed by the British flag remains in force, although it may be extended to other countries by the Sicilian government.

Colonial Appointments.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint George Grey, Esq., to be Lieutenant-Governor of New Zealand; Frederick Holt Robe, Esq., Major in the Army, to be Lieutenant-Governor of South Australia; and George Lilly, Esq., to be Assistant Judge of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland.

Civil List Pensions.—The following pensions have been granted upon the Civil List between June last year and the 20th ult:—Mr. Fraser Tytler, historian of Scotland, 200*l*. a year; Mrs. Hood, now the widow of the late Thomas Hood, 100*l*. a year; the four daughters of Lieut.-Colonel Robertson Macdonald, and granddaughters of Robertson, the historian, 50*l*. a year each; the three sisters of the late Lieut.-Colonel Stoddart, 75*l*. a year each; Mdle. D'Este, 500*l*. a year; and Miss Lowe, daughter of the late Sir Hudson Lowe, 50*l*. a year; making in all 1200*l*. a year.

Death of the Earl of Dunmore.—On Tuesday afternoon died at his residence at Streatham, the Earl of Dunmore, Viscount Fincastle, and Lord Murray of Blair, &c., in the peerage of Scotland. His lordship was born 1804, so that he had just completed his 41st year. The earl married, in 1836, Lady Catherine Herbert, fourth daughter of the late Earl of Pembroke, and in November the same year succeeded to the title on the death of his father, the fifth earl. By his marriage he leaves issue a youthful family.

DEPARTURE OF THE EXPERIMENTAL SQUADRON.—The experimental squadron of line-of-battle ships, under the command of Rear-Admiral Parker, got under weigh on Tuesday afternoon and proceeded to sea, accompanied by Her Majesty, in her steam-yacht the Victoria and Albert. Never was there a spectacle of which an Englishman might feel more justly proud, the Queen of England leading a fleet of British ships on that element over which they have hitherto held, and will continue to hold, the supremacy, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, her Majesty the Queen Dowager, numbers of the nobility and gentry in their yachts, and by thousands of persons, who had come far and near for the purpose of witnessing the departure of these ships. Many years have elapsed since anything like the same excitement has been witnessed at Portsmouth as that exhibited on the present occasion. On Monday afternoon not a bed was to be procured in Portsmouth or Gosport. Train after train arrived at the Gosport terminus, bringing hundreds of persons from the metropolis, many of whom were unable to procure beds at any of the hotels and inns, and were glad to obtain even the shelter of a roof, regardless of the lack of other accommodation. H.R.H. Prince George of Cambridge arrived by special train on Tuesday morning, and proceeded in the Admiral's barge to the dock-yard, and afterwards met Her Majesty on her arrival. The Queen Dowager came from Ryde in the Princess Alice steamer, to meet the Queen, and went up the harbour to where the royal yacht was moored, where she remained until the arrival of Her Majesty. Shortly before 12 o'clock the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, arrived at the Gosport terminus, where they were received by the naval and military authorities of the port. Upon their Majesties embarking on board the royal steam-yacht, the English and Belgian standards were hoisted, and the Victory and Excellent saluted and manned yards. On the Victoria and Albert leaving the harbour on her passage to Spithead, the forts saluted, and the tens of thousands of spectators that were congregated on either side loudly cheered. The fleet at Spithead saluted but with the exception of the Hibernia, which does not belong to the experimental squadron, did not man yards. The royal yacht, followed by the Fairy, the Princess Alice, with Her Majesty the Queen Dowager; the Black Eagle, bearing the Admiralty flag, and innumerable other steamboats passed under the stern of the Albion, and proceeded between the two lines of the fleet, from east to west, until she rounded the bows of the Hibernia, which was moored to the westward of the whole squadron. The ships were then speedily got under weigh, and proceeded on their course to sea. The wind, what little there was of it, was from the west, and consequently, the vessels, in steering towards the Nab light, had it on their starboard quarter, carrying courses, topsails, topgallant sails, royals, jib, flying-jib, and spanker, and studding-sails. A more magnificent sight cannot be pictured to the imagination than that which presented itself when the squadron had reached St. Helen's. As far as the eye could behold, the waters were covered with countless vessels, all under sail, and each vying with the other to keep pace with the men-of-war. Yachts of every description, belonging to the Royal Yacht Squadron, and all the other clubs from the Thames to the Land's-end, were following, crowded with sail. Shortly before the vessels reached the Nab light the breeze freshened, and the contest now between the Rodney, Superb, Queen, and Albion, was most interesting. The Rodney was the first ship under weigh, and had passed the Superb and Albion, and had obtained the lead, Rodney being the first, Superb next, and Albion following on the port quarter of the Rodney. It very soon became apparent that the Queen would take the lead of them all, for while the Rodney and Albion were under all sail, the Queen was sparing them lower and maintopmast studding sails, and passing them in the light breeze hand over hand. The Queen was the first round the Nab light, followed by the Rodney, Albion, Superb, Vanguard, which had passed the Canopus, and Trafalgar. During the time the vessels were making the Nab light, her Majesty was on the platform which connected the paddle-boxes, and appeared to take great interest in the scene before her, and in the trial of sailing between the line-of-battle ships. After passing the Nab light Her Majesty took the lead of the fleet. When off Dunmose, the signal was made for the fleet to form in two lines, the Admiral leading. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, with their Royal guests, then returned from sea, and proceeded to Osborne House, where they purposed remaining for a day or two. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager returned to Ryde shortly after five o'clock, and the experimental squadron proceeded on their course down Channel.

The Post-office.—From a return recently issued by order of Parliament, it appears that in the month ending 20th of June, 1840, 3,665,193 letters passed through the London General Post-office, inwards and outwards; in the month ending 19th of June, 1841, the number was 5,342,669; in that ending 18th of June, 1842, it amounted to 5,333,956; in that ending 17th of June, 1843, to 5,907,551; in the month ending 15th of June, 1844, to 6,202,389; and in the month ending on the 17th ult., to 6,906,331. The estimated average for four weeks in 1839, from the London district post, was 1,021,386; whilst for the month ending on the 17th ult., it amounted to 2,444,176. The net revenue of the Post-office of the United Kingdom in the year ending 5th Jan. 1839, amounted to 1,614,353*l.*; in the year ending 5th Jan. 1844, to 523,714*l.*; and in the year ending 5th Jan. 1845, to 610,724*l.* The total number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom in the year 1844 was 242 millions, which is an increase of nearly 22 millions on the previous year. The number before the reduction of the rate was 75 millions. In the London district, or old twopenny-post, the letters have more than doubled since the penny rate was established. The number of applications complaining of the miscarriage and loss of newspapers during the past year (in England), was 1792. (This number is exclusive of personal applications, and of applications relating to newspapers sent by cross country post, which the books of the office do not distinguish; but they are not numerous.). The number of newspapers found in the office with covers burst during the year was 55,016. The average number forwarded from St. Martin's-le-Grand each day, was 108,459. The number returned to the dead letter office in the year was 178,880; and the number of newspapers replaced in covers and forwarded with notice in the year, 9912. In Ireland, 16,300, and in Scotland, 10,970 papers lost their covers; and 20,287 in Ireland, and 2392 in Scotland, were returned to the dead letter office in the year.

Report of the Tithe Commissioners.—"Tithe Commission-office, May 31 and June 18. Sir,—It is our duty to report to you the progress of the commutation of tithes in England and Wales to the close of the year 1844. We have received notices that voluntary proceedings have commenced in 9594 tithe districts; of these notices 39 were received during the year 1844. We have received 6964 agreements, and confirmed 6616; of these, 87 have been received and 121 confirmed during the year 1844. 4545 notices for making awards have been issued, of which 674 were issued during the year 1844. We have received 3324 draughts of compulsory awards, and confirmed 2821; of these 643 have been received and 646 confirmed during the year 1844. We have received 8338 apportionments, and confirmed 7919; and of these 813 have been received and 1034 confirmed during the year 1844. In 9437 tithe districts, as will be seen from the above statement, the rent-charges to be hereafter paid have been finally established by confirmed agreements or confirmed awards. We have in our possession voluntary agreements and draughts of awards, as yet unconfirmed, which will include 851 additional tithe districts; and make a total, when completed, of 10,288 districts in which the tithes are commuted. We have to repeat our regret that no decision has been given on the disputed points arising out of the statute of the 2d and 3d of William IV., c. 100, commonly called Lord Tenterden's Act. In the numerous cases which must be determined by the final interpretation of that act we are at present unable to proceed with any confidence in our own decisions, or any hope that such decisions will be acquiesced in by the parties, or confirmed by the courts. This difficulty, of which we pointed out the existence and the consequences in our last report, becomes, of course, of more urgent importance as our labours in other respects draw nearer to their close. The disputes which existed as to the recovery of rent-charges due from railroads have been removed by a clause of the 7th and 8th of Victoria, c. 85. On the other points recommended for legislation we have found no reason to alter our opinion. We are glad to be able to state that the power we now possess of legalising exchanges of glebe lands and exchanges of rent-charges for a limited portion of land are found extensively useful. We venture to recommend, that before the tithe commission expires, similar power, perhaps slightly modified, should be invested in some permanent public body. The superintendence of the operation is attended by very little labour or difficulty. We have, &c. W. BLAMIRE, T. WENTWORTH BULLER, and R. JONES. To the Right Hon. Sir J. Graham, Bart."

Grain.—A statement of the septennial prices of each kind of grain, as prepared for the purposes of the Tithe Commission, in each year from 1835 to 1844 inclusive, has been prepared and printed by order of Parliament. It hence appears that the average prices of wheat, barley, and oats were, during the seven years preceding Christmas, 1835, 7*s.* 0½*d.*, 3*s.* 11½*d.*, and 2*s.* 9*d.* per imperial bushel respectively; in the seven years preceding Christmas 1836, 6*s.* 8½*d.*, 3*s.* 11¾*d.*, and 2*s.* 9*d.* respectively per imperial bushel; in the seven years preceding Christmas 1837, 6*s.* 6¾*d.*, 3*s.* 11¼*d.*, and 2*s.* 8½*d.*; in the seven years preceding Christmas 1838, 6*s.* 6½*d.*, 3*s.* 9¾*d.*, and 2*s* 8*d.*; in the seven years preceding Chrismas 1839, 6*s.* 9*d.*, 3*s.* 11¼*d.*, and 2*s.* 9½*d.*; in the seven years preceding Christmas 1840, 6*s.* 11¾*d.*, 4*s.* 1*d.*, and 2*s.* 10¾*d.*; in the seven years preceding Christmas 1841, 7*s.* 3¾*d.*, 4*s.* 2*d.*, and 2*s.* 11½*d.*; in the seven years preceding Christmas, 1842, 7*s.* 7½*d.*, 4*s.* 1¼*d.*, and 2*s.* 10½*d.*; in the seven years preceding Christmas, 1843, 7*s.* 7¾*d.*, 4*s.* 0½*d.*, and 2*s.* 9½*d.*; and in the seven years preceding Christmas, 1844, 7*s.* 7*d.*, 4*s.* 1¼*d.*, and 2*s.* 9*d.*

Foreign.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers are filled with the details of the massacre of an entire tribe of Arabs by the French troops in Algeria, under circumstances of great atrocity, and which, fortunately for humanity, is not frequently to be matched in the history of civilised nations. The following is the account given of this disgraceful act by the Akhbar, a journal published at Algiers under the direction of the Governor-General. The Akhbar of the 5th says:—

"There has just occurred in the Dahra one of those terrible events which deeply afflict those who witness them, even when convinced of their frightful necessity, and when they are justified in declaring that everything possible was done to prevent the catastrophe. It is known that the corps commanded by Colonels Pélissier, St. Arnaud, and De L'Admirault, have been carrying on combined operations in the west. Colonel Pélissier was busy in pursuing the Ouled Riahs, who have never yet submitted, as they live in immense caverns where it would be madness for the troops to enter. On the 18th June, finding themselves closely pursued, the Ouled Riahs flew to their usual place of refuge. After having surrounded the caverns, some faggots were lighted and thrown by the French troops before the entrance. After this demonstration, which was made to convince the Arabs that the French had the power, if they pleased, of suffocating them in their hiding-place, the Colonel threw in letters offering to them life and liberty if they would surrender their arms and their horses. At first they refused, but subsequently they replied that they would consent if the French troops would withdraw. This condition was considered inadmissible, and more burning faggots were thrown. A great tumult now arose, and it was known afterwards that it arose from a discussion as to whether there should be surrender or not. The party opposed to a surrender carried their point, and a few of the minority made their escape. Colonel Pélissier wishing to spare the lives of those who remained in the cavern, sent some Arabs to them to exhort them to surrender. They refused, and some women, who did not partake of the savage fanaticism of the majority, attempted to fly, but their husbands and relations fired upon them, to prevent their escape from the martyrdom which they had themselves resolved to suffer. Col. Pélissier then suspended the throwing of the burning faggots, and sent a French officer to hold parley with the Ouled Riahs, but his messenger was received with a discharge of fire-arms, and could not perform his mission. This state of things continued till the night of the 19th, when, losing all patience, and no longer having a hope of otherwise subduing these fanatics, who formed a perpetual nucleus of revolt in the country, the fire was renewed and rendered intense. During this time the cries of the unhappy wretches, who were being suffocated, were dreadful, and then nothing was heard but the crackling of the faggots. This silence spoke volumes. The troops entered and found 500 dead bodies. About 150, who still breathed, were brought into the fresh air, but all except 37 died afterwards."

The following is the Réforme's account of the horrible denouement:—

"On the morning of the 20th there remained but a mass of half consumed ashes, and nothing more was to be heard. We determined on entering the grotto. How can we describe the shocking aspect it presented? The cattle, rendered furious, crushing all around them—the men and women rushing about in order to prevent being suffocated and gored. We had to walk twenty steps over the bodies of the dead and dying. A thousand human beings were heaped up in this channel without an outlet. At the bottom of it were bodies standing up with their faces sticking to the fissures that they might breathe. About seventy who had survived expired the moment they were brought into the open air; others were killed by the fragments of rocks the heat had detached. A large number had received yataghan cuts, and bore the marks of deep wounds. A terrible struggle had no doubt taken place in the cavern, in that profound darkness. Already have nearly 600 dead bodies been extracted from the grotto; there are many more which it has been impossible to get at. 800 men, women, and children, have perished. The whole tribe of the Riahs is exterminated."

This fearful destruction of men, women, and children, who would inevitably have been reduced, by famine, to surrender, is actually praised by another Algiers print, in which the Governor-General is believed often to write. To the credit of the Paris papers, the horrible account is published by most of them with indignant or mournful remarks; the Courrier Francais, in particular, seems at a loss to find language strong enough to condemn what it justly pronounces an infamous crime. In the Chamber of Peers on Friday the business for the day was the discussion on the Paris and Lyons Railway Bill, but before much progress had been made in the debate, the Prince of Moskowa rose to put a question to Marshal Soult, relative to the massacre in the Dahra. He said that the Akhbar contained an account of a dreadful event which was happily without example and without precedent in the military history of the kingdom, according to which a French colonel had rendered himself guilty of an unjustifiable and unqualified act of cruelty with respect to some unhappy Arab prisoners. According to the accounts given of it, it was a premeditated murder upon conquered and defenceless prisoners. He then read, amidst the emotion of the Chamber, the account of this "terrible episode," as given by the Akhbar, and called upon the Minister of War, as a Peer and an officer, to say what the Government meant to do if the fact were true, or to deny it if it were false. Most of the members present appeared not to have heard of the affair before, and it produced a feeling of the greatest astonishment and disbelief. Marshal Soult, however, put an end to all doubt upon the subject. He did not deny the truth of the accounts published; he said that the accounts he had received were so contradictory, that he had thought it his duty to demand further information upon the subject. He added that the Government highly disapproved of what had been done, and that he had written to that effect to Marshal Bugeaud. Count de Montalembert, with almost universal approbation, observed upon the impression such an occurrence would produce in England and other foreign countries, and thought the word "disapproved" a very weak expression under the circumstances. He would rather say "with horror." Marshal Soult then added, that if the expression was not sufficiently strong, he had no hesitation whatever in adding that he "deplored" the event.—The Débats has advices from Tangiers of the 3d inst., which state that the Emperor of Morocco has at length ratified the treaty concluded with France on the 18th March last. The Chamber of Peers voted on Wednesday the extraordinary credits required to carry into effect the new convention for the repression of the slave-trade, by a majority of 94 to 8; and on Saturday voted the Paris and Lyons and the Lyons and Avignon Railroad Bill, without any amendment, by 81 to 21. The Chamber adopted 17 other Bills of mere local interest at the same sitting.—Several of the journals revert to the negotiations at Rome, which have ended in the dispersion of the Jesuits of France, and the closing of their houses. In reply to the assertion of the Univers, the Ministerial Journal des Débats again affirms that the negotiations were carried on solely with the Pontifical Court, and that not even a conference has taken place between the French Envoy, M. Rossi, and the General of the Jesuits. In connection with this affair, the papers state that on Sunday last the Professors of the College of France met to decide whether two of their colleagues, Messrs. Michelet and Quinet had not departed from their duty, and in their lectures professed doctrines hostile to the Catholic religion. At the opening of the meeting a letter of the Minister of Public Instruction was read, in which he complained of the irreligious and factious tendency of the lectures of those two professors. Agreeably to the wish expressed by the Minister, a first motion was made, which would energetically and expressly recommend to the Professors to conform to their programme. Messrs. Michelet and Quinet replied at considerable length, and declared that although the range of the lectures at the "College de France" ought not to be limited, they had never intended to exceed the bounds of their programmes. A resolution, moved by M. Elie de Beaumont, was ultimately agreed to by a majority of 17 to 7, whereby the meeting expressed themselves satisfied with the explanations of MM. Quinet and Michelet, and added that "none of the professors could have wished to exceed the limits of the programmes drawn up by them and approved of by the assembly." Upon this decision, if it can be called one, the Ministerial prints observe with displeasure, and the Opposition journals of the liberal party with great exultation; because the meeting had been convened by the Ministry, and the Government has, ever since the measures obtained at Rome against the Jesuits, been represented as having promised, in return, to check the attacks made by the professors on that society and the clergy.—A file of the Océanie Française, the French journal published at Otaheite, was received at Paris on Saturday. It extends to December last, but contains no political intelligence of any moment. Governor Bruat had, in November, made an excursion to the island of Morea, and paid visits to three English missionaries, by whom he is stated to have been received with much friendship.—The axle of the carriage of Marshal Soult gave way last week while proceeding rapidly to the Tuileries along the Quai D'Orsay. The wheel flew off, and the carriage fell over, and was in that state dragged about 20 yards ere the coachman could pull up. The Marshal, however, was not hurt, and was able to proceed to the Tuileries on foot. On the same day, General Count de la Sparre, one of the most distinguished soldiers of the old army, and who was in attendance on the Duc de Nemours at a review of some cavalry regiments, was struck with apoplexy, and fell dead from his horse. The Duke de Marmier, commandant of one of the brigades of the National Guard, died on the same day.—A funeral service for the repose of the soul of the Duke of Orleans was celebrated in the chapel of the Chamber of Peers and in the different parishes of Paris on Sunday, the anniversary of the Prince's death; and the usual solemn service was performed at Dreux in the presence of the royal family.—The Royal Court of Paris decided on Thursday that as duelling constitutes no crime or offence, there was no occasion to institute proceedings against M. de Beauvallon, and the four seconds who figured in the duel which terminated in the death of M. Dujarrier, responsible editor of the Presse. The Attorney General has appealed against this decision.—Letters from the south of France describe the present harvest as truly magnificent. All the hay (an immense crop) had been gathered in. The reaping of rye had become general, and the wheat and oats promised admirably. In short, a finer or more abundant season had not been known in that part of the country. More northward—that is, in the vicinity of Paris, the hay had all been saved. The thunder-storms which were so general throughout England on Sunday and Monday week, were felt with great severity in France, and were unusually destructive of human life, particularly in the neighbourhood of Honfleur, Rouen, and Paris. The steeple of the church of the new and favourite watering-place Trouville, near Honfleur, was destroyed.

SPAIN.—Telegraphic despatches have reached Paris, stating that insurrectionary movements have taken place in Catalonia which at first threatened to equal those which resulted in La Vendee, in France, from the enforcement of the conscription after the Revolution of 1830. These disturbances were caused by the quinta or levy of one man out of five for the military service. Barcelona and its district had hitherto, we should observe, been exempt from that exaction. From all accounts it appears that the insurrection spread with great rapidity. Igualada and Villafranca joined in the movement, and the result might have been serious but General Concha lost no time in marching against the insurgents. Igualada was entered without the slightest opposition. The central junta which had been established in that town was dissolved, and the insurrection was nearly put down everywhere. The outbreak was of a local character, and did not spread beyond the district round Barcelona, which alone was aggrieved by having the law of conscription applied to it. The measures taken by the Captain-General for its suppression having been successful, it is probable that it will not have the effect of stopping the Queen's visit to the Basque provinces.

SWITZERLAND.—The ordinary session of the Swiss Diet opened on the 7th inst., at Zurich. The whole corps diplomatique, with the exception of the Apostolical Nuncio, were present. The Burgomaster Furrer delivered a speech on the occasion, in which he recommended peace and conciliation, condemned in strong terms every attempt that might be made to excite fresh disturbances, and, whilst maintaining the right which Switzerland had to provide for her own internal government, urged that she was also bound to fulfil the obligations imposed upon her by her international relations. The diet then heard the Vorort's report, after which the usual preliminary operations took place.

ITALY.—Letters from Rome in a German paper allude to a circumstance similar to those which have recently been the topic of conversation in the literary circles in London, and in which certain literary men of considerable notoriety are concerned. It appears by the accounts from Rome that a nephew of the celebrated paleagraph, Amati, was arrested in his lodgings on the night of the 22d ult., and conveyed to the Castle of St. Angelo. He frequented the Vatican Library, and made extracts from rare manuscripts, but he had taken the liberty of cutting off the leaves of several of them, and pocketing them. It is, however, said that political motives have also led to his apprehension.—In few parts of Europe does there appear more activity in the construction of railroads than in the Sardinian states. In a very short time the lines which will run from Genoa to Switzerland, through Lombardy and to France, and that which will connect Turin with Chambery, will be finished. The Swiss Government has acquiesced in the request of that of Bavaria for permission to continue a railroad across the cantons of Schaffhausen, Zurich, and Thurgovia, to the Lake of Constance.

DENMARK.—A réunion lately took place at Copenhagen that would seem the precursor of important events in the north of Europe. "The Scandinavian fêtes," says the Mercury of Altona, "are over, and it is not doubtful that the incidents which marked them will exercise great influence upon the development and progress of 'the Scandinavian union' among the people. The cry at Cologne is, 'No more Prussia! No more Austria! Germany, and Germany alone!' In like manner, the cry we have just heard at Copenhagen was, 'No more Sweden! No more Norway! No more Denmark! Scandinavia, and Scandinavia alone!'"

GREECE.—The Athens papers state that a court of inquiry has been appointed to examine into the nature of the quarrel between Generals Calergi and Grivas, so that there is no truth in the rumour circulated by the French papers, that the former was killed by the latter. The Greek Ministry has conferred the rank of commander of the royal order of the Saviour upon General Grivas, although that person is at the present moment on his trial before a court of inquiry for an assault upon and an attempt to assassinate Colonel Stratos and his brother. The proceedings in the Legislature are not important. The Grand Duke Constantine was expected to pay a visit to Athens. Two deputies were to be sent to Constantinople to invite him, in the name of the Greek people. It was thought probable that Generals Calergi and Christides would be the deputies chosen.

TURKEY.—By the Levant mail we have received accounts from Constantinople of the 27th and from Smyrna to the 28th ult. The visit of the young Grand Duke of Russia had been the occasion of great rejoicings. His Imperial Highness, though holding the rank of Vice-Admiral, has assumed, with a view, it is pretended, of keeping down the excitement of the Greek population, the incognito of a naval lieutenant, studiously shunning public honours in the way of salutes, guards of honour, and so forth. Strange to say, however, the less he has courted public attention the more it has been pressed upon him, as well by the Sultan as by the Greeks. The occasion upon which these demonstrations were most enthusiastic was the visit of the Grand Duke to Baluklee, the church of the miraculous fishes (to which is attached a legend connected with the taking of the city), outside the gates of Constantinople. The whole of the way was crowded with Greeks, many of whom threw themselves upon their knees in the path, hailing him by the title of Orthodox. At the mosque of St. Sophia also, which is hallowed by so many associations, both religious and historical, eager multitudes precipitated themselves after the Duke, as he entered; and the efforts not only of the Turks, but also of the Russian attendants, to exclude them were altogether unavailing. M. Titoff, the Russian Minister, also exerted himself to prevent any disturbance or scandalous proceeding, but could not check the transports of fanatic joy with which the Greeks revisited the temple of their ancestors; and hundreds were seen rapturously kissing the walls and embracing the pillars. A rumour had been current that the Emir Beschir and his sons had been murdered on their route to their place of exile, but it proves to be altogether false. The accounts from Syria are rather more satisfactory.

BRAZILS.—Letters from Rio, to the 25th May, state that the proposed discriminating duty on British cotton goods, imposed in retaliation for the discriminating duties on Brazilian sugar, had received the assent of both Chambers, and was to come into force on the 1st July. This is an increase of 20 per cent. on the amount of the previous duty, which was, as nearly as possible, 30 per cent. on the value of the goods, so that the future duties on English cottons will be equal to about 36 per cent. on their value, whilst those on foreign cottons will be 30. No discriminating duties are imposed on any other articles of British produce, and the Brazilian Government is authorised to repeal the exclusive duties on British cottons whenever the British Government shall reduce the discriminating duties on Brazilian sugar. Mr. Gore Ouseley, our new Minister to Buenos Ayres, had arrived in the Firebrand steamer.

UNITED STATES AND TEXAS.—The Caledonia steamer arrived at Liverpool on Monday, with New York papers to the 1st inst. The only item of much interest is the proclamation of President Anson Jones, of Texas, announcing officially the proposition of Mexico to treat unconditionally as to the independence of Texas, and ordering a cessation of hostilities in consequence. The document was promulgated at Washington, Texas, on the 4th June. It contains a passage in which the President states that the people will soon have to determine the question through their representatives in Congress; "but in the mean time, and until their pleasure can be lawfully and constitutionally ascertained, it is the duty of the Executive to secure to the nation the exercise of choice between the alternatives of peace with the world and independence, or annexation and its contingencies." The publication of the proclamation created no little excitement in Texas. The particulars of the negotiation or treaty did not accompany it, but it was generally understood that the articles were few in number, and related only—1, to the recognition of independence; 2, the refusal of Texas to be annexed to the United States, or any other power; 3, the establishment of boundaries; 4, the providing of an arbitration in case of disagreement as to the boundary. President Jones appeared to be viewed with distrust by the annexation party, and his sentiments were much canvassed. The election of delegates to the Convention of the 4th July was proceeding. The returns, according to the accounts in the New Orleans papers, being almost unanimous in favour of the scheme of annexation, but we can find no data upon which to form any accurate opinion. The New York papers discuss the conduct of President Jones in warm terms of almost universal condemnation, and the significant description of the alternatives to be submitted to the people of Texas on the 4th July—"Independence with peace, or annexation with its contingencies"—appears to have been anything but palatable. The near approach of the period at which this important question would be set at rest, the uncertainty attending the decision of the citizens of Texas, joined with the doubts entertained as to the preservation of peace, should the annexation scheme be preferred, had combined to produce a certain degree of agitation in commercial affairs.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—By late accounts from the Cape we learn that the Dutch Boers, beyond the Orange River, have been again rebellious. It seems that they were desirous of seizing the territory of the Griquas, whom we are bound by a treaty to protect, and that preparations were in progress among the Boers for exterminating the native tribe from their rich and fertile district. Troops were immediately sent to the frontier, and the Cape papers of the 18th May announce the fact of Colonel Richardson, of the 7th Dragoon Guards, having attacked and routed the Boers on the 29th April. Although the result of the skirmish appears to have been some loss of life on the part of the Boers, such was the good effect of it, that numbers immediately came forward and tendered their allegiance to the Government. The conduct of Colonel Richardson and his dragoons is much praised in the transaction.

NEW ZEALAND.—Further details have been received of the disastrous conflict in New Zealand, of which we gave an outline in our last. The most connected account is that contained in the following letter, addressed to the Secretary to Lloyd's, by their agent at Auckland. It is dated March 28, and is as follows:—"I deem it my duty to apprise you of the calamity which has befallen the oldest settlement, and perhaps the best harbour in New Zealand. The aborigines about the Bay of Islands have latterly been getting discontented, in consequence of the falling off in trade, and considerable decrease in the number of ships visiting that port—a falling off which they cannot account for, except that it be caused through the interference of Government. This notion having got possession of their minds, they have declared war against the British flag, and a chief of the name of Heki, a ringleader, prior to the 11th inst., had twice succeeded in cutting down the flagstaff, which was a third time ordered to be erected again by the Government, and 50 soldiers, accompanied by H.M.S. Hazard, of 18 guns, sent to protect it; these forces were assisted by the inhabitants, enrolled as special constables. The town was attacked by the natives at daylight of the morning of the 11th inst., and I am sorry to inform you that the natives succeeded in driving the whole European population from the settlement, and compelling them to take refuge on board the ships in the harbour, making their escape with but little more than what they had on their backs. The town, being now entirely in the hands of the natives, was plundered of everything, and property amounting to 30,000*l.* has fallen into the hands of the savages. The loss of life on the part of the Europeans was not great, being 10 in number killed, and 15 wounded. Amongst the latter is Captain Robertson, of H.M.S. Hazard, who is dangerously wounded, having four musket-balls in his legs and arm. This gallant officer, with about 30 men, most nobly, and with the most exemplary courage, resisted the combined attack of about 400 well armed savages, and had actually repulsed and beaten them back when he got severely wounded and fell. The fate of the day was just about this time decided against the Europeans by a body of natives, with Heki at at their head, having surprised and taken a musket-proof blockhouse, which stood close by the flag-staff. The number of natives killed and wounded during the engagement has not been ascertained, but there must have been a considerable number. The Governor, Captain Fitzroy, anticipating native disturbances, wrote to Sydney for troops about two months ago, but, unfortunately, they did not arrive here until the 23d inst., by H.M.S. North Star. At present there is not a sufficient force in the colony to retake the settlement at the Bay, but I believe it is the intention of the Government to blockade the port, so that, if this is the case, the many whale ships which were in the habit of visiting the Bay of Islands will now in all probability visit this port. It is impossible for any one to say where or when these disturbances will end; that the New Zealanders have been greatly underrated is now apparent. The Home Government will now be undeceived that the peaceable possession of this colony could be maintained by about 100 soldiers against a native population of 120,000. To maintain our position even in the towns, not one less than a thousand regular troops can do so, and unless this force is sent the colony is not worth living in." Another letter gives some account of the manner in which the natives surprised the block-house—a circumstance, by the way, which shows that they were no common assailants, and also that there was a deficiency of military organisation on the part of the English. It states that "On hearing the firing, the garrison, consisting of Ensign Campbell and 20 men, rushed out to see whereabouts the noise came from, leaving five behind. He was no sooner gone than the natives, who were lying in the fern close to the block-house, rushed out and shot two of the sentinels. Of the rest two retreated to the block-house, while the fifth, finding himself cut off, escaped into the bush. The natives fired upon the block-house, killed the two sentinels and another man they found with them, and then drove Campbell's party down the hill to the lower block-house. The party from the Hazard were ordered to retreat to the stockade at the other end of the town, and killed several of the natives upon their way. At 1 o'clock the stockade unfortunately blew up, by which several persons were wounded, and this being the last possession, the ship's party was obliged to return back to the vessel." All the officers of the Hazard and of the marines are mentioned with great praise on this occasion, and none more than Lieut. Philpotts, for the energy with which, under extreme danger, he secured the safety of the women and children. The late inhabitants of the Bay have many obligations to acknowledge to Mr. Polack, to whose kindness they were much indebted, and who suffered severely in the affair. The Bishop of New Zealand was an active witness and participator in this business, and it is only due to him to record, that it is impossible for praise to exceed that with which his exertions are described. In the midst of the contest, Dr. Selwyn was seen bearing the wounded from the field, and afterwards at the bed-side of the dying as the nurse, surgeon, and servant of the sick, as well as their spiritual attendant. Of the civilians who took part in the contest, Messrs. Stewart and Hewlings are mentioned as prominent for their gallantry. The Rev. Mr. Williams made it his business, before the attack, to allay all apprehensions, and to give every assurance of security against the attack of the Maories, although Mr. Mair had promulgated the positive certainty of the attack by daybreak. The town of Kororarika is thoroughly sacked, burnt, and destroyed. The amount of the loss of life on the natives' part is variously stated, but it is said the nearest approximation to the truth would be about 70 killed and wounded. The amount of property cannot be estimated, but the loss of merchandise is said to be little short of 40,000*l.*

Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday.—The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table the report of the committee appointed to search for precedents in reference to the privilege case of Harlow v. Baker; and moved that the petitioner and his attorney be called to the bar, to identify the transaction, and prove the facts set forth in the petition.—Mr. Baker and his attorney, Mr. Barnes, of the firm of Lyons, Barnes, and Ellis, were called in and examined. Mr. Baker stated that the words contained in the declaration exactly corresponded with part of the evidence given by him before the committee of inquiry into the gaming laws; and that he had never used those words except before the said committee. Mr. Barnes communicated the names of plaintiff in the action of his attorney, and produced the original declaration.—On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, John Harlow, tobacconist, of 16, Leicester-square, the plaintiff, and his attorney, Peter Tait Harbin, of Clement's-inn, were ordered to attend at their lordships' bar on Monday.—The Earl of DALHOUSIE, in laying on the table a minute relative to the Board of Trade, recounted the circumstances under which the Railway Department of that Board had been constituted, by a resolution of the House of Commons, for the purpose of specially reporting on railway projects. It had been stated as a fact that, out of all the reports made by the railway committee, only one had been confirmed by the House of Commons, and it had been reversed by the House of Lords. This would, indeed, be curious, if it were a fact. But out of 247 schemes, involving about 8000 miles of new railway, which had been submitted to the railway department, there had been 151 favourably reported on, of which only six had failed in the House of Commons, arising from compromises or change of circumstances, while 121 had been absolutely confirmed. But it has been determined by Government to discontinue this railway department, as a distinct branch of the Board of Trade, for reporting on the merits of new railway schemes. Henceforth the Board of Trade will overlook railroads, in the capacity of standing counsel for the public, and reporting whenever they think it necessary for the public convenience and security, but no future report is to enter into the merits of any particular scheme.—Lord BROUGHAM designated this new arrangement as that sort of change which was made when the natural body was consigned to its parent earth and decomposition took place. The Railway Board was now honoured with the decent ceremonials of interment, and the noble earl had very naturally delivered its funeral oration. But if, up to its lamented decease, it had been in the full exercise of its mental and bodily functions—if it were so virtuous, discreet, and industrious—the House should be informed of the causes of death. There was ground for suspecting murder or foul play, and Mr. Wakley should sit on the body, in order to discover if it were put to death by violence, or died by suicide. Referring to the mode in which time and money were consumed in the advocacy of conflicting schemes before committees, he affirmed that Mr. Hudson—"King Hudson"—was working in the committee on the London and York line with a twelve-counsel power. His object was delay, in order to prevent a report being made during the present session; and counsel would of course talk as long as Mr. Hudson chose to spend money. In fact, this railway potentate was as much pleased with a six hours' speech from the counsel opposed to him as with a six hours' speech from his own counsel; but he hoped that the committee would not allow themselves to be Hudsoned, but disappoint him by reporting on the Bill this session.—Lord FEVERSHAM stated, amidst loud calls of order, that Mr. Hudson, who was present, and had heard Lord Brougham's observations, had authorised him to contradict the allegation that he was interfering with the committee.—Lord BROUGHAM retorted that the only sovereign entitled to be present in that House was her Majesty; the railway potentate had no right to be there. Lord Brougham then moved the consideration of one of his resolutions respecting railways, which he proposes to be made a standing order.—In the course of the discussion the Earl of DEVON objected to Lord Brougham speaking nine times on the same motion.—Lord BROUGHAM replied that when the noble earl sat as a clerk at the table of the House, he was then obliged to listen to him.—The Earl of DEVON declined to make any comment on the good taste evinced in this allusion, and declared that whenever he found Lord Brougham violating the orders of the House he would interfere, and call upon the House to express its opinion.—The Documentary Evidence Bill and the Law of Real Property Bill were read a third time and passed.

Monday.—The Duke of WELLINGTON brought up the Irish Colleges Bill, which was read a first time.—On the motion of Lord COTTENHAM, the Drainage by Tenants for Life Bill was re-committed.—Lord STANLEY laid on the table a Bill to amend the regulations relative to the sale of waste lands in Australia, which was read a first time.—The Earl of DEVON withdrew, for the present session, the Bill which he had proposed relative to the granting of leases, and to certain alterations in the law of ejectments, in Ireland.—On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, John Harlow, and his attorney, P. T. Harbin, were examined at the bar touching the action brought against Thomas Baker for evidence given by him before a committee of their lordships, to inquire into the operation of the Gaming Laws. Harlow admitted that he had brought his action for words spoken in evidence before the committee, and refused to pledge himself to discontinue the action. Harbin avowed that the action was founded on the words spoken in evidence before their lordship's committee, and that it was brought on by the advice of counsel. He added that he had received from his client no instruction to discontinue proceedings.—The LORD CHANCELLOR moved "that John Harlow has been guilty of a breach of the privilege of this House."—Lord BROUGHAM said, that he could not but congratulate himself that in the four years during which he had presided over the House it had not fallen to his lot to make such a motion as that he had just heard. It was not that he was ignorant of the true nature of Parliamentary privilege; on the contrary, he was well acquainted with it long before he became a member of the House; but while he admitted its value when restrained within due limits, he had never failed to attack with all his energy its undue assertion. On the present occasion he was called to assent to the lawless power claimed by each House, that of declaring, from time to time, what its privileges were, and in what a breach of them consisted. Against such a claim he must enter his protest in the name of the Crown, the people of England, the other branches of the Legislature, and, finally, of the highest court of law of the land—the ultimate court of error—which was an emanation of their own authority. In the present instance the House proposed, by the force of its privilege, to stop an action lawfully commenced in Westminster-hall; but though they might commit all the parties, the action would still go on, until at last it might come before the judicial tribunal of the House as an appeal, and then their privileges and their regular jurisdiction would clash. It was said that the House must protect its witnesses; but such a protection was only meant to extend to violence and illegal interference, and not to shield witnesses who made false statements liable to action, as was asserted in the present case. The noble lord then proceeded at great length to expose the futility of straining the privileges of the House, and the absurdities into which it would be led in the hunt after precedents; and concluded by imploring their Lordships to leave the matter in the hands of the judges, who would be the first to show respect to the House, and the last to shrink from supporting its privileges.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after explaining the position in which he had been placed when the House ordered the select committee of inquiry, thought that there could be no doubt that Parliament had conducted itself on several occasions in a tyrannical manner in matters of privilege; but the question at present was, whether the House should interpose its authority to stay proceedings taken against a person for doing what he had been compelled to do as a witness before one of its committees? He was surprised at the statement made by Lord Brougham, that the House ought not to interfere to stay an action at law when it was the daily practice of the Court of Chancery to interfere for this purpose. However ridiculous some of the precedents adduced might be, still there could be no doubt that the power claimed on the present occasion was essential to the privileges of the House, and their lordships would do well to recollect that unless their privileges were asserted, they might be abandoned and lost.—Lord CAMPBELL said, that however great the unpopularity attending the course proposed, he was quite ready to bear his share of it, as he was convinced it was the only constitutional way of proceeding in the matter. He then proceeded to show the great benefits which the public had derived from the assertion of Parliamentary privilege, and adduced a number of precedents from the time of Richard II. to support his view. With reference to trusting the privileges of the House in the hands of the judges, as proposed by Lord Brougham, he could only say that he considered it most unsafe; and if this action were allowed to go on, action after action would be brought, till every privilege of Parliament would be invaded. He pronounced himself to be now the uncompromising adviser of commitments in all cases, and recanted his former opinion in favour of pleading—for having given which opinion to the House of Commons he was very sorry.—After a few words from the Earl of WICKLOW, who advised the House to be very cautious, as their precedents were doubtful, and their privileges unpopular, the motion was put and agreed to, and John Harlow was committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod. A conversation then arose respecting the comparative guilt of the plaintiff and his attorney, in the course of which Lord Brougham signified to the House that John Harlow had instructed his attorney to discontinue the action, and suggested to the House the policy of proceeding no further.—The LORD CHANCELLOR said he thought the attorney the more guilty of the two, and had no objection to a mild course. A resolution was then agreed to, that Peter Tait Harbin had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and he was committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black Rod.—On the motion of the Duke of BEAUFORT, the Dog-stealing Bill passed through committee. The Public Works (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

Tuesday.—The Constables Public Works (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.—In answer to Lord MONTEAGLE, Lord STANLEY stated that he believed there would be found great difficulty in engrafting the modifications designed by Government in the Landlords and Tenants (Ireland) Bill: still he did not give up the hope of being yet enabled to lay the amended Bill before their lordships. However, he felt bound in fairness to give notice that he had no intention of calling on the House to express an opinion on the Bill in the present session.—Lord BROUGHAM presented petitions from John Harlow and his attorney, P. T. Harbin, expressing their contrition for having committed a breach of the privilege of the House, praying for pardon, and promising to discontinue the action against Mr. Baker. The noble and learned lord moved their discharge on payment of the fees. The motion was agreed to. Harlow and Harbin were called to the bar, admonished by the Lord Chancellor, and discharged from the custody of the Black Rod, on payment of the customary fees.—Lord CAMPBELL gave notice that he should, early next session, introduce a Bill to enable the two Houses of Parliament, when an action was brought in violation of their privileges, to stop that action in the same manner as actions are now stayed for the publication of papers published under the orders of the House.—On the motion of Lord STANLEY, the Foreign Lotteries Bill passed through committee.—The Earl of CLARENDON submitted a resolution, to the effect that the produce of Spain and her colonies should be admitted on the same terms as that of the most favoured nations. He disclaimed all party motives; contended that Spain had, by ancient as well as modern treaties, a right to be treated in all respects as the most favoured nation; charged the Government with digging up the dead and buried letter of an old treaty, and constructing it after the manner of special pleaders, instead of according to the rules of enlightened, generous, and liberal policy; condemned them for drawing a distinction between the produce of the state and its subjects, in the construction of treaties—a distinction which he declared to be before unheard of—and principally blamed them for granting to the United States and to Venezuela that which they refused to Spain. On this last point, he said that the United States stood towards Great Britain, like Spain, in the position of the most favoured nation; but the different conduct pursued by us towards them indicated that our policy was governed by other motives than those of justice and honour—that we had one law for the rich and powerful, and another law for the poor and weak.—The Earl of ABERDEEN, notwithstanding the disclaimer of party motives, said he suspected that had it not been for the general policy which Government had adopted in respect to foreign sugars, they would not have heard of this claim on the part of Spain, nor Lord Clarendon's speech in support of that claim. The conduct of Spain, from the time of the Family Compact down to the present, was one uninterrupted denial of the "liberal" construction which it was now attempted to establish. The Government had no desire to take credit to themselves for a "generous, enlightened, or liberal" construction of old or new treaties; but they were resolved to give the strict interpretation which the words of the treaties themselves, and subsequent acts of the contracting parties, distinctly pointed out. He repudiated the charge of having been influenced in his decision on the respective claims of Spain and the United States by the power or weakness of the nation. The distinction he had drawn between the subjects and the produce of foreign countries was one that he was compelled to make, the ancient treaties having considered the persons and not the produce, while the modern treaties provided for the produce rather than the persons to be entitled to the same privileges as those of the most favoured nations. In conclusion, Lord Aberdeen said that the subject had been calmly considered by Government in connection with existing treaties, and the conclusion they had come to was founded on the strict, authorised, and just interpretation of these treaties, and was in perfect accordance with the policy sanctioned by successive Parliaments. He therefore opposed the motion.—The Earl of RADNOR said a few words in support of the motion, after which their lordships divided. For the motion, 14; Against it, 28; Majority, 14.

Thursday.—The Inclosure Bill, and the Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill, were brought up from the Commons and read a first time. Lord BROUGHAM's Railway Recognisance Bill was read a second time, and his lordship promised to inform the House next day, whether or not he would proceed with the Bill, or propose a resolution instead.—Lord CAMPBELL's Law of Defamation and Libel Amendment Bill, the Dog-stealing Bill, and the Constables Public Works (Ireland) Bill were read a third time.—The Earl of ABERDEEN introduced a Bill to facilitate the apprehension of offenders who shall escape to foreign countries, which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday.—Mr. BENNET took his seat for West Suffolk.—On the order of the day for the House resolving itself into committee on the Lunatics Bill, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE made a vigorous effort to stop the further progress of the Bill for the present session—first, by two ineffectual endeavours to count out the House, and afterwards by moving that it be committed that day three months.—In the course of the discussion Sir J. GRAHAM took upon himself the whole responsibility of the measure, which he described as one well calculated to confer great benefit on the public.—Lord ASHLEY defended the enactments of the Bill at great length, and pointed out their great superiority over the present law. He protested against the injustice of considering the Bill as partaking in any degree of the character of a job, and entreated the House to pass it without delay, if it wished to put an end to evils and cruelties which were a disgrace to the country.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, in reply, contended that the Bill would not give the protection to pauper lunatics which they required, and that it would not prevent the seizure and detention of persons who were perfectly sane, under the pretext that they were insane.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD and Lord DUNCAN supported, and Mr. V. SMITH and Sir J. GRAHAM opposed Mr. T. Duncombe in the obstruction which he offered to the Bill.—The House divided on Mr. T. Duncombe's amendment, which was negatived by a majority of 66 over a single vote. It was then agreed that the committee should be postponed, and that no objection should be made to the proposal for committing the Bill on Tuesday.—At the 5 o'clock sitting Sir J. Y. BULLER presented a petition from Mr. Phillips, the plaintiff in the late privilege case of Phillips v. Jasper Parrott, praying the House to grant him the means of disproving the evidence given by Mr. Parrott, and to enable him to recover damages for the injuries he had sustained in consequence of that alleged false evidence. The hon. Baronet gave notice that on Monday he should submit a motion on the subject.—Mr. DIVETT presented a counter petition from Mr. Parrott. The petitioner prayed for an opportunity to substantiate the truth of his statements, and alleged that Mr. Phillips had not been deprived of any office in consequence of the evidence of the petitioner.—On the order of the day for going into committee on the Poor-law Amendment (Scotland) Bill, Mr. HUME urged on Government the propriety of adding this Bill to the list of important measures which are postponed till next session. If passed in its present shape it would create much litigation, and would lead inevitably to the introduction of a Bill to amend its defects during the next session.—Mr. EWART and Mr. P. M. STEWART joined in the recommendation, the latter declaring the Bill to be generally unpopular in Scotland.—Sir J. GRAHAM replied, that on all sides it was admitted that the law required amendment. There had been ample and impartial inquiry into the subject, and the present Bill was the result of serious consideration on the part of Government. It had been sanctioned by a large majority of the House on the second reading, and he saw no reason for now arresting its progress in committee.—After some [illegible] which Mr. LOCKHART, Mr. GIBSON CRAIG, Mr. HASTIE, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, and other members took part, an amendment proposed by Colonel RAWDON, that the Bill be committed that day three months, was rejected by 90 to 38. After this the debate was continued, but at last the House went into committee on the Bill; and after a night's discussion and two divisions, clauses down to 55 inclusive were agreed to. The Grand Jury Presentments (Dublin) Bill, the Spirits (Ireland) Bill, and the Excise Duties (Channel Islands) Bill were read a second time.—The Borough and Watch Rate Bill, the Joint Stock Companies Bill, and the Art-Unions Bill passed through committee.—The Bankruptcy Declaration Bill was read a third time.

Monday.—At a morning sitting the Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics' Bill was reported. The Lunatics Asylum (Ireland) Bill passed through committee. The Turnpike Acts Continuation Bill, the Loan Societies Bill, the Highway Rates Bill, and the Militia Ballots Bill, were read a second time. In the evening sittings, in reply to a question put by Mr. HARDY relative to the collision which had recently taken place between the natives and the English settlers, Mr. G. W. HOPE informed the House that despatches, dated the 26th of March, had been received from Captain Fitzroy. Those despatches gave an account of the attack made on the town of the Bay of Islands by the natives of New Zealand in an armed body consisting of 1000 men. The natives, after capturing the blockhouse were driven out of it by Captain Robertson (who was wounded very severely) and a small party of seamen and marines under his command. Owing, however, to two unfortunate accidents—the explosion of the powder magazine, and the spiking of the guns in the second blockhouse without orders—it was determined to take off the settlers. No settler had lost his life, except one gentleman, who had been killed by the explosion of the powder magazine. The loss of the troops, seamen, and civilians, altogether, was 15 killed and 23 wounded; but the loss of the natives, though it could not be accurately ascertained, was supposed to be very considerable. The settlers generally had been removed to Auckland, but the missionaries remained in the Bay of Islands with their houses and churches untouched. The natives were well armed, many with American rifles, and displayed considerable skill and courage. Troops had arrived after the date of this event from Sydney, and had restored a considerable degree of confidence at Auckland.—Mr. HUME announced his intention of abandoning his motion respecting the recall of Lord Ellenborough during this session.—After some other questions had been put to and answered by the different members of Government, public business commenced by Sir G. CLERK moving that the House resolve itself into a committee on the Coal Trade (Port of London) Bill.—After a few words from Mr. HUME and Mr. HUTT, in opposition to the motion on a point of form, the House went into committee. The Bill passed through committee, after an ineffectual attempt on the part of several members to abolish the duty of 1*d.* per ton now levied upon coal brought within the liberties of the city of London, coastwise or by inland navigation.—The House then resumed, and on the motion of the LORD ADVOCATE for Scotland, the House went into committee on the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill. The rest of the night was consumed in the consideration of the clauses of the Bill; and after much discussion and several divisions, the clauses down to the 71st inclusive were agreed to.—On the motion of Mr. S. HERBERT, the Militia Estimates were considered in a Committee of Supply, and agreed to, after a few remarks from Mr. WILLIAMS upon their amount.

Tuesday.—At an early sitting, the Borough Rates and Watch Bill was read a third time and passed; and the Turnpike Acts, the Loan Societies, and the Highway Rates Bill, passed through committees. The House went into committee on the Pauper Lunatics Asylum Bill, and after four hours' discussion, and three divisions, the first four clauses were agreed to. The House then took half an hour's rest. At the evening sitting, several Railway Bills were forwarded.—Sir R. PEEL, in reply to Mr. LABOUCHERE, stated that a Brazilian mail had arrived with letters from the British Minister at Rio, of dates down to the 24th May, and that these letters did not contain any allusion to the reported differential duties on British cottons said to have been imposed by the Brazilian Chamber of Deputies.—Lord PALMERSTON moved an address to the Queen, praying Her Majesty to direct that the subjects of the Queen of Spain should be permitted to import into the United Kingdom all the productions of the territories or possessions of the Spanish Crown, paying thereupon no higher duties of Customs than are paid by the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nations, on the importation of like articles being the production of the territories or possessions of such nations. The arguments used by the noble lord were precisely the same in substance as those urged by Lord Clarendon in the House of Peers. He contended that the treaty of 1670 did not exclude the West Indian colonies of Spain and Great Britain from the benefits of the treaties of 1667 and 1713, and denied that the two last treaties which he had named warranted the conclusion of Lord Aberdeen—namely, that though there was an obligation imposed upon England to treat the subjects of Spain as the subjects of the most favoured nation, there was no obligation to treat the produce of Spain as England was used to treat the produce of the most favoured nation. The astonishment of the country was inexpressible on hearing that Ministers had rested our case on such a paltry pettifogging village attorney's argument: but he was not astonished at it; for he knew that there was nothing but this pettifogging quibble to rest on. He then contended that the argument of Lord Aberdeen in reply to the claim of Spain was inconsistent with the plain and simple meaning which any man of common sense would put upon the treaties between the countries. He designated it as a disgraceful mockery of justice, and observed that if he should be told that it could be justified by the opinion of the Crown lawyers, he should reply that it mattered not, for the present was not a question of law, but a question of honesty. Had Government, however, considered the consequences which were likely to accrue from their present doctrine, that the treaties between England and Spain applied to persons, and not to produce; and that we were entitled to levy higher duties on the sugars of Spain than on the like articles of other countries? They had sacrificed the good name and good faith of the country, which had lived through all the storms and difficulties of England, whether her arms were defeated or triumphant. Never hitherto had the good faith of England been brought into question. Mr. Wilberforce had once observed, that we were too honest to deal with the Governments of the Continent. He thought, had Mr. Wilberforce lived to the present day, he would have retracted his censure on foreign Governments, and his calumnium on our own. We had given very bad reasons for adopting a very bad course—we had set an example which, if followed up, must entail much damage upon the country—we had given up the engagements of two centuries for no other reason than a senseless wish to maintain a distinction raised on no intelligible ground, which it would have been much wiser to have abandoned without a word. Thinking, then, that the answer given and the decision adopted were not founded on the true interpretation of treaties, and that the course of Government was highly detrimental to the commercial interests of the country, he called upon the House to combine with him in imploring the Crown to take a different and more honest course.—Mr. GLADSTONE, on the part of Government, though avowing himself "not at present connected with the Government," replied to Lord Palmerston. He entered into a minute and critical review of each of the 12 different commercial treaties which the Government of England has concluded with the Government of Spain during the last 200 years, and of the commercial practice which has grown up under them, for the purpose of showing that it was unwarranted and almost extravagant to state that the treaties on which Lord Palmerston had rested the claims of Spain had now complete existence. He did not mean to say that those treaties were annulled altogether, but he showed that whatever those treaties might be, they were distinguished in many important particulars from the other treaties which stood on the list of our engagements.—Mr. LABOUCHERE professed himself unable to comprehend the nice and intricate subtleties in which Mr. Gladstone had complicated the whole question. He thought that Spain had a right to the claim she had advanced; but even if she had not a strict and literal claim, on grounds of liberal policy we were bound to accede to the demand, and put the least restricted interpretation on the treaties we had with them.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL defended the construction put by Lord Aberdeen on the treaties, and opposed the motion.—Mr. F. T. BARING supported it.—Sir G. CLERK and Mr. BARCLAY followed, amidst the impatience of the House, which had been sitting nearly 14 hours.—Lord PALMERSTON then replied, and the House divided:—For the motion, 87; against it, 175. Majority against it, 88. On the motion of Sir J. Y. BULLER, a select committee was appointed to investigate the allegations contained in the petition of David Phillips, relative to the evidence given by Mr. Jasper Parrott. The Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill, the Land Revenue Act Amendment Bill, the Rothwell Prison Bill, and the Church Building Acts Amendment Bill passed through committee.

Wednesday.—The House met at noon. The reports of the Loan Societies Bill, of the Highway Rates Bill, of the Militia Ballots Suspension Bill, of the Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill, and of the Land Revenue Bill were received. The Ecclesiastical Patronage (Ireland) Bill, and the Drainage (Ireland) Bill passed through committee. The remaining clauses of the Lunatics Bill were agreed to in committee. At ½ past 4 the House was counted out.

Thursday.—At the early sitting the Highway Rates Bill, the Militia Ballots Suspension Bill, the Loan Societies Bill, the Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill, and the Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill, were read a third time and passed. The Commons Inclosure Bill was read a third time, and a clause added to it providing remuneration to the poor for manure and growing crops.—On the passing of the Bill Mr. S. CRAWFORD divided the House. There were—For the passing of the Bill, 48; against it, 0; majority, 48.—The Drainage of Lands Bill passed through committee with some verbal amendments. The Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics Bill was read a third time and passed, after the 6th clause, which exempted the parishes of Marylebone, St. Pancras, and St. George's, from the operation of the Bill, had been withdrawn. The Fisheries (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.—At the evening sitting the Death by Accidents Compensation Bill and the Deodands Abolition Bill were read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Wednesday.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL consented to the second reading of the first, with the reservation that he must not be considered as acceding to its principle. To the principle of the latter Bill he said that he had no objection.—In answer to a question, Sir R. PEEL stated that there was no probability of the Landlord and Tenants (Ireland) Bill passing this session; and that the Government proposed to prepare a measure during the recess with a like intent. The Right Hon. Baronet consented to yield Monday next to Mr. C. Buller, for the discussion of another motion on New Zealand.—Sir R. PEEL then called the attention of the House to a Bill which had come down to it from the Lords, for the purpose of removing all obstacles to the admission of Jews to municipal office. The impediment to the admission of Jews to municipal office existed in consequence of the act of 1828, repealing the Test and Corporation Acts, and substituting a declaration instead of the sacramental test as a passport to office. That declaration was, in most cases, to be made subsequently to the admission of the candidate into office; and the passing of the Annual Indemnity Act relieved him afterwards from the necessity of making it at all. But with respect to corporate offices, the declaration substituted in lieu of the sacramental test was to be made either within one month before the party was admitted into office or at the time of his admission. Doubts, however, existed as to the law upon the point. It had been held by the Court of Queen's Bench that there was nothing in the words of the law which prevented that declaration from being made after the party had entered into office. But on an appeal to a court of error that judgment had been reversed, and the law at present was considered to be that the declaration must be made previous to the admission of the candidate into municipal office. It was, therefore, incumbent on the proper municipal officer to insist that the Jew should make it before his admission. The practice of requiring that previous declaration was not, however, universal. In many corporations—for instance, at Portsmouth, Birmingham, and Southampton—they acted as if the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was correct, and the consequence was, that in those places there were Jews among the town-councillors. The object of the present Bill was to introduce a uniform practice throughout the country, and to remove the existing obstacles to the admission of Jews into all corporations. At present there was no legal impediment to the admission of Jews to the magistracy or to the deputy lieutenancy of counties; and many Jews of late years, as, for instance, Mr. Rothschild and Sir M. Montefiore, had been deputy lieutenants. A Jew might also be the sheriff of a county—nay, more, he was compellable to serve that office—and of late years his attempts to refuse serving had been resolutely rejected by the Privy Council. A few years ago there was some doubt whether a Jew could be sheriff of a city or town corporate; but Parliament had altered the law, and had expressly admitted Jews to such shrievalties. Mr. David Salomons had served the office of Sheriff of London and Middlesex with universal respect and admiration; and when he was elected alderman by his fellow-citizens, was excluded from the office because he was called on to make the declaration previously to his admission into it. The statement of that fact alone was a sufficient justification for the introduction of the present Bill. He then reminded the House, that when in 1828 Lord J. Russell brought in a Bill for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act, he (Sir R. Peel) had suggested a form of declaration to be substituted for the sacramental test previously taken. Every person entering upon office was, within one calendar month before his admission, to sign that declaration. The Jew would have had no objection to sign that declaration; but when it went up to the House of Lords words were inserted in it which formed the impediment of which the Jews now complained; for they were called upon "solemnly and sincerely to testify and declare upon the true faith of a Christian." The House of Lords—the authority which originally inserted the words constituting the difficulty—had now withdrawn them, and had sent the House of Commons a Bill which he thought that the House could scarcely refuse, as it contained the declaration in the form in which it passed the House originally in 1828. The object of the Act of 1828 was intended, not to impose new disabilities, but to relieve Dissenters from the Church from certain existing disabilities under which they then laboured. Now, unless that Act were repealed, the Jew would be worse off than he was before the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act; for the sacramental test was to be taken after the party had been admitted into the office; and then came the protection of the Annual Indemnity Act; but now the declaration was to be taken before admission, and therefore operated upon the Jew as an exclusion. The Jew was therefore entitled to relief; and as Parliament had relieved the Separatists, the Moravians, and the Quakers, who scrupled to make any declaration on the true faith of a Christian, he hoped that it would extend the same favour to the Jews. The measure of which he now proposed the second reading, would be acceptable to their feelings, as was proved by the petition which he had presented from them that evening, and would be personally gratifying to himself, as he was convinced that a body of men so distinguished for their benevolent feelings and their commercial and scientific acquirements, ought to have every facility for admission into municipal office.—Sir R. INGLIS observed, that Sir R. Peel's speech on this subject had not been more conclusive to his mind than similar speeches made by Lord J. Russell, Mr. Macaulay, and by his late lamented friend Mr. R. Grant, on the other side of the House. Sir R. Peel had, in his opinion, been guilty of a great legal and historical error, in stating that the impediments to the admission of Jews into municipal office had been created by the act of 1828, and by the declaration then inserted in that act. Nothing was more clear than this—that no Jew had ever been admitted into municipal office in this country up to the year 1828. Before he could enter into such office, the Jew had to take an oath upon the Gospels, or upon the cross, or upon some other Christian symbol; and to take such an oath was discordant to his feelings, and abhorrent from his conscience. He denied, too, that the law on this subject was uncertain. How could it be uncertain, after the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench upon it had been reversed after a solemn appeal to a court of error? He believed that the declaration which it was now sought to repeal had been drawn up by the House of Lords in its present shape for the express purpose of excluding from office the Jewish-born subjects of Her Majesty. As the Bill now stood, it was a Bill for the naturalisation of a whole nation, for the Jews still called and considered themselves a nation. It gave the same privileges to the German-born Jew as to the British-born Jew, and that, too, without calling upon him to take an oath that he would bear good and true allegiance to Her Majesty, or to give any other security for his good behaviour. By the terms of the present Bill, which was specially intended to admit individuals like Mr. Salomons and Sir M. Montefiore into corporate offices, those offices were opened to all foreign Jews without exception. He did not see anything in the circumstances of the Jews which entitled them to that special favour which was now claimed for them. We must not, out of compliment to the liberality, and charity, and scientific acquirements of the Jews, hazard the continuance of the Christian constitution of England. Dr. Arnold, who belonged to a very liberal school of ecclesiastical policy, had declared that though he would give the Jews the jus commercii, and the jus connubii, he would not give them the jus suffragii or the jus honorum; for England, he said, ought to be a land of Christians. He implored them not to destroy, for the sake of a handful of Jews, the identity of the British constitution with that Christianity which had been so long its glory, and he would also add, its defence. If he were told that in Belgium and in France the Jews were admissible to office, he would simply reply, "True, they are admissible, but as yet they have never been admitted." The Governments of Belgium and France gave the Jews the admissibility, but refused them the admittal to office. He regretted that Sir R. Peel had lent the sanction of his name to this Bill; but such was his opinion of its impolicy and inexpediency that he had no hesitation in moving that it be read a second time that day three months.—Mr. PLUMPTRE seconded the motion. The measure, which was most unsatisfactory to a great majority of the people of England, was completely of a piece with several other measures which had passed the house during the last two sessions, and which were disreputable to Parliament as a Christian Legislature and to the Government of Great Britain as a Christian Government. He was convinced that if the House should pass this Bill into law, it would forfeit the favour of Almighty GOD, and draw down upon the country the displeasure of the Most High.—Lord J. RUSSELL observed, that Mr. Plumptre had put the question upon grounds which he found it difficult to notice, and yet impossible to avoid. Mr. Plumptre said that in passing this Bill the House was neglecting its duty, and provoking the displeasure of the Most High. If that were true, Mr. Plumptre ought not to be content with negativing it: but ought to bring in another without delay, repealing all the laws by which Jews were enabled to hold the offices of high sheriffs and magistrates of counties. He was afraid that if Mr. Plumptre were to introduce such a Bill he would not be able to act upon it; for his argument was this,—"that every person admitted to political office should always hold opinions in conformity with the majority of the two Houses of Parliament, or, in other words, with the Church of England," and that argument stood on the narrowest grounds of religious intolerance. Mr. Plumptre stated, that on this question he was acting upon most sincere conviction. So, too, was he; and his sincere conviction was, that by communicating as widely as possible the privileges of the British constitution, and by diminishing as far as in them lay the rancour of religious animosity, the House would bring down upon itself, and upon the country, the blessing of the Most High. Sir R. Inglis had again stated his objections to Sir R. Peel's measure for relieving the Jews from certain disabilities, but without weakening in the slightest degree the case which Sir R. Peel had made out. He admitted that the House of Lords, when it altered the declaration contained in the act of 1828, as sent up to it from that House, did intend to exclude the Jews from every description of political office; but Sir R. Peel had anticipated the answer to be given to the argument which Sir R. Inglis had drawn from that fact, by showing that the House of Lords had repented of its former error, and was now of opinion that exclusion from municipal office, at least, ought to be done away with. He (Lord John) was of opinion that the Jews had a right to the privileges which he trusted were now about to be conferred upon them. When they were born in the country, and performed towards it the duties of citizens, and bore true and faithful allegiance to the Queen, they had a right to claim all the privileges of British-born subjects, and it was injustice to withhold such privileges from them. If Jews were aliens, the law would deal with them as with other aliens, and this Bill would not give any more rights to a German Jew than it would to a German Christian. Lord J. Russell then proceeded to express his satisfaction that Sir R. Inglis would not have upon this occasion the assistance which he received a session or two ago from Mr. Gladstone, whose absence he regretted, or from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose silence he admired. Having quoted extracts from the speeches of these two right hon. gentlemen against the policy of relieving the Jews from any of their existing disabilities, he owned that he was not credulous enough to suppose that the Jews, when they got this Bill, would give up their claim to be admitted to still higher privileges. He was quite confident that they would not—nay, that they ought not. They had a right to such privileges, and he hoped that it would not be long before they obtained them. He maintained that Sir R. Inglis had taken a one-sided view of the opinions of Dr. Arnold on this subject, availing himself of all that was exclusive, and rejecting all that was liberal in them. Either let him take the theory of Dr. Arnold—which he (Lord J. Russell) held to be unsubstantial—in its entirety, or let him not quote partial extracts from it for the purpose of keeping the Jews out of the pale of the constitution. He should heartily give his vote, not only for this measure, but for that larger measure of relief also, which both Mr. Gladstone and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said must follow if this measure were once carried.—After a few words from Mr. TRELAWNY and Mr. M. MILNES, in support of the second reading, the House divided, when the amendment was negatived by a majority of 91 to 11. The Bill was then read a second time.—The House went into Committee on the Poor-law Amendment (Scotland) Bill, and agreed to the remaining clauses.—Sir J. GRAHAM moved the second reading of the Bills of Exchange, &c. Bill.—Mr. M. GIBSON proposed the omission of that proviso in the Bill which restricts the operation of the act from transactions where real property constitutes the security.—Sir R. PEEL said that the relaxation of the usury laws in commercial transactions had been proved by experience to be most beneficial; and he had a strong opinion that the same result would follow to the landed interest should the usury laws be relaxed in like manner in respect to real property. He knew however that many apprehensions existed on the subject which should not be conquered by forced and hasty laws. He contemplated the appointment of a committee to inquire into the working of the relaxed usury laws on commercial transactions, and to consider the propriety of placing loans and forbearances on landed securities on the same footing, with regard to interest, as bills of exchange.—The Bill, which continues the existing Act for five years longer, was read a third time and passed.—The Jurors Books (Ireland) Bill, and the Taxing Masters Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill were read a second time.—The Grand Jury Presentment (Dublin) Bill, and the Excise Duties on Spirits (Channel Islands) Bill passed through committee.—The Geological Survey Bill, the Unclaimed Stock and Dividends Bill, and the Criminal Jurisdiction Assistant Barristers (Ireland) Bill, were read a third time and passed.

Metropolis and its Vicinity.

Court of Common Council.—A Court was held on Thursday, the Lord Mayor in the chair, at which the freedom of the city was presented to Sir Henry Pottinger in a magnificent gold box, for his public services in China. The sum of 500*l.* was also voted towards the relief of the sufferers from the late fire at Quebec.

Memorial to the Duke of Sussex.—On Friday evening a public meeting of the subscribers to the fund for erecting a memorial to the late Duke of Sussex took place at Willis's Rooms, for the purpose of deciding in what manner the money already collected should be disposed of. Lord Ebrington, M.P., presided. Among the gentlemen present were the Rev. Dr. Wolff, the Rev. Dr. Worthington, the Rev. Dr. Bowles, B. B. Cabbell, Esq., and about 80 subscribers to the fund.—The Chairman having briefly opened the proceedings, the Rev. Dr. Bowles, formerly chaplain to his Royal Highness, read a brief report which had been prepared for submission to the meeting. It stated that the subscriptions collected had been 2238*l.* 15*s.*; expenses incurred, 455*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*; leaving 1782*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* in the hands of the committee. It was recommended that a full-length marble statue of his Royal Highness should be placed, with the permission of the Royal Commission of the Fine Arts, in some part of the new Houses of Parliament, the cost of the statue not to exceed 2000*l.* The adoption of the report having been moved and seconded, Mr. Pritchard moved as an amendment that the amount of the fund be appropriated to the building another wing to the Royal Free Hospital, to be called "the Sussex wing," and to contain not less than 1000 beds, with the addition of a marble statue, to be erected at a cost not exceeding 1000 guineas, and "that such a building would constitute a peculiarly appropriate memorial of his late Royal Highness's character, render his virtues a source of benefit to mankind, and invest his memory with a moral grandeur, compared to which the highest works of art sink into insignificance." Mr. Dietrichsen seconded the amendment, and Lord Ebrington, the chairman, spoke in opposition to it. Every hand in the room, however (with one exception), was held up in favour of the amendment, so that the money collected will be applied to the hospital.

Death of Mr. Adolphus.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. John Adolphus, the celebrated barrister and author, which took place suddenly at the house of his son, Mr. Leycester Adolphus, in Montagu-street, Russell-square, on Wednesday night. Mr. Adolphus was one of the oldest members in the criminal courts of this country, and father of the Old Bailey bar. The deceased gentleman, in early life, raised himself to distinction in the metropolitan criminal courts, and in a few years worked his way into a large and lucrative practice. Mr. Adolphus on various occasions throughout his professional career had distinguished himself, and in a very remarkable manner by his extraordinary defence of Thistlewood and the other conspirators, in 1820. In his conduct of a case his statements and arguments were as clear and ingenious as his cross-examination of witnesses was skilful and felicitous. Mr. Adolphus spoke with ease and fluency, and on important occasions displayed eloquence of a high order. Among the literary productions of the deceased gentleman may be mentioned the "History of the Reign of George III.," the seventh volume of which has just appeared; the "Political State of the British Empire," 4 vols.; "Biographical Memoirs of the French Revolution;" "Life of Bannister," 2 vols., &c.

Asylum for the Insane of the Middle Classes.—Last week a public meeting was held at Freemasons' Tavern, Lord Ashley in the chair, for the purpose of establishing in the vicinity of London an asylum on the plan of Hanwell, but adapted to the middle classes, and capable of receiving 300 patients. Lord Ebrington, Lord Monteagle, Samuel Gurney, Esq., W. Tite, Esq., Drs. S. Smith, Bevan, Conolly, and Hodgkin, &c. were also present. The secretary read the prospectus of the intended asylum, which stated that its estimated cost was 30,000*l.*, that the committee intended commencing the building as soon as 10,000*l.* was raised, and that the payments by the patients would vary from 25*s.* to 30*s.* a week. The committee further intended raising a charitable fund by subscriptions, donations, and bequests, which would enable them to take into the asylum, free of expense, those who were most distressed amongst the class for whose benefit the asylum is to be erected. Resolutions were passed pledging the meeting to establish a lunatic asylum for the purposes and on the principles mentioned, and appointing a committee of trustees and other officers, to carry into effect those objects. Thanks were also voted to Earl Spencer and Lord Ashley for their able support in forwarding the institution.

Installation of the New Chief Rabbi.—On Thursday afternoon, Dr. Nathan Marcus Adler, until lately High-Priest at Hanover, and who has recently been elected to the office of Chief Rabbi of the Jews in England, vacant by the death of Dr. Herschell, was solemnly installed in the synagogue, Duke's-place. The day was observed by the Jews in the neighbourhood as a general holiday, most of the shops being closed, and business being suspended. Wardens from the principal synagogues in England and on the Continent were present, and assisted at the ceremony of inauguration. The procession which conducted the Chief Rabbi arrived at 4 o'clock, and having proceeded to the synagogue, the service was proceeded with. Every portion was conducted with the utmost solemnity, and the paraphernalia used were of the most costly description, the canopy under which the High-Priest walked being worth nearly 1500*l.* The synagogue, which has been for some time past closed for repairs, has been superbly decorated, and is now one of the handsomest buildings in the metropolis.

Employment of the Able-bodied Poor.—A public meeting of the friends and supporters of the Association for the Improved Paving, Cleansing, and Drainage, of the Streets of London, by the employment of the able-bodied poor, was held last week in the Hanover-square-rooms; the Duke of Grafton in the Chair. Mr. Cochrane, in moving the first resolution, stated that the object of the meeting was to employ able-bodied poor, to the number of 40,000, in the cleansing of the streets from mud and dust. Experiments had been tried in Regent-street and Oxford-street during the depth of winter, and had been found so successful, that the inhabitants of Regent-street sent a memorial to the Marylebone vestry, requesting them to continue the cleansing of the streets by manual labour. Another experiment had been tried in one part of the Strand, and the inhabitants of that part had requested the committee to continue the practice there, and they would be happy to bear the expense. If the plan were fully carried out, the extra expense, it was calculated, would be for every housekeeper in the city of London 7*s.* per annum. The expense entailed upon every individual in the largest metropolitan parishes would be about 1*d.* per month. There did not exist a house in the metropolis which, if well swept, would not in one hour, if the windows were kept open for for that time, have every article in it covered with dust. The loss to shopkeepers was very great from the dust that entered their shops. There was a gentleman present, living in Regent-street, who would prove that his annual loss amounted to from 100*l.* to 300*l.* Mr. Cochrane concluded by offering that, if the parish of St. George's, Hanover-square, would for six months employ one man for every 150 yards in the parish, and at the end of that time call a meeting, and take the opinion of the rate-payers on the subject, and if at that time the rate-payers should refuse to encourage the plan on account of its want of success, he would with great pleasure pay them their expenses, if they amounted to 2000*l.* or 3000*l.*, and make them a present into the bargain.—Mr. P. Borthwick, M.P.; Mr. Hansard, Mr. Cabbell, Lord Ranelagh, and others, addressed the meeting, and resolutions in favour of the plan proposed were unanimously adopted.

Panorama of Athens.—Mr. Burford has added another view to those lately exhibited at his rooms in Leicester-square. It is a view of Athens, taken from the hill of Musæus, near the monument of Philopappus, and embraces the whole panorama of the magnificent plain in which the city is situated, the grand range of mountains which encircle it, and the Ægean in the distance. No spot of ground can be more replete with interesting and classic association. The grandeur of the Parthenon and the Acropolis, Salamis, the Academy, the Piræus, &c., appeal in turn to the gazer, while a busy population crowds the suburbs of the city and the plain. The painting of the panorama is very fine, but the figures are scarcely equal in point of execution to the landscape, and the small size of the circle on which the panorama is painted occasionally brings the touch of the brush too close upon the eye.

Improvement of the Working Classes.—Mr. Simpson, of Edinburgh, has delivered in Exeter Hall two gratuitous addresses to the working classes, on the means of improving their character and condition. Lord Brougham occupied the chair on the first occasion, and Lord Ebrington on the second, surrounded by several noblemen and gentlemen. Exeter-hall was not quite filled, but there were about 2000 persons present. Mr. Simpson was received with loud cheers. In the course of his address he dwelt very largely on the report of the Health of Towns Commission, and on the necessity of an immediate improvement and ventilation of the dwellings of the labouring classes. He alluded to the improvements taking place in those dwellings in Edinburgh, and exhorted the labouring classes of London to pursue an equally sensible and advantageous plan, as the chief means of elevating their position in society; and, by so doing, also to improve the health of themselves and families, and increase their comforts and enjoyments, as the prosperity of all must in a great measure depend on the character and good conduct of the great masses of society. At the close of each lecture it was unanimously resolved that Mr. Simpson be cordially thanked for his kindness.

London Post Office.—The Times states that "it will be most satisfactory information to a great number of persons to hear that the distinction of the 'early delivery' of the Post-office is about to cease. A correspondent states, that on paying the amount lately, he was told that the system complained of would be discontinued after the current quarter, and that the postmen would have a slight increase of salary to compensate them for the loss they would experience consequently upon the alteration being made."

Mortality of the Metropolis.—The following is the number of deaths registered in the week ending July 12:—West Districts, 121; Northern, 130; Central, 139; Eastern, 185; Southern, 202; Total, 777; males, 384; females, 393. Weekly average for the last five years, 963. Births in the week, 1036; males, 513; females, 523.

Provincial.

Isle of Man.—Lieut.-Gen. Ready, Governor of this island, died at his official residence, Castletown, on Thursday week. He had long laboured under a cancer, which had baffled the skill of the most eminent surgical science in the kingdom. All hopes of his recovery had long been at an end, and the sufferer himself, as well as his family and friends, were waiting with resignation the end of his earthly career, when a mistake in the administering a wrong medicine anticipated his impending dissolution. He was appointed to his office by the Whig Government in 1834. The circumstances attending the death of the deceased requiring a coroner's inquest a verdict of "Accidental Death" was immediately returned.

Manchester.—Considerable excitement was caused in the Manchester District Bankruptcy Court last week, by the report that Mr. John Holt Stanway, one of the four official assignees appointed by the Lord Chancellor in connexion with this Court, had absconded. Various rumours were in circulation as to the cause of this step; but it is believed to have been caused by a large deficiency in some trust funds which had been placed in Mr. Stanway's hands, and not by any defalcation in connexion with his official assigneeship. He left Manchester on Friday, and it is believed that he sailed from Liverpool on Saturday morning, in the Great Western, for New York, taking with him his wife and four children.

Penzance.—On Tuesday week great excitement prevailed in Penzance, in consequence of the discovery of an appalling murder. The supposed perpetrator of the crime is a man named Benjamin Ellison, aged about 55, and belonging, it is supposed, to some part of the north of England. His unfortunate victim was Mrs. Elizabeth Rous Seman, about the same age as himself, and also an entire stranger in Penzance. They had resided together about 18 months in a small cottage near the town. About 11 o'clock on Monday night Ellison called at the Temperance Hotel, and asked for some refreshment. He inquired if he could sleep there that night; and on being asked why he did not go home, he said it was too late to do so. He remained there that night and left the house between five and six the next morning. From the hotel it appears he went to the house of a neighbour, and informed her that his house had been broken open, and that Mrs. Seman was murdered. An alarm was given, and it was then found that the head of the woman had been nearly severed from her body. From appearances, there was reason to believe that a desperate struggle must have ensued between the deceased and her murderer; the hands of Ellison were much bruised, and one of his fingers apparently bitten. An inquest was held forthwith, when the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against Ellison, who was committed to Bodmin for trial.

Plymouth.—The preliminary examination of the 10 slavers who were brought to England on the charge of being the murderers of Mr. Palmer, the midshipman, and eight men, of H.M.S. Wasp, after occupying the attention of the local magistrates for some days, has terminated in their conviction on the charge of wilful murder on the high seas. They have been conveyed to Exeter to take their trial at the Assizes. The evidence against the prisoners is most conclusive, the severest cross-examination of the approvers was unable in the least to shake their testimony given in the examination in chief, and each afforded the strongest corroboration of the truth of the other's statements. Under these circumstances, the main line of defence, it is understood, will be very different from that at first attempted; and the question of the illegality of the capture by the British, and the justification of the act of the prisoners, as under the protection of the Brazilian power, will be raised.

Walsall.—Considerable excitement has prevailed in this town since Wednesday week, in consequence of the melancholy death of Mr. J. H. Harvey, the mayor of the borough. It appears that the unfortunate gentleman was seen at a late hour on Tuesday night in the neighbourhood of a deep pool, which was formerly a lime-pit, on the right side of the Lichfield-road, and in which he was in the habit of bathing; and on the following morning his clothes were found on the bank of the pool. A considerable sum of money which he had in his pockets was found safe; his gold watch was carefully laid in his hat, and a stone placed in it to prevent its being blown away. The body was not found until Sunday. The jury, at the inquest, returned a verdict of Accidental Death.

Worthing.—On Friday a melancholy accident happened at this place to the daughter of Mr. Eden, brother of Lady Brougham, who has been residing here with his family. Miss Eden, and Miss Baring, the daughter of Mrs. Eden by a former marriage, had gone out in a small boat for a sail, when the boat capsized. Miss Eden was drowned before any help could be rendered, but Miss Baring was fortunately saved. The mother of the unfortunate young lady was on the beach and witnessed the accident; and it is a remarkable fact, that she also witnessed the death of her first husband, Mr. Baring, who was drowned off Dartmouth Pier, by the upsetting of a boat. Mr. Eden had gone to town the day before the accident happened, and the family were to join him in a few days. The young lady who was drowned was about 20 years of age, and in the course of the week, while riding with her father, was so struck with the quiet and simple beauty of the churchyard at Sompting, a neighbouring village, that she expressed a wish to be buried there—a wish that we understand is to be carried out.

Railways.

The evidence relating to the charges brought against the Ordnance department by the South Eastern Railway Company, has been published at great length this week; but it adds little to the main facts of the case, as stated in our last. We may, however, mention on the authority of the daily papers, that the disagreeable revelations contained in the report of the committee, have rendered it imperative on Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham to resign the offices held by them in the Board of Ordnance. Mr. Bonham was formerly member for Harwich. He has not had a seat in the present Parliament, but on the re-accession of Sir R. Peel to office in 1841, was again appointed Storekeeper-general of the Ordnance. The emoluments of the office are said to be about 1200*l.* a year. Captain Boldero is member for Chippenham, for which place he has been four times returned. He is married to a sister of Messrs. John and Joseph Neeld, both members of Parliament, and well known for their great wealth. He has for several years held the situation of Clerk of the Ordnance, the salary of which, independent of patronage pertaining to the office, is 1200*l.*—The Lords' Committees have decided that the preamble has been proved in the case of the Clydesdale junction, the Liverpool and Bury, the Wear Valley, the Scottish Midland, Norwich and Brandon (Diss and Dereham branches). The following Bills have been declared to have complied with the standing orders:—Aberdare, Newport and Pontypool, London and South Western (Metropolitan Extension), Birmingham and Gloucester branches, the Preston and Wyre, Brighton and Chichester, Guildford and Portsmouth, and Direct London and Portsmouth.—The Commons' Committees have decided that the preamble of the Rye and Tenterden has not been proved. The Blackwall Company last week decided on abandoning the main portion of their projected line to Epping and proceeding no further than Old Ford, a distance of 1½ mile only, by which means they will form a junction with the Eastern Counties, and give that line a new terminus in the city. The Eastern Counties upon this withdrew their opposition, and the Committee of the House of Commons passed the preamble of the Bill, so far as it related to that part of it which terminates at Old Ford. The Committee on the South Eastern district have passed the preamble of the South Eastern (Minster and Deal), and declined to proceed with the Maidstone, Ashford, and Tunbridge, and the Maidstone and Rochester lines. The Committee on the Lancashire district have passed the preamble of the Manchester and Leeds, and of the Bolton, Leigh, Liverpool, Manchester, and Grand Junction Amalgamation.—The week's synopsis of new schemes embraces upwards of 13 new lines. Amongst the leading ones are the Northampton, Banbury, and Cheltenham, with a proposed capital of 1,000,000*l.* The East and West of England Junction, from Northampton to Cheltenham; the Warrington and Stockport, with a capital of 400,000*l.*; the St. Lawrence and Atlantic, incorporated by the Canadian Congress; Sheffield and South Staffordshire, from Uttoxeter to Sheffield, 45 miles; Stephenson's London and Portsmouth, a resuscitated line, which will provide for a large tract of country from Wimbledon, by Dorking and Horsham to the coast; Derby, Gainsborough, and Great Grimsby; Glasgow and Belfast Union, from the Glasgow and Ayr, to join the British and Irish Union at Stranraer, and to connect Edinburgh and Glasgow with Belfast and Dublin. The Londonderry, Ballyshannon, and Sligo, and the Bradford, Wakefield, and Midland; the Oxford, Witney, and Cheltenham; the South Lancashire, from Southport to Ormskirk and St. Helens; the Chester and Manchester Direct, with a branch to Birkenhead; the London Central Junction, for connecting all the metropolitan lines, forming an outlet for goods and merchandise at the port of London, by a tunnel under the metropolis.—The Railway Chronicle states, from official returns, the amount of the railway traffic for the past six months:—"It appears that, on 39 railways, amounting to nearly 1800 miles, the aggregate traffic is, in round numbers, 2,850,000*l.*, being 550,000*l.* more than for the corresponding six months of last year.

This increase of revenue amounts to 20 per cent. on the total receipts of the half-year; and if we take the value of money at 4 per cent. per annum, this will give above 27,000,000*l.* as the increase in the real value of the railway property of the country since last July. Of this increase of half-yearly revenue, we find that the London and Birmingham Company has 52,000*l.* on the half-year, being an increase of exactly 2000*l.* a week. The Great Western has an increase of 41,000*l.*, the Grand Junction of 30,000*l.*, the Midlands of 57,000*l.*, the Brighton 14,000*l.*, and the South Western 8000*l.* Some of these lines have made extensions: but the greater part of the traffic is due to the increasing prosperity of the country, and the increase of the revenue has been in some cases in spite of large reductions in the rate of the fares."—As a specimen of the value attached to some of the evidence given on the railway questions before the House of Commons' committees, it is stated that two gentlemen from the northern part of Lincoln, whose evidence was not of the most important character, received 270*l.* each. Several Lincoln witnesses estimated the value of their time at 10*l.* per day, and actually received that sum.—It is understood that meetings of all the principal canal proprietors in the kingdom are about to be held to devise some plan for guarding their property, and maintaining its value against the competition of railways; and that, where practicable, it is intended to propose that the canals shall be converted into railways.

Armagh.—It will be learned with regret, that the second July anniversary has not passed over without bloodshed and loss of life. A desperate conflict took place in the city of Armagh between the antagonist parties, which ended in the death of one man, and several others, men and women, receiving severe wounds. It is admitted on all hands, if such can be a palliation for these dreadful scenes, that the Roman Catholics were the aggressors in the first instance. From an account in the Evening Mail it appears that on Saturday evening the Orange procession returned into town, in a peaceable and orderly manner, having gone out at an early hour of the day; the street they passed through was the leading thoroughfare by the market-house, and they proceeded into Dobbin-street. At the corner, where several streets meet, Ogle-street commences; and here a determined and preconcerted plan of opposition was intended, the Roman Catholic party expecting the procession would go up Ogle-street, as they were in the habit of doing some years ago. When about half the procession had passed the corner, a stone was thrown from the Roman Catholic party, who had assembled in large numbers, at an Orangeman who was on horseback, and immediately after a shot was fired from the house of a man named Rocks, a Roman Catholic. It is believed that this was the shot which struck William Magee, a Protestant, and the first person wounded. Such an attack led to retaliation, and several shots were fired from both parties, the Orangemen turning round in self-defence. The result was that of the Roman Catholic party four persons were wounded, and one died within an hour. Intelligence reached the Grand Jury, who were assembled on fiscal business, that a riot had commenced, and immediately three of the local magistrates left the Grand Jury room; one to order out the military, and the others to endeavour to quell the riot. The military, who were under arms all day, were soon at the scene of action, but all the mischief which occurred was done before they arrived; and the magistrate read the Riot Act, and succeeded in dispersing the mob without the necessity of ordering the police or military to fire. Scarcely a window in Ogle-street has a whole pane of glass. The attack on the Protestants must have been premeditated, as several of the upper windows had the sashes taken out, to enable the inmates to throw large stones down as they passed. Disappointed of this, by the procession turning down Dobbin-street, the stones were flung at the mounted man in the procession; this led the Orange party to return, and thus the Roman Catholics were afforded an opportunity of showering down those large stones which were flying so thick that the mounted policemen were obliged to retreat. The military were stationed in the market-house, and remained there all night under arms.

Cavan.—It is stated in Saunders' News Letter that the Lord Lieutenant is prepared to proclaim the disturbed parts of the counties of Leitrim, Roscommon, and Cavan, on receiving a requisition to that effect from the lieutenants of the respective counties. The troops encamped have had every means taken to secure their comfort; the tents have been supplied with timber flooring, raised six inches or more from the ground. Several log-houses, lined with sheet-iron, have been constructed under the superintendence of an engineer officer, to house the police where accommodation cannot be procured for them. Each log-house is capable of containing 10 men. At a meeting of the Cavan Magistrates on Saturday, an application was made to the grand jury on behalf of the widow of the late Mr. Booth, for compensation under 6th and 7th Will. IV., and evidence was adduced to prove that the deceased was murdered on account of his exertions as a magistrate, to bring disturbers of the public peace to justice. After a patient investigation, the grand jury were unanimously of opinion that the widow's claim was made out, and they awarded her 500*l.*, to be paid by four half-yearly instalments. After some discussion as to the locality from which to levy this sum, it was decided that, as the Ribbon conspiracy from whence the act in question proceeded, more or less pervaded each barony in the county, the sum should be levied on the county at large. After some progress had been made in the examination, the foreman suggested that the facts elicited bore so strongly upon the present state of the county, that though they were only dealing with a fiscal question, he thought it most important that the evidence should be committed to writing with a view to transmit it to the government. Since this, the magistrates of Leitrim, the grand jury of Longford, and the grand jury of Cavan, have forwarded addresses to the Lord Lieutenant, urging the necessity of "military law," or other coercive measures, for the restoration of tranquillity in that county, and the adjoining disturbed districts. The grand jury of Cavan state that,

"Hardly an hour of any day passed during the present assizes, that our attention has not been drawn from our ordinary duties as a grand jury, to fresh outrages occurring of the most serious and alarming character, in almost every direction from our county town, the public roads having been occupied by bands of lawless men, armed with pikes, pitchforks, and scythes, striking terror through the county both by day and night: rendering the danger imminent at each instant of a collision between these bands and the constituted authorities. While attending upon our duties as grand jurors, several of us have been served at our homes with notices menacing our lives; and we have before us the prospect of this state of things increasing, until extraordinary measures, such as formerly provided by the act 3d George IV., c. 1, shall be taken, to give it the only effectual check."

The magistrates of Leitrim say:

"We are daily more and more convinced of the inadequacy of the present law to cope effectually with the conspiracy against life and property which now exists; and that we, therefore, earnestly implore her Majesty's Government to apply to Parliament, before the approaching prorogation, for such additional powers as are required for the prevention and punishment of crime in this and the neighbouring counties. If no such measure be adopted, and the present executive machinery (which experience has proved to be so inefficient) be continued, we cannot but look forward with the utmost apprehension to the ensuing winter; and we wish hereby to repeat our deliberate warning, that, for the bloodshed and anarchy which must prevail, her Majesty's ministers will be responsible, if they shrink from proposing measures of such a severe and rigorous character as can alone effectually repress them."
